Records ⊜9(10½)—Decree confirming title must be entered on court records.

Under the Land Title Law, decree of the superior court determining and confirming title, provided for by sections 14–16, must be entered on the records of the court.

In Bank.

Application for writ of mandate by Mary Eliza Stewart and others against C. L. Logan, Registrar of Land Titles, etc., and John M. York, Judge, etc. Application for writ denied.

James W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. We are satisfied that under the provisions of the act known as the Land Title Law, Statutes 1915, p. 1932, the decree of the superior court determining and confirming title, provided for by sections 14, 15, and 16 of the act, must be entered upon the records of the court.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

All concur.

Ex parte YOUNG. (Cr. 2361.)

Prisons ⊜15—Prisoner held given sufficient notice before forfeiture of credits.

Under Pen. Code, § 1588, providing that a forfeiture of a prisoner's credits shall be made only after notice to the offender, etc., where a prisoner was brought before the board of prison directors upon a written charge which was read and explained to him, and to which he pleaded guilty without asking for time to present a defense, he was given all the notice and opportunity to defend required.

In Bank.

Original application by Henry A. Young for a writ of habeas corpus, directed to the State Board of Prison Directors. Writ denied.

Henry A. Young, pro se.

PER CURIAM. The only claim made in the petition that merits any consideration whatever is that contained in the allegations substantially to the effect that the prisoner was deprived of his credits by the board of prison directors without any notice to him or opportunity to defend, as provided by section 1588 of the Penal Code. But as to this it appears that in the habeas corpus proceeding instituted by him in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, to which he refers in his petition (Ex parte Young, Crim. 958, District Court of Appeal), wherein he sought release from imprisonment upon the same grounds as those relied on here, the return showed that he was brought before the prison directors upon a charge duly filed against him of escaping from the prison in violation of the law and the rules of the prison, that the charge was read and explained to him, and that he thereupon pleaded "guilty." He does not appear to have disputed the correctness of this return in the District Court of Appeal, his claim apparently being that this did not show the "notice" required by section 1588 of the Penal Code, which provides:

"Such forfeiture, however, shall be made only by the board of directors after due proof of the offense and notice to the offender; nor shall any forfeiture be imposed when a party has violated any rule or rules without violence or evil intent, of which the directors shall be the sole judges."

In the light of these facts it may fairly be assumed that his allegations of want of notice are intended solely to present the question of the legal sufficiency of the notice in fact given. We entertain no doubt whatever that one brought before the board of prison directors upon a written charge which is then and there read and explained to him, and to which he, without asking for time to present a defense, enters a plea of guilty, has had all the notice and opportunity to defend that by any reasonable construction can be held to be required by section 1588 of the Penal Code as a prerequisite to a forfeiture of credits by the board.

The application for a writ of habeas corpus is denied.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J., and LENNON, LAWLOR, SLOANE, WILBUR, OLNEY, and SHAW, JJ., concur.

GOLDEN STATE PORTLAND CEMENT CO. v. WARD MOTOR CAR CO. et al.

1. Fraudulent conveyances ⊂=241(3)—Creditor without a lien not entitled to possession of property.

A creditor of the seller of an automobile, possession of which was not immediately delivered as required by Civ. Code, § 3440, has no greater rights against the buyer than he would have against the seller had the latter still retained ownership of the machine, so that, having no lien, he is not entitled to possession of the property.

2. Bailment ⊂=18(2)—Repair lien does not attach to other chattels than that repaired on which work was done under same agreement.

The lien given by Civ. Code, § 3051, to a person who repairs personal property, even if it may extend under some circumstances to all articles on which work is done for the same person under the same arrangement, does not give a lien on an automobile for repairs made on other cars belonging to the same apparent owner, which were entirely separate transactions from the repairs on the car on which the lien was claimed.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by the Golden State Portland Cement Company against the Ward Motor Car Company and others to recover possession of an automobile. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Frank C. Hill and Geo. S. Hupp, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

John C. Miles, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment for the defendant in an action to recover possession of an automobile. There is some conflict as to immaterial facts, but none at all as to the material ones. These are: The plaintiff purchased the car from a third person, whom we will call the vendor, and paid for it. We will assume, although there is grave question about it, that the sale was not accompanied by the immediate delivery followed by an actual and continued change of possession which section 3440, Civil Code, requires in the case of a sale of personal property, if the sale is not to be conclusively presumed fraudulent as to creditors. The license number, however, was changed, a new license plate attached, and the new owner's certificate of registration put in the car. The car was then turned over to the defendant to make some repairs upon it. These were made at a cost of $128.24. Against this was a credit of $40.00 which the defendant had received for some old tires which were on the car, and which he had sold pursuant to instructions to do so. The defendant was also doing work on certain other cars belonging to the vendor, and the bill for this work was $240.20. When the repairs upon the plaintiff's car were complete, and he went to the defendant to secure it, the defendant insisted that he be paid, not only for the work on that car, but also for that on the others. The plaintiff thereupon tendered the defendant the cost of the repairs on his car, less the $40 received for the tires, and demanded possession, which was refused. The present action followed.

[1, 2] The justification which the defendant urges for his refusal to give possession, is that he was a creditor of the vendor, and the sale was void as to the vendor's creditors under section 3440, Civil Code, mentioned. But the section, while avoiding sales as to creditors not accompanied by an immediate and continued change of possession, does not give a creditor any greater rights against the vendee in the case of such a sale than he would have against his debtor, the vendor. This goes almost without saying. The defendant, therefore, in the present case could justify his refusal to give up possession of the car only in case he had a lien upon it, not only for the repairs made to it, but also for those made to the other cars. The court found that the vendor had instructed the defendant to hold the car as security for his indebtedness, that is, found in effect a pledge, but this finding is without support in the evidence, as is practically conceded. In the absence of a lien by agreement, a pledge in effect, the only lien which the defendant could have was one under section 3051, Civil Code, which provides that—

"A person who makes, alters, or repairs any article of personal property, at the request of the owner, or legal possessor of the property, has a lien on the same for his reasonable charges * * * for such work done and materials furnished, and may retain possession of the same until the charges are paid."

But the lien so given extends only to the article upon which the work is done or for which the materials are furnished, and does not extend to anything else. 6 Corpus Juris, 1134, § 82. The defendant had a lien in this case for work done on the plaintiff's car, but he did not have any for the work done on the other cars. It may possibly be that under some circumstances where work is done on several different articles for the same person under the same arrangement, the different articles will be considered as but one as between the parties, so that a single lien for all the work covering all the articles will arise. But such is not the case here. The work on the plaintiff's car was done as a separate and distinct job, and in fact was separately charged against the plaintiff, and not against the vendor. The defendant then had a lien only for that work. Against the amount of this lien was the credit for $40 received by the defendant from the sale of the old tires on the car. The balance he was tendered by the plaintiff, who thereby discharged the lien (section 1504, Civ. Code; Loughborough v. McNevin, 74 Cal. 250, 14 Pac. 369, 15 Pac. 773, 5 Am. St. Rep. 435) and became entitled to possession.

1. Municipal corporations ⟸705(2) — Driver on wrong side of street and turning further to that side held liable for collision.

Where two vehicles are directly approaching each other, and each driver, to avoid a collision, turns to the same side, so that a collision results, the driver who was on the wrong side of the road and turned further to the wrong side is primarily liable.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸705(10)—Failure to avoid collision does not prevent recovery unless due to lack of reasonable care.

Whether one injured in a collision between his automobile and another car was negligent did not depend on whether he could have turned further to the right and thus avoided the collision, but whether his failure to do so was necessarily due to lack of reasonable care.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸706(7)—Contributory negligence of driver of one of colliding automobiles held for the jury.

Where plaintiff turned his automobile to the right to avoid defendant's car, which was on the wrong side of the street, but defendant turned to the same side and a collision resulted, it was a question for the jury whether plaintiff in such emergency was negligent in not turning to the left or turning more quickly or further to the right.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1053(3)—Admission of evidence held cured by instructions.

In an action for injuries sustained in an automobile collision on the easterly way of a double street, the admission of testimony that a signboard directed south-bound traffic to take the westerly way, if erroneous, was cured by an instruction that the fact that defendants were on the wrong side lost its importance because plaintiff observed them in ample time to avoid them and was bound to regulate himself accordingly.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Francis M. Shupe against Mrs. F. G. Rodolph and husband. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Rehearing denied: WILBUR, LENNON and SLOANE, JJ., dissenting.

OLNEY, J. The present action is one for damages for personal injuries suffered by the plaintiff as a result of a collision between a motorcycle upon which he was riding and the automobile of the defendants. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict for the plaintiff, upon which judgment was entered. The defendants appeal.

The chief contention of the defendants is that the verdict is not supported by the evidence, in that it shows that the plaintiff was himself guilty of contributory negligence. The accident took place on American avenue in the city of Long Beach. The street is apparently what may be described as a double street; that is, there are two distinct and parallel ways, separately curbed and separated by a space not used for travel. The street runs north and south, and the easterly of the two ways is called American Avenue East, and is but 26½ feet in width. At the time of the accident the defendants were proceeding south in this, the left-hand way as they were going, and the plaintiff was coming north on the same way. The testimony is in sharp conflict as to whether the defendants were on the right-hand side of the way or not, and as to just how the accident took place.

[1] Taking the view of the evidence most favorable to the plaintiff, as we must do, the defendants were proceeding a little to the left of the center line of the way, as they were going, and the plaintiff was several feet to the right as he was going. As the two vehicles approached close to each other, the defendants turned still further to their left, and the plaintiff turned to his right so that the two met. The accident, in other words, according to the evidence for the plaintiff, was the not infrequent one of two cars directly approaching each other, one of them on the wrong side of the road, and where the two drivers in endeavoring to avoid a collision both turn to the same side, so that a collision results. In such a case it is evident that responsibility for the accident rests primarily with the driver who was not on the right side of the road in the first place and who turned to the wrong side in the second place.

[2, 3] The contention that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence is rested upon the fact that the evidence showed that at the time of the collision there was an open space of at least 6 feet between the car of the defendants and the curb on its left, that the plaintiff was, according to his testimony, going slowly, and that he could have turned his machine still further to the right and passed the defendants in the open space mentioned. But the question in the case is not whether the plaintiff could have turned further to the right and have avoided the collision, but whether, assuming that he could, his failure to do so was necessarily due to lack of reasonable care to avoid the impending collision. The two things are not the same. It may be that the plaintiff, if he had turned more quickly to the right, might have avoided the collision. It may also be that he could have avoided it by turning to the left. The point is that, when the defendants' car started to turn to the left, the plaintiff was confronted with a situation of imminent danger requiring instant action, and there may have been no negligence on his part in taking the action he did, although if he had done something else he would have escaped. As was said in Karr v. Parks, 40 Cal. 188, 193:

"It would be absurd to hold that even an adult person, in time of imminent danger, is negligent, unless he takes every precaution that a careful calculation afterward will show he might have taken."

Whether under the circumstances here presented the plaintiff did what he reasonably could to avoid the collision is very apparently a question about which there might be a reasonable difference of opinion. Such being the case, the answer to the question was exclusively within the province of the jury, and we cannot disturb their conclusion.

[4] The defendants also complain that testimony was admitted that at the north end of the street there was a signboard directing all south-bound traffic to take the westerly way. The point of the objection is that, although the signboard was there and its direction was disregarded by the defendants, there was no ordinance or other sufficient regulation prescribing that south-bound traffic should take the westerly way, so that the direction of the signboard was without authority, so to speak. But, if the admission of this testimony was erroneous (which we do not decide), the error was cured by the instructions of the court to the jury, which were that the fact that the defendants were on the easterly way when they should have been on the westerly lost its importance by reason of the circumstance that the plaintiff observed them there in ample time to avoid them, and, because of this, "that he had to regulate himself the same as if that was a street by itself and each one coming down there." There is nothing else which requires comment.

BOYD v. SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO.

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜45—Statute for dismissal for want of prosecution held mandatory.

Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing for dismissal of a cause for failure to bring it to trial, is mandatory.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(2)—Cause set for trial at date beyond the limitation for dismissal is not "brought to trial."

A cause was not "brought to trial," within the requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 583, providing for dismissal for failure to prosecute, where plaintiff's application to have the cause set for trial was within the time limited but the date fixed for trial was beyond such limitation; an action is not brought to trial until the trial is commenced.

3. Appeal and error ⊜927(2)—Acquiescence in plaintiff's failure to prosecute must be shown to appellate court.

Every intendment being in favor of a judgment, the defendant cannot be deemed to have acquiesced in plaintiff's failure to bring the case to trial, resulting in dismissal, where such acquiescence is not shown.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜50—Failure to object to delay in prosecution does not waive rights.

Mere failure to object to setting a cause for trial at a date beyond the limitation fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 583, was not an acquiescence in plaintiff's failure to bring the cause to trial within the time required by the statute.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John M. York, Judge.

Action by J. Boyd against the Southern Pacific Railroad Company. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. O. Graves, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment for the defendant based upon an order dismissing the action in accord with the requirements of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, because of failure to bring the action to trial within five years after answer filed. The Code section mentioned reads:

"Dismissal of Actions. The court may in its discretion dismiss any action for want of prosecution on motion of the defendant and after due notice to the plaintiff, whenever plaintiff has failed for two years after answer filed to bring such action to trial. Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff or by the court on its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

[1] The mandatory character of these provisions of the statute is evident, and our decisions have held that such is in fact their character. Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 Pac. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670. In the present case, the action was once set for trial at a time something over a year after issue joined by answer, but the trial date was continued indefinitely by stipulation. Some years later and a few months before the expiration of the five-year period, the plaintiff moved that the cause be set again for trial, and this was done but for a date after the expiration of the period. Upon the expiration of the period and before the trial date, the defendant moved that the action be dismissed, and the order of dismissal was made.

[2] The contentions of the plaintiff are two. The first is that the cause was "brought to trial," within the meaning of the statute, when it was set for trial, although the date set as the actual trial date was later. Counsel's argument is that when the plaintiff applied to have the cause set he had done all that he could do, that the fixing of the date at which it would be tried was wholly in the power of the court and beyond the plaintiff's control, and that the expression "brought to trial" should be taken to mean only that which the plaintiff could control, and for which alone, therefore, he should be held responsible. But the meaning of the expression "brought to trial" seems to us too plain to be in doubt. The trial of an action and the setting of it for trial are quite distinct things, and an action is certainly not brought to trial until the trial is commenced. Whether a mere calling of it for trial on the day set for that purpose would be a bringing of it to trial, we need not determine. We need not determine either what would be the situation where a reasonable time before the running of the five years a plaintiff endeavors to have a cause brought to trial but the court refuses to set a date for trial before the time shall have run, although its attention is called to the necessity for so doing. It does not appear in the present case that the situation in this respect was called to the court's attention when the plaintiff's motion to set the cause was heard, and it may well have been that, if it had been, an earlier date would have been fixed. The responsibility for calling to the court's attention the necessity for an early date for trial was on the plaintiff, and since he did not do so he must be taken to have acquiesced in the date set.

[3, 4] The second contention of the plaintiff is that the defendant waived the right to require a dismissal of the action by acquiescing in the plaintiff's motion to set the cause. A complete answer is that it does not appear that the defendant did so acquiesce. For all that appears, the defendant may have contested the motion to set, or, on the other hand, may not only have acquiesced but have asked for an earlier date, which, upon the plaintiff's objection, was refused. Every intendment is in favor of the judgment, and any matter relied on to show error must affirmatively appear. Furthermore, the plaintiff's counsel seem to mean by acquiescence the mere failure of the defendant to object to setting the cause for trial. But such failure alone would neither constitute a consent or agreement to try the case at the time set or amount to a misleading of the plaintiff. Certainly, without one or the other of these elements there could not be a waiver either direct or by estoppel.

GREEN v. SKINNER. (L. A. 5853.)

1. Deeds ⊂=56(2)—Delivery a matter of intention.

The question of the delivery of a deed depends on the intent of the grantor.

2. Deeds ⊂=58(2), 61—Delivery to grantee's father final delivery; deposit for delivery on grantor's death valid delivery.

If a grandfather intended, when he handed to his son deed conveying a half-interest in certain land to his grandson, that the deed should operate as an immediately effective conveyance, then, omitting the circumstance that the grandson was unaware of the deed, there was a final delivery, and the effect of the deed was to vest immediately in the grandson a future interest in remainder subject to a life estate in the grantor; the grantor having instructed the custodian son to keep the deed until the grantor's death, and then deliver it to the grantee grandson.

3. Joint tenancy ⊂=4—Joint tenancy may be severed by conveyance by one tenant.

A joint tenancy may be severed and ended by a conveyance, by one of the tenants, of his share, and the conveyance will have such effect though it is merely a conveyance of a remainder after the death of the cotenant making the conveyance.

4. Joint tenancy ⊂=4—Severance must take place before the death of cotenant.

Severance or attempted severance of a joint tenancy by conveyance of his share by a certain tenant, even a remainder after his death, must take place before the death of such cotenant and before the other as a consequence has become the owner of the whole by virtue of his right of survivorship.

5. Deeds ⊂=64, 65—Deed could not take effect until acceptance; acceptance relates back.

Before a deed could finally take effect, there had to be an acceptance of it, or of the gift made by it, by the grantee; but such assent when given, as between grantor and grantee, will relate back to the time when the grantor first handed the deed over to a third person for delivery to the grantee.

6. Deeds ⊂=65—Assent to conveyance made by grantee after grantor's death will relate back.

Assent of the grantee to the deed or the gift made by it may be after the death of the grantor, the deed having been delivered to a custodian until such event, and yet be effective by relation, so that the deed will be taken as delivered in the lifetime of the grantor, the only limitation being that the assent of the grantee will operate retroactively by relation only in the absence of intervening rights of third persons.

7. Joint tenancy ⊂=13—Grantee of cotenant who did not assent to conveyance until grantor had died took nothing.

Where a grandfather, holder of property as joint tenant with another, signed and acknowledged deed purporting to convey to his grandson a half-interest in the property, and delivered such deed to his son, with instructions to keep it until his (the grandfather's) death, and then to deliver it to the grandson, the grandson could not and did not assent to such conveyance, or gift, until the grandfather's death, when survivorship rights of the other joint tenant attached, and under such deed the grandson can take nothing.

8. Joint tenancy ⊂=6—Survivor takes under devise or conveyance creating tenancy.

The joint tenant who survives does not take the moiety of the other from him or as his successor, but by right under the devise or conveyance by which the joint tenancy was created.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Mabel R. Green against Arthur Skinner. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Donald Barker and James M. O'Brien, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George E. Mills and Alfred H. McAdoo, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an action to quiet title to certain real property. The plaintiff is admittedly the owner of an undivided one-half interest. The controversy is over the remaining one-half. The plaintiff had judgment, and the defendant appeals.

The property was originally conveyed to and held by the plaintiff and the defendant's grandfather as joint tenants. While so held the defendant's grandfather signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey to the defendant a one-half interest in the property and handed it to his son, the defendant's father, with instructions to keep it until his (the grandfather's) death and then deliver it to the defendant. The father kept the deed in accordance with his instructions, and upon the grandfather's death, a year and a half later, had it recorded and gave it to the defendant. The defendant in the meantime was wholly unaware of the making of the deed by his grandfather, not learning of it until the day of his grandfather's funeral. Upon the foregoing facts the plaintiff claims the whole property by the right of survivorship incident to the joint tenancy, and the defendant claims that the deed of the grandfather operated in his lifetime to sever the joint tenancy and change it into a tenancy in common so that no right of survivorship existed and the defendant is entitled to an undivided one-half interest as the successor of his grandfather.

[1, 2] Question is made as to whether there was any effective delivery of the deed by the grandfather at all. The trial court found that there was none, but this finding is attacked as not sustained by the evidence. The question, of course, is one as to the intent of the grantor. If he intended, when he handed the deed to his son, that it should operate as an immediately effective conveyance, then, omitting the circumstances that the grantee was unaware of the deed, there was a final delivery, and the effect of the deed was to vest immediately in the grantee a future interest in remainder subject to a life estate in the grantor. Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446, 33 Pac. 338, 35 Am. St. Rep. 186. We need not, however, determine whether such intent appears from the evidence or not, and may for purposes of discussion take the view favorable to the defendant and assume that it does. The case presented for discussion, then, is one wherein a joint tenant executes a deed of his moiety, delivers the deed, intending the delivery as an immediately effective one, but delivers it to a person other than the grantee with instructions that it is not to be delivered to the latter until the grantor's death, and thereafter dies, subsequent to which event the deed is delivered to the grantee and he for the first time learns of it. The question presented is: Does a deed so delivered by one joint tenant terminate the joint tenancy and destroy the right of survivorship in the other joint tenant?

[3, 4] It is the law that a joint tenancy may be severed and ended by a conveyance by one of the tenants of his share. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 29. The conveyance will have this effect even though it be but a conveyance of a remainder after the death of the cotenant making the conveyance. Clerk v. Clerk, 2 Vern. 323; 23 Eng. Reprint, 809. On the other hand, the severance or attempted severance must take place before the death of such cotenant and before the other, as a consequence, has become the owner of the whole by virtue of his right of survivorship. The question in the case stated, therefore, reduces itself into one as to when the deed to the defendant from his grandfather took effect: Was it before or after the latter's death?

[5, 6] The answer to this depends entirely upon the effect properly to be given to the circumstance that the defendant was wholly unaware of the deed until after his grandfather's death. Before the deed could finally take effect, there had to be an acceptance of it, or of the gift made by it, by the grantee. Section 1059, Civ. Code; Hawkes v. Pike, 105 Mass. 560, 7 Am. Rep. 554; Kingsbury v. Burnside, 58 Ill. 310, 11 Am. Rep. 67. Even so, however, such assent when given will, as between the grantor and the grantee, relate back to the time when the grantor first handed the deed over to a third person to be delivered to the grantee. Such assent may be after the death of the grantor and yet it is effective by relation, so that the deed will be taken as delivered in the lifetime of the grantor. 1 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) § 276. This is well established, but with it goes the modification, likewise settled as the law, that the assent of the grantee will operate retroactively by relation only when the rights of third persons have not intervened. This was directly decided by this court after the matter had been twice considered in Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 4 Pac. 473, 8 Pac. 46, 56 Am. Rep. 726. There the owner of certain real estate signed and acknowledged a deed purporting to convey the property to his brother, had the deed recorded, and then delivered it to a third person to hold it for his brother. His brother was unaware of the deed at the time these things were done, and before he learned of it a money judgment had been secured against the grantor, which was a lien upon his property. It was held that as against this intervening judgment lien the subsequent assent of the grantee would not relate back so as to make the deed effective as of the date when the grantor had handed it over, and that at the date the judgment was secured the property must be taken to be still the property of the grantor and subject to the lien of the judgment. For similar decisions in other jurisdictions, see Welch v. Sackett, 12 Wis. 243; Commonwealth v. Jackson, 73 Ky. (10 Bush) 424; Bell v. Farmers' Bank, 74 Ky. (11 Bush) 34, 21 Am. Rep. 205; Goodsell v. Stinson, 7 Blackf. (Ind.) 437; Parmelee v. Simpson, 5 Wall. 81, 18 L. Ed. 542. The same rule exists in the closely analogous case where it is sought to give retroactive effect to the ratification by a principal of an act of his agent unauthorized in the first instance. Taylor v. Robinson, 14 Cal. 396.

[7, 8] We perceive no reason why this rule does not apply to the present case. The deed to the defendant could not be finally effective until he assented to it. He did not and could not assent to it until he knew of it, which was after the grantor's death. In the meantime and because of that death, the plaintiff's right to the whole property had accrued to her as the surviving joint tenant. If it be the rule that a subsequent assent to a deed by the grantee will not operate retroactively and by relation to give effect to the deed as of the date when the grantor parted with it, when such operation would destroy rights which have accrued to third persons in the meantime, it would seem plain that the defendant's consent in this case cannot be given effect by relation to destroy the right which had accrued to the plaintiff in the meantime. If anything, the present case is somewhat stronger for the application of this rule than a case where the intervening right is that of a judgment or attachment lien. For most purposes the holder of an attachment or judgment lien is considered as to third persons as standing in the shoes of the debtor, so that any right which is good against him is good against the holder of the lien. But here the plaintiff does not for any purpose stand in the shoes of the defendant's grantor. Her right was wholly independent of him. It was, to be sure, a right which he had the power to destroy by a severance of the joint tenancy upon which they held the property; but, unless this power was exercised in his lifetime, the right became complete as an incident of their tenancy. It is the old rule, in other words, that the joint tenant who survives does not take the moiety of the other from him or as his successor, but by right under the devise or conveyance by which the joint tenancy was created in the first instance. Freeman on Cotenancy and Partition, § 28. It would seem that if the consent of the grantee cannot operate retroactively to destroy an intervening right of one claiming through his grantor and yet not a bona fide purchaser for value, as the holder of an attachment or judgment lien is not, it assuredly cannot operate retroactively to destroy an intervening right of one who does not claim through his grantor at all. This conclusion is decisive of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

ROTH v. MOELLER et al. (L. A. 6509.)

1. Principal and agent ⊂⊃33—Principal has power to revoke authority at any time, but by contract may curtail right to do so.

Under Civ. Code, § 2356, providing that unless the power of an agent is coupled with an interest it is terminated by its revocation by the principal, a principal has power to revoke an agent's authority at any time before the agent has completed performance, but may curtail his right of revocation by contracting not to revoke the authority for a definite time.

2. Principal and agent ⊂⊃41—Principal may revoke authority notwithstanding contract, but is liable in damages.

Though a principal contracts not to revoke the agent's authority for a definite time, he has power to terminate the agency within the designated period, but if he does so is liable in damages for the violation of the agent's legal rights.

3. Brokers ⊂⊃44—Contract held not to provide that principal should not revoke authority.

A contract, containing an offer to exchange property with a third party, and providing that the offer should be null and void unless accepted within 10 days, but should be irrevocable during that period, and further providing that plaintiffs should be authorized to act as agents in negotiating the exchange, contained no agreement on the principal's part not to revoke the agent's authority, but merely an agreement not to withdraw the offer to the third party, and hence the agents' authority might be revoked at will.

4. Exchange of property ⊂⊃3(1)—Offer without consideration may be withdrawn, notwithstanding statement that it shall be irrevocable.

An offer to exchange property, providing that it should be irrevocable for 10 days, was revocable at any time before acceptance, where there was no consideration for the offer or for the agreement not to revoke.

5. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1046(5) — Questions asked plaintiff by court during case in chief, disclosing facts material to defense, held harmless.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2042, providing that the order of proof is in the court's sound discretion, questions put by the court to plaintiff while testifying in his own behalf on his case in chief, resulting in the disclosure of facts material to the defense, did not require reversal, where no harm appeared to have resulted, and it affirmatively appeared that plaintiff's counsel was given ample opportunity to examine plaintiff after he had answered such questions.

6. Witnesses ⊂⊃246(2)—Court may call and examine witnesses.

The court has power to call or examine witnesses in furtherance of justice against the will of either party.

7. Brokers ⊂⊃30—Held not liable to principal because third party accepted offer after withdrawal and sued for specific performance.

Where R., to whom brokers were authorized to make an offer to exchange properties had notice that the principal had withdrawn the offer, and one of the agents took him to view the property merely in the hope that he and the principal would come to an understanding, and, in accepting the offer notwithstanding the withdrawal, R. relied on a statement in the offer that it would not be revoked, and not on anything done by the agents, they were not liable for the principal's expenses in defending R.'s suit for specific performance.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; H. T. Dewhirst, Judge.

Action by Vincent L. Roth against Maria Moeller, who filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, and from judgment for defendant in his cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Judgment of nonsuit affirmed, and judgment in cross-complaint reversed.

A. W. Burt, of Upland, for appellant.

Swanwick & Donnelly, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action was instituted for the recovery of compensation for services alleged to have been rendered under a contract in writing, whereby the defendant Mrs. Maria Moeller authorized the plaintiff, Roth, and cross-defendant, King, to submit to one Richardson a proposition for the exchange of an orange grove which belonged to defendant Moeller for real property owned by said Richardson. Roth and King were engaged in the real estate business, King residing and having his office in the city of Los Angeles, while Roth resided in a country district near the home and property of defendant. The contract, which was drawn by King and signed by the parties at defendant's home on October 16, 1916, after reciting in detail the proposed offer to be submitted to Richardson, continued:

"Unless this offer shall be accepted in writing within 10 days of the date hereof and such written acceptance delivered to me or to my agent hereinafter named, all within the time aforesaid, this offer shall thereupon immediately be and become revoked, null and void without notice. During said period this offer shall be irrevocable."

The agreement then set forth further details relating to incidents of the exchange, and finally provided for an agency in the following terms:

"Roy D. King, Vincent L. Roth is hereby authorized to act as my agent in negotiating an exchange; I agree that if he shall secure an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above described property on the above terms, that I will, within 10 days, furnish a certificate of title or abstract from a reputable and reliable abstract company. * * * And it is further agreed with said Vincent L. Roth, Roy D. King that when they have secured an acceptance of the proposition to exchange the above described property on the above terms, I will then pay him the sum of seven hundred seventy-three and 64/100 (773 64/100) dollars as commission for such services, which is the entire commission to be paid by me."

King delivered this agreement to Richardson's agent in Los Angeles on the evening of October 16. The following morning defendant Moeller telephoned to plaintiff, Roth, and directed him to hold up the proposition. Roth conveyed defendant's message by telephone to King's father, in Los Angeles, who, in turn, informed cross-defendant King. On the same day, October 17, cross-defendant King told Richardson's agent that defendant Moeller had directed that nothing further be done under the agreement. This agent reported to Richardson, to whom he had already delivered the agreement, that defendant "seemed to be trying to get a better deal." Nothing occurred until October 20, when Roth took Richardson to see defendant's place; it being stated to her that Richardson desired to look the grove over. He did examine the property, and discussed the exchange with Mrs. Moeller, but no agreement had been reached when the men left that afternoon. On the following day Richardson indorsed his acceptance upon the offer of exchange, and recorded the same, and, on November 27, 1916, brought suit against defendant for the specific performance thereof.

The present action was instituted by Roth alone, to whom King has assigned all his interest, and the complaint sets forth two causes of action, the first of which alleges full performance of the contract in securing Richardson's acceptance of the offer of exchange within 10 days after the execution of the contract, and seeks the compensation provided by the contract; the second claiming $773.64 as the reasonable value of services performed under the contract. Defendant, in addition to an answer alleging revocation of the authority granted by the contract, filed a cross-complaint against plaintiff and King as cross-defendants, claiming that the expense incurred by her in defending Richardson's suit for specific performance was the result of the acts of the agents in violating instructions and carrying on the deal, notwithstanding her withdrawal of their authority. The trial court nonsuited the plaintiff, Roth. It was further adjudged that the cross-complainant was not entitled to any judgment against cross-defendant King, but an affirmative judgment was entered in favor of cross-complainant and against cross-defendant Roth in the sum of $500. Roth appeals from the judgment of nonsuit, and from the judgment upon the cross-complaint.

[1, 2] The effect of defendant's revocation of the agents' authority is the paramount point to be determined in passing upon the correctness of the judgment of nonsuit. Save in the case of an agency coupled with an interest, a principal has the power to revoke an agent's authority at any time before the agent has completed performance. Civ. Code, § 2356; Flanagan v. Brown, 70 Cal.

254, 11 Pac. 706; Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 17 Pac. 427; Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 26 Pac. 906; 1 Cal. Jur. p. 705. A principal may, however, curtail his right of revocation by contracting not to revoke the authority for a definite time. If the principal does so contract, he still retains the power to terminate the agency, and the termination cannot be prevented by the agent, but a revocation of authority within the designated period renders the principal liable for damages for the violation of a legal right of the agent, just as in the case of any other breach of contract. Parke v. Frank, supra; Blumenthal v. Goodall, supra; Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Sons, 145 Cal. 671, 79 Pac. 354; Sill v. Ceschi, 167 Cal. 698, 140 Pac. 949; Boehm v. Spreckels, 191 Pac. 5.

[3, 4] We are of the opinion that, in the instant case, defendant violated no rights of the agents in revoking their authority. The contract herein sued upon contains no agreement that the agency shall continue for a specific period. That part of the agreement which sets forth the terms of exchange contains a provision that the offer to Richardson shall become null and void if not accepted within 10 days, and the further statement that during that period the offer is to remain irrevocable. This offer to Richardson and the agreement not to revoke it were made without consideration, and the offer was therefore revocable at any time before acceptance, for it is elementary that an agreement not to revoke a bare offer is not binding. There is no provision that the authority of the agents shall remain irrevocable for any period. The 10 days allowed for acceptance was a part of the offer to Richardson, but the writing does not provide that the agents shall have 10 days in which to procure the acceptance; the concluding paragraphs of the writing, wherein the agents are authorized to procure an acceptance, contain no specification as to time. It is true that, the offer to Richardson being void at the expiration of 10 days, the authority of the agents, if not sooner revoked, would amount to nothing after that period; but this is a limitation upon, rather than a grant of, the time for their performance. Upon this theory the case is distinquishable from that class of cases where the principal has, by the terms of his contract, restricted his right of revocation (Blumenthal v. Goodall, supra), and comes within the decision in Brown v. Pforr, 38 Cal. 550. In that case the principal had agreed to pay plaintiffs a commission "if they would find, within one month from the date of the contract, a purchaser for a certain parcel of real estate." The court held that the limitation of time was a restriction limiting the time allowed for performance by the agent, and not a restriction upon the principal's right of revocation; in other words, that the limitation was one in favor of the principal rather than the agent. Similarly, in the present case, the 10-day period was a limitation upon the authority of the agent, and not upon the principal's right of revocation.

It may be that, where a principal permits an agent to expend money or time and effort under a contract, an agreement not to revoke for a reasonable time may be implied from the circumstances, and the principal held liable for the agent's commission in case he violates the implied agreement. Boehm v. Spreckels, supra; Blumenthal v. Goodall, 89 Cal. 251, 255, 26 Pac. 906. However, owing to the promptness with which the authority was revoked by defendant, no such question arises in this case. Furthermore, no proof was introduced tending to show that any time or money had been expended by the agents before the revocation.

It follows that, since the contract of agency did not contain an agreement on the part of the principal not to revoke the agents' authority, either party was at liberty to terminate the relationship at will. Since plaintiff proved no services prior to the revocation entitling him to reimbursement, defendant was not liable for compensation under the contract, or for the value of services rendered, and the judgment of nonsuit was proper.

[5, 6] Certain questions put by the court to plaintiff, while appearing as a witness in his own behalf, resulted in the disclosure, upon the plaintiff's case in chief, of facts material to the defense, namely, the facts concerning the revocation of the agents' authority by defendant. By this, plaintiff claims to have been prejudiced. The order, of proof is, in general, in the sound discretion of the court. Code Civ. Proc. § 2042. While departures from prescribed procedure should not be made or countenanced, save for some especial and good reason, still in the present case no harm appears to have resulted from the irregularity complained of, and it does affirmatively appear that counsel for plaintiff was given ample opportunity to, and in fact did, examine the witness after he had answered the questions of the court. Moreover, it is within the power of the court to call or examine witnesses in furtherance of justice against the will of either party. Marin, etc., Co. v. R. R. Comm., 171 Cal. 714, 154 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 114.

[7] By her cross-complaint, defendant Moeller seeks damages for violations of instructions on the part of the agents in procuring Richardson's acceptance of the offer of exchange after the revocation. As between Richardson and Mrs. Moeller, there is no question but that Mrs. Moeller had the right to withdraw her offer at any time before acceptance by Richardson. Consequently if, through the neglect of the agents, Richardson's acceptance was given without notice of the withdrawal of the offer, the agents might be held liable for the resulting damages. There is uncontradicted evidence that Richardson did not accept until the evening of October 20. On October 17 Richardson received notice through his own agent, with whom cross-defendant King had communicated, that Mrs. Moeller was reconsidering her offer. On October 20, before the acceptance, Roth, upon the request of Richardson, took the latter to view the property in question, with the hope that they would come to an understanding. At that time Richardson himself had an interview with Mrs. Moeller, in the presence of plaintiff Roth, wherein Mrs. Moeller stated that she would not trade on the terms previously offered, and the parties were unable to reach any agreement. It was after this conversation that Richardson notified Roth and King of his acceptance of the original offer. The record is barren of evidence showing, or tending to show, that Richardson's attempted acceptance after the revocation was secured by any acts of the agents Roth and King, or that it was the result of anything but Richardson's own reliance upon that term of the proposition which stated that the offer would not be revoked for 10 days as a term which he was entitled to insist upon, regardless of his knowledge of the revocation. Since there was no proof of any misconduct on the part of the agents resulting in damages to cross-complainant Moeller, the judgment in her favor upon the cross-complaint cannot be sustained.

The judgment of nonsuit is affirmed. The judgment in favor of respondent upon her cross-complaint is reversed.

1. Municipal corporations ⟸918(4)—Same ballot boxes, etc., properly used at municipal election and special election under bond act.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 1111–1127, General State Law on Elections, §§ 1203–1205, 1208, 1243, requiring separate ballot boxes only when a general election and an election for municipal officers are held at the same time one record for two elections and the use of the same ballot boxes are permissible, and the same ballot boxes, etc., were properly used at a general municipal election in the city of Los Angeles in combination with which was held a special election pursuant to Municipal Bond Act, § 12¾.

2. Evidence ⟸83(2)—It is presumed that election officials performed duty.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15, there is a presumption that persons appointed to act as election officials at a general municipal election and a special election under the Municipal Bond Act held in conjunction therewith regularly performed their official duty in both elections.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by William Mead against the City of Los Angeles and others, wherein Mary Rideout intervened. From judgment adverse to plaintiff and intervener, they appeal. Judgment affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles (Edgar G. Pratt and Henry M. Willis, both of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant Mead.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., of Los Angeles, for appellant Rideout.

W. B. Mathews, Lewis E. Whitehead, Ray C. Eberhard, and Trent G. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff, William Mead, brings this action as a taxpayer against the city of Los Angeles and its officials to obtain a judgment decreeing a certain bond issue of the city of Los Angeles unauthorized and void and to restrain the city and its officials from issuing said bonds or expending any part of the proceeds thereof. Mary Rideout, also a taxpayer, by permission of the lower court, filed a complaint in intervention, joining with the plaintiff in seeking the same relief. Defendant answered plaintiff's complaint and the complaint in intervention, and the case was tried; the court rendering its decision against the plaintiff and intervener. A judgment was entered decreeing that neither the plaintiff nor intervener take anything by this action. Both plaintiff and intervener have appealed.

The undisputed facts are these: An ordinance was adopted providing for the holding of a general municipal election in the city of Los Angeles on June 3, 1919. An ordinance was also adopted calling a special election to be held in the same city on the same day for the purpose of submitting to the voters the question of the authorization of a $13,500,000 bond issue for raising money to be used in the acquisition of a certain municipal improvement, to wit, works and a distributing system for supplying the city and its inhabitants with electricity for light, heat, and power. The general and special elections were not consolidated and two ballots were furnished to each voter, a general municipal ballot and a special ballot which contained only the bond election proposition. The elections were held on the same day and the election precincts established, the polling places designated, and the election officials appointed were identical in the two elections. In each of the various polling places there were in use for the two elections only one ballot box, one register containing the affidavits of registered voters, one roster of voters, one poll list, one list of assisted voters and one list of challenged voters. In view of the fact that the general and special elections were not consolidated, the failure to provide separate ballot boxes and lists of various kinds to be exclusively used in the special election is claimed by appellants to have constituted a noncompliance with the election laws, which invalidated the special election.

The special election was held pursuant to the Municipal Bond Act (Gen. Laws, 1915, p. 1155, § 12¾), which provides:

"Any election submitting the proposition of incurring indebtedness and the issuance of bonds called pursuant to the provisions of this act, may be held separately, or may be consolidated with any other election authorized by law at which the qualified voters of such city, town, or municipal corporation are entitled to vote. * * *"

There is, therefore, no question as to the validity of the separation of the two elections, nor do appellants question the use of the same polling places and the appointment of the same individuals as election officials in the two elections. The sole contention is that, where two elections are held on the same day, the ballot boxes, rosters of voters, poll lists, lists of assisted voters, and list of challenged voters used in the two elections must be entirely separate and distinct.

In all particulars not recited in the ordinance calling the special election, the abovementioned Municipal Bond Act provides that the election shall be held as provided by law for holding municipal elections in the municipality, and the ordinance calling the special election here in controversy expressly adopted that law as the law governing the holding of that election. Section 202 of the Los Angeles Charter provides:

"All elections shall, except as in this charter otherwise provided, be conducted and held in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the state for the holding of general elections in effect at the time."

Since the city charter does not provide in detail the machinery for conducting elections, we must look to the state laws in effect at the time to determine the proceedings necessary to a valid election.

[1] A perusal of the sections of title 2 of part 3 of the Political Code pertaining to the general state law on elections discloses no such requirements as contended for by appellants. Among other things, these sections require the following at each election: A ballot box in each polling place (Pol. Code, § 1203); that each person desiring to vote shall write his name on a roster of voters, which signatures must be compared by the election officers with the signatures on the register of voters and the number of the ticket given the voter must be written on the register opposite the name of the voter (Pol. Code, § 1204); that, upon the ballot being returned by the voter after voting, the word "voted" shall be written on the register after the name of the person and number of the ballot (Pol. Code, § 1205). Section 1174 of the Political Code requires the boards and clerks of elections to keep poll lists, or lists of the number and names of the persons voting. Section 1208 provides for the keeping of a list of assisted voters, and section 1243 for a list of challenged voters. A complete record of each election in the particulars specified is essential, but nowhere is there any provision that, where two elections are called at the same time, and not consolidated, the records or equipment of one election must be separate and distinct from that of the other, except where a general election and an election of municipal officers are held at the same time. In such a case, section 1203 of the Political Code expressly provides that there shall be a separate ballot box for each election. Here, however, both elections were municipal.

In the present case, complete records of the vote and general proceedings of each election were kept and returned. At each precinct, for example, was a single roster of voters, kept and returned as a part of each election. Surely it cannot be said that such a roster, kept by the election officials for both elections, was kept in one election exclusively. It contained the signatures of those voting at the special election as well as of those voting at the general municipal election, and there is no law determining that such a roster can be a part of only one election and there is no evidence that it pertained more to one election than to the other. It is fully as accurate to say that the roster was returned in connection with the special election as to say that it was returned in connection with the general municipal election. The roster is complete as to each, and not as to any one more than as to the other. The same may be said of the register of voters the poll lists, and the lists of assisted and challenged voters. As the general state law now stands, with the single exception that separate ballot boxes must be used when a general election and an election for municipal officers are held at the same time, one record for two elections and the use of the same ballot boxes are just as permissible as the appointment of the same persons to act in the capacity of election officials or the use of the same polling places in the two elections.

[2] Appellants contend that, by the use of one roster and register, there was danger of fraud for the reason that it was possible for the election officials to deliver only the general municipal ballot to many electors and thus withhold a considerable number of special election ballots. In that event, it is claimed, the election officers could have placed the number of a special election ballot after the names of the voters of the general municipal tickets and voted the ballots themselves, or deposited them as blank ballots. There was no showing of any fraudulent conduct on the part of the election officials. Certain persons were appointed to act as election officials at both the general and special elections and it is presumed that they regularly performed their official duty in both elections. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 15. In the absence of a showing of actual fraud, the argument advanced by appellants amounts to nothing more than an argument for protective legislation, for, as previously stated, the law as it now stands does not require that a record of a given election be preserved wholly distinct and separate from that in any other election. If a complete record has been kept, that is a sufficient compliance with the law, and it is immaterial that that record may also be the record of another election held at the same place and time.

Since, so far as appears from the record in the instant case, the requirements of the law were observed in the holding of the special bond election, it must be held valid, and appellants are, therefore, not entitled to the relief prayed for.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. CLINE, Sheriff. (L. A. 6362, 6662.)

1. Mandamus ⟸73(1) — Proper remedy to compel sheriff to account.

Mandamus is the proper remedy for a county to compel its sheriff to perform his official duty to account for funds received by him in his official capacity in payment for services and supplies furnished by the county to the payer of the funds.

2. Prisons ⟸2—Right of federal government to commit prisoners to state prisons is matter of comity.

The right of the United States to commit prisoners to the jails or prisons of a state is purely a matter of comity extended by the states, and is subject to such demands for compensation as may be determined by contract with the proper authorities.

3. Prisons ⟸18(1)—Sheriff must account for money received from federal government for keeping prisoners.

Under Pen. Code, §§ 1601, 1611, Pol. Code §§ 4290, 4292–4294, Const. art. 11, § 16, and Rev. St. U. S. §§ 5539, 5547 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10523, 10548), all moneys coming into the hands of a sheriff from the United States for the support of federal prisoners must be paid over and accounted for by him to the county treasurer; the sheriff being allowed to put in his claim to the county for expenses incurred for support of such prisoners in the same manner and at the same rates as for prisoners committed by the state.

4. Prisons ⟸18(1) — County supervisors may contract for care of federal prisoners.

Under Pol. Code, §§ 4000–4003, 4041, it is the function of the board of supervisors as the constituted business agents of the county, and not of the sheriff, to contract with the federal authorities as to the compensation to be demanded for federal prisoners while confined in the county jail, and such compensation may include not only the expense of feeding the prisoners, but a just charge for all other supplies and services incident to maintaining and guarding them.

5. Prisons ⟸18(8) — Sheriff must keep account of expenses of caring for prisoners.

It is the duty of the sheriff to keep an accurate account of all expenses incurred by him in caring for prisoners in his charge.

6. Estoppel ⟸62(3)—County held barred by laches from requiring accounting by sheriff of money received for federal prisoners.

Where for many years the county authorities knowingly permitted the sheriff to deal with the money received from the federal government for care of its prisoners as a personal matter without accounting, the county was estopped as to past transactions by its laches from requiring the sheriff to pay the full amount received into the county treasury and then resort to his claim against the county for reimbursement, but, if necessary for his protection, the sheriff should be permitted to retain and apply as money advanced by him all amounts shown to have been legitimately expended by him in support of the federal prisoners prior to the commencement of the county's action against him to compel an accounting.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Two proceedings in mandamus by the County of Los Angeles against John C. Cline, sheriff of said county. From judgments dismissing the petition in the one case and denying peremptory writ in the other case, petitioner appeals. Judgment reversed.

A. J. Hill, Hugh Gordon, and Paul Vallee, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gesner Williams, Milton M. Cohen, and George E. Cryer, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The record here includes two appeals presenting substantially the same issue in each. The proceedings are in mandamus to require the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles to account for and pay into the county treasury money received by him from the United States for the support of federal prisoners confined in the county jail.

[1] If the contention of the petitioner is correct that this money was received by the sheriff in his official capacity in payment for services and supplies to be furnished the federal government by the county of Los Angeles, mandamus is the proper remedy to compel a performance of the official duty to properly account for such funds. It is the contention of the respondent, however, that in receiving and maintaining federal prisoners in the county jail, the sheriff is acting for and as the agent of the United States, and is not accountable to the county for money received for the support of such prisoners.

We think an examination and comparison of the state and federal statutes relating to the matter makes it sufficiently clear that this contention cannot be upheld. The following sections of the Penal Code of California and of the United States Revised Statutes practically cover the law on the subject.

Section 1601 of the Penal Code makes it one of the official duties of the sheriff as a state officer to receive and keep federal prisoners committed to the jail, where provision is made by the United States for their support. Section 1611 of the Penal Code requires the sheriff to receive all prisoners committed by competent authority and directs him to provide them with food, clothing, and bedding, for which he shall be allowed a reasonable compensation to be determined by the board of supervisors, and to be paid out of the county treasury, "except as provided in the next section" (which exception has no application to the matter involved here).

Section 5539 of the federal statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 10523) provides that all United States criminals imprisoned in state jails or prisons "shall in all respects be subject to the same discipline and treatment as convicts sentenced by the courts of the state in which such jail * * * is situated, and while so confined * * * shall be exclusively under the control of the officers having charge of the same under the laws of such state." Under section 5547 of the federal statutes (U. S. Comp. St. § 10548) it is directed that the Attorney General "shall contract with the managers or proper authorities having control of such prisoners, for [their] imprisonment, subsistence, and proper employment."

The only reasonable deduction from these interrelated provisions of the state and federal laws is that federal prisoners are to be received under the same conditions and subject to the same jurisdiction and control as state prisoners, and are to be fed and provided for in the same manner by the sheriff, subject to contract between the Attorney General and the county authorities for compensation to the county for their maintenance.

[2] It is difficult to understand how the practice has been established and recognized of making this support of federal prisoners merely a matter of personal contract between the sheriff and federal authorities for the payment of a per diem rate for feeding the prisoners, while all the other outlay for jail room, guards, beds, and bedding, heat, light, cooking, laundry, and other service is furnished by the county without remuneration. The right of the United States to commit prisoners to the jails or prisons of a state is purely a matter of comity extended by the states and is subject to such demands for compensation as may be determined by contract with the proper authorities. Ex parte Shores (D. C.) 195 Fed. 627.

It is admitted in the record that during all the period covered by these mandamus proceedings there has been paid to the sheriff for the support of federal prisoners in the Los Angeles jail 35 cents per day for each prisoner, and that for the total period under the first proceeding, No. 6362, from January 4, 1915, to and including March 31, 1918, the amount so received was $11,230.96, and for the period covered by the second proceeding, No. 6662, from April 1, 1918, to August 19, 1919, the amount was $4,091.15.

It is conceded that no part of this money has been accounted for or paid over to the county of Los Angeles, but it is alleged to have been entirely expended by the sheriff in furnishing meals to the federal prisoners.

During a portion of the time involved in these transactions the sheriff of the county of Los Angeles has been entitled to a salary of $4,000 per annum, and for the remainder of the time to a salary of $6,000 per annum; and whether, under the Code or the charter of Los Angeles county, the law has been that the salary so allowed should be in "full compensation for all services of every kind and description" rendered by virtue of his office. Moreover, under the law already cited and the further provisions of section 4290 of the Political Code, it is evident that in boarding federal prisoners the sheriff is subject to the same rules and limitations as are prescribed for prisoners of the state of California. Section 4290 of the Political Code provides that the supervisors shall allow to the sheriff his necessary expenses for boarding prisoners in the county jail, providing that the board of supervisors shall fix a reasonable price at which such prisoners shall be boarded, which price, since the amendment of 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1323), is not to be less than 12 cents for each meal for each person. It appears that the board of supervisors fixed the price of boarding prisoners in the county jail prior to the amendment at 8 cents, and since at 12 cents per meal.

It is also made the duty of all officers by constitutional provision and statutory enactment to immediately turn over to the treasurer or other legal depositary all moneys collected for the use of any county, city or town or other public or municipal corporation. Const. art. 11, § 16; Pol. Code, §§ 4292–4294.

[3, 4] We are of the opinion that all moneys coming into the hands of the sheriff for the support of federal prisoners is for the use of the county, and that it was and is the duty of the sheriff to account for and pay over to the county treasurer all money so received by him, and to put in his claim to the county for expenses incurred for support of federal prisoners in the same manner and at the same rates as for prisoners committed by the state of California, and that it is the function of the board of supervisors, as the constituted business agents of the county, to contract with the federal authorities as to the compensation to be demanded for caring for federal prisoners while confined in the county jail. It is entirely obvious that such compensation may not only include the expense of feeding the prisoners, but a just charge for all other supplies and services incident to maintaining and guarding them. Neither is it reasonable to suppose that the law on this subject is to be construed as making the sheriff the officer of the county to negotiate a contract of this kind involving compensation for so extensive a service by the county. Avery v. Pima County, 7 Ariz. 26, 60 Pac. 702; Pol. Code, §§ 4000–4003, 4041.

[5] It is also clearly the duty of the sheriff to keep an accurate account of all expenses so incurred by him in caring for prisoners in his charge. It is held in San Francisco v. Mulcrevy, 15 Cal. App. 11, 113 Pac. 339, and County of Alameda v. Cook, 32 Cal. App. 165, 162 Pac. 405, that the services performed by a county clerk under the federal naturalization laws are performed as an officer of the state, and that the fees allowed such clerk must be accounted for to the county. If such is the law in a matter so purely one of federal jurisdiction as that of naturalization of aliens, how much more clearly must it appear that the sheriff is acting as an officer of and in behalf of the county in extending the hospitality of the county jail to federal prisoners.

In Board of Freeholders v. Kaiser, 75 N. J. Law, 9, 69 Atl. 25, the New Jersey court was dealing with the precise question presented here, under a statute substantially like our own. The court there says:

"Section 33 of the act governing sheriffs * * * makes it the duty of the sheriff of every county to receive all persons committed to his custody by the authority of the United States. He takes them into his custody as sheriff; he remains responsible for them as sheriff, and all moneys paid to him on their account are paid to him as, and received by him as, sheriff. This being so, moneys paid to him by the federal government in excess of what was needed for the food and care of federal prisoners were paid to him as compensation for services rendered and duties performed with relation to them as sheriff, and the salary provided by the act of 1905 is in lieu of such compensation."

Our statutes go farther than this. Having provided a complete scheme for compensating the sheriff by county appropriations for the board and maintenance of all prisoners committed to the county jail, it becomes the duty of the sheriff to account to the treasurer for all moneys received from the government for its prisoners, and to present his claim to the county for his remuneration, just as in the case of prisoners committed by the state courts. It does not follow that, if the federal authorities see fit to stipulate and provide for a more liberal allowance than 12 cents per meal and two meals per day for each of its prisoners, the supervisors may not authorize such special expenditure. But as the laws stands 12 cents per meal and two meals a day is the allowance authorized by the supervisors for each prisoner. The allowance of 35 cents per day was the entire amount paid by the United States for the maintenance of its prisoners in the county jail. In the absence of express authority to do so, the sheriff surely is not at liberty to expend this entire allowance for meals supplied the prisoners. According to the respondent's own averments, he has expended the whole amount of 35 cents per day for their food alone, leaving all other items of cost to the county unprovided for. Even if he had the right to retain in his own hands the money necessary to feed the prisoners, he has made unauthorized use of 11 cents a day per prisoner.

The burden is upon the respondent to satisfactorily account for the money received by him from the federal authorities and to show that it has been disposed of according to law.

In case No. 6362, which was tried on its merits, there is a failure of the trial court to find what disposition was made of the sum received from the United States. The finding is "that some part, if not all, of the sum of $11,230.96 paid to the respondent by the United States for the support of prisoners committed under authority of the United States and imprisoned in the county jail was expended and actually paid out by respondent for such purposes." This is not a finding at all as to the disposition of any specific part of this fund. Respondent is chargeable with all of it, and the burden is upon him to show that he expended it legitimately and to satisfactorily show in accordance with the rules governing the accounting of trustees (Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 99 Pac. 172) what amounts, up to the legal rate, have been expended in the feeding of federal prisoners. Any balance not so accounted for he should be required to pay to the county treasurer.

The conclusion of the trial court from the facts is that the petitioner is not entitled to have the writ of mandate issue, inasmuch as it would be inequitable to do so, and judgment was given denying the writ.

Under the views of the law herein expressed the judgment will have to be reversed.

We agree with the conclusion of the court, however, as to the inequity of such an application of the law under the circumstances shown in evidence as would deprive the respondent of compensation for feeding the federal prisoners within the amount per day which he was authorized to expend.

The system followed of permitting the sheriff of the county to deal with this fund as a personal matter and without keeping any accounts or making any returns to the county has gone on through successive incumbencies of the sheriff's office for many years. The county authorities have been aware of the condition, and have, in effect, consented to it, and are as much to blame for a misconception and misinterpretation of the law as is the sheriff.

[6] While this mutual misconception of the law cannot relieve the sheriff from liability to account for all the money so received which is justly due the county after crediting him with amounts legally expended, we are of the opinion that the county is estopped as to past transactions by its own laches from requiring respondent to pay the full amount received into the county treasury, and then resort to his claim against the county for reimbursement. If necessary for his protection, he should be permitted to retain and apply as money advanced by him all amounts shown to have been legitimately expended by him in support of the federal prisoners in his charge, prior to the commencement of this action.

In the second proceeding, case No. 6662, the petition for writ of mandate was dismissed upon sustaining of respondent's demurrer to the petition as not stating a cause of action. This ruling on the demurrer and order of dismissal was erroneous.

On the grounds set out in the foregoing opinion the judgment in each case is reversed.

PACIFIC WOOD & COAL CO. v. OSWALD et al. (L. A. 6422.)

Appeal and error ⊂=1011(1)—Findings of the trial court on conflicting evidence held conclusive on appeal.

In an action on a public contractor's bond for materials and supplies furnished a subcontractor, held that there was such material conflict in the evidence as to the amount of supplies furnished that the appellate court would not disturb the findings of the trial court in defendant's favor.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Wood & Coal Company against George H. Oswald and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene Daney and E. H. Lamme, both of San Diego, for appellant.

Charles C. Crouch and Crouch & Chambers, all of San Diego, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This action was brought by plaintiff to recover for materials and supplies alleged to have been furnished to one Jesse Knight, a subcontractor upon a street grading contract, and alleged to have been furnished and used in connection with the work contracted for. The original contract was between the county of San Diego and George H. Oswald, and a certain portion of the work, namely, the grading and surfacing of a number of streets in road district No. 2 of the county of San Diego, in Normal Heights, a subdivision just outside of the city of San Diego, was sublet by the original contractor to the defendant Jesse Knight. In connection with the execution of the original contract the statutory bond was given, securing the payment for all labor, materials and supplies "furnished for or used in connection with said work." The bond was executed by defendants George Oswald, as principal, and John G. Althouse, Tillie M. Althouse, J. M. Oswald, and N. C. Oswald, as sureties. The action is against the sureties on this bond and against the subcontractor, Jesse Knight. The supplies and materials for which recovery is sought consist chiefly of hay and grain alleged to have been used in feeding the horses and mules, and coal for operating machinery and for camp uses, on the contract. The liability of the sureties on the bond for supplies of this nature used in prosecuting the work was sustained in a former appeal in this action. Pacific Wood & Coal Co. v. Oswald et al., 179 Cal. 712, 178 Pac. 854. The items for which recovery is claimed cover a period of nearly two years from October 1, 1912, and aggregate the sum of $16,812.77, with payments credited of $12,348.80, leaving a balance for which judgment was demanded of $4,463.97. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the defendants.

The controversy on the appeal centers on the following finding of the trial court. The court finds:

"That during the progress of the said work the plaintiff sold and delivered to the said Jesse Knight for use upon said work, hay, grain and supplies at the agreed price and of the reasonable value of $702.83 and no more. The court finds, however, that all of the materials sold and delivered or sold or delivered or furnished to the said Jesse Knight by plaintiff for use upon the said work, had been fully paid for by the said Jesse Knight prior to the commencement of this action."

It does not seem to be seriously controverted that the plaintiff sold and delivered substantially all of the supplies included in this action to Jesse Knight within the period specified. The dispute is as to the sufficiency of the proof that any greater amount or value than that found by the court was furnished for or used in connection with this contract.

The evidence on this point is certainly very confusing and unsatisfactory. It is conceded that Jesse Knight during this period of time was carrying on in his own name several other similar grading contracts in and about the city of San Diego, and was obtaining supplies of the same kind as charged in this account from the plaintiff for use on all of these contracts. Besides these personal ventures, he was engaged in other grading contracts in association with one or more partners, as "Jesse Knight & Co.," to which partnership the plaintiff also furnished like supplies.

Some pains seem to have been taken by plaintiff in its bookkeeping to segregate the personal accounts of Jesse Knight from those of the Jesse Knight Company, but as between the various personal contracts of Jesse Knight there is very little to determine to what account the larger number of the items are properly chargeable. The statement of the account as set out in Exhibit A, attached to the complaint, sets forth the entire itemized claim sued on under a charge to "Jesse Knight, as subcontractor under George H. Oswald for certain work in road improvement district No. 2, San Diego County, Cal."; but when we turn to the record of the original entries from plaintiff's books they do not satisfactorily show the items as charged to this account. The exhibits from plaintiff's ledger account show the charges variously to "Jesse Knight, Grape & Artic," "Jesse Knight, Spreckels Building, Grape & Artic," "Jesse Knight, Grape & Artic, Coral," "Jesse Knight (Spreckels Bldg) R. D. 2–98 K.," "Jesse Knight R. D. 2, 98 K," "Jesse Knight, Good Springs, Nevada."

From October 1, 1912, the beginning of the account sued on, the items in the ledger are charged to the address Grape and Artic streets, to the date February 24, 1913. From March 1, 1913, to June 21, 1913, they are charged to "Jesse Knight (Spreckels Building). R. D. 2, 98K," and from June 24, 1913, to February 28, 1914, to "Jesse Knight, R. D. No. 2, 98 K." From the latter date to August 13, 1914, the charge is made to "Jesse Knight, Good Springs, Nevada." The letters and figures, "R. D. 2," refer to road district No. 2 of San Diego county, and this Normal Heights contract is shown to have been in that district. But Jesse Knight appears to have been carrying on other contracts in this vicinity during the same period, some of which, at least, were in this district, and others were operated in the same neighborhood and from the same grading camp that served the Normal Heights job.

Practically all these various jobs which Jesse Knight was conducting in this vicinity and in widely separated sections of the city of San Diego required the same class of supplies charged to the account of this contract. It sufficiently appears that no supplies or materials furnished were used in furtherance of this contract excepting such as were finally delivered to the contractor's camp at Normal Heights, and defendants claim that much of the material delivered at this camp was for the use of other jobs.

There are certain items in this account initialed on the ledgers with the letters "N. H." The testimony on behalf of plaintiff is that these letters denote Normal Heights, and that they were entered from time to time, after the goods were bought and charged, by plaintiff's general manager, in the process of checking up the various items with Jesse Knight, and by his authority. But Knight creates a conflict on this point by denying such ratification. In fact, plaintiff's books are of little evidentiary value excepting as showing the general state of Jesse Knight's account with plaintiff without regard to any particular contract.

But even where the book account on its face shows items charged to the Normal Heights job, it furnishes but one element of the necessary proof to establish the liability of the sureties on the contractor's bond. Conceding that it is not required of plaintiff to show by direct evidence that every sack of barley, bale of hay, or load of coal furnished actually went into the furtherance of this contract, it is at least essential to show that it was furnished and delivered on the job for that use. Here, again, the proof seriously fails.

The evidence relating to deliveries traces very little of these supplies to the Normal Heights job. It is claimed by respondent, and we are unable to discover that such is not the fact, that the actual delivery to this job of any greater amount of supplies than as found by the trial court is not shown by the evidence. Plaintiff's witnesses do testify to certain deliveries which they actually followed to the grounds. But in most instances the goods were either called for and hauled away from plaintiff's warehouses by Knight's teams, or were delivered for his use at other points than the Normal Heights headquarters.

The state of the evidence on this point most favorable to the plaintiff company is that of its manager, Mr. Akerman. The uncertainty and indefiniteness of this proof is shown by some of his testimony. He says:

"It was all delivered to the Normal Heights job or to Jesse Knight or his order, or to his teams at our warehouse yard. Once a month, I had a settlement with Jesse Knight and when that settlement was made and the account O. K.'d I would at the end of this month make a mark of some kind to indicate we had checked up the account and it was O. K.'d up to that date. * * * It was by his checks that all these statements were made. You must remember he had four or five jobs on at that time. He had one at Point Loma. I think there were two at Point Loma. He had one at Grape and Arctic. He had one at Ninth and C. He had one up near the reservoir, and then the Normal Heights job, and I think there were other smaller jobs at the same time, and he had a big feed corral down at Ninth, and I where he kept at times as high as 100 mules. We delivered a good deal of stuff at Ninth and I, to go to all the jobs. * * * The bulk of these supplies was taken from Fourth and K streets, but we also had a warehouse at Fifth and University, some of it went from there, and I think we drew some from Twenty-Sixth and Logan; we have a warehouse there. * * * In some cases we delivered the grain, in other cases he hauled it away. In some cases we would sell in cars, and he would come and unload them and haul them to the various jobs. * * * I know this, that we would get the order to deliver so many sacks of grain for a certain job, and deliver it to Normal Heights, if he was busy, or deliver it to Grape or Juniper or Point Loma, or he would say, 'I will come and call for it; or put it on my wagon and I will haul it myself.' Every kind of delivery conceivable was made during the time we were working on those jobs and selling Jesse Knight these goods. The only thing we have to show where any of these goods were delivered are the entries on our books and my knowledge of checking up with Jesse Knight on these various jobs. The tickets were all checked up monthly with Jesse Knight, and after they were checked up for the various jobs the tickets were destroyed."

There was much more testimony by Mr. Akerman, but to the same effect.

It is apparent that plaintiff relies principally for the accuracy of its charges to the Normal Heights job upon the alleged checking up of these accounts from month to month with Jesse Knight. This might, prima facie, be sufficient but for the fact that Jesse Knight testifies that he did not check up these accounts with plaintiff, or designate the items chargeable to the Normal Heights contract. He had testified regarding these matters substantially as follows:

"I did not instruct Mr. Akerman about the 15th of October, 1912, to charge all feed after that date to the Normal Heights job. I don't think he knew when I took it really. It was just one continuous account. I have never been out of his debt since I have been in the country that I know of. * * * I paid for all the stuff that I used on Normal Heights and more too. * * * I generally made the deliveries of the grain I bought from the plaintiff myself. The grain at Normal Heights I sent my own truck for and that which was delivered over there and used there. Q. Did you go down once a month and have statements checked up with Mr. Akerman and tell him this was to go there, and that was to go there, and so forth. A. No. We did not do that. It was just a running account. I would get it there when I could, and pay him when I could and it was just a running account all the time."

On cross-examination of Jesse Knight by plaintiff's attorney this testimony was elicited:

"Q. Is it a fact that you and Mr. Akerman, say on an average of once a month, met and went over your different statements and tags and distributed them to the particular account to which they belonged. A. No, sir. I never had time for that. Neither did he.

"Q. Didn't you meet about once a month and determine where the different items belonged. A. No, sir. What have I a bookkeeper for? I never bothered with that kind of stuff.

"Q. Did you ever go down to his place of business? A. Yes, sir, I have been there hundreds of times.

"Q. Did you at any time while you were there discuss your account? A. Yes, sir; we used to get the gloves on occasionally and go round and round.

"Q. Did you go over the items of the various accounts? A. No, sir. Not in detail. We never went into that. It was a general proposition. He thought the load was getting too heavy, and I knew it was. * * *

"Q. Did you ever know that Mr. Akerman or his company was attempting to keep separate accounts of the different jobs, of what went in from their place to the different jobs? A. Oh, no; they couldn't do that. They didn't know when I took a job and when I didn't. We had Jesse Knight Company and Jesse Knight, that is all."

While the testimony of Jesse Knight was quite as vague and uncertain in many particulars as that of the plaintiff's witnesses, and there was much to weaken the force of his testimony, it was sufficient to raise a substantial conflict as to the alleged method of segregating the items on the various contracts, and we are not at liberty to question the findings of the trial court based on such evidence. Moreover, there were many inaccuracies in the items of account as shown on the books charged to the account sued on. Throughout the account numerous charges occur of coal in considerable quantities for use in a steam shovel, whereas the only steam shovel on this job was an oil burner. In further illustration, a charge of January 21, 1913, for 19 bales of alfalfa was posted from a blotter entry which was marked "9th and I chg. Evans." February 5, 1913, 20 sacks white oats marked "9th and I. Chg. & paid by J. Spragel." There are some 35 or 40 of these charges aggregating hundreds of dollars, which respondent apparently has shown to have been delivered to other accounts than the one sued on.

This, with the other matters pointed out, further discredit plaintiff's evidence, and we think justify the court in rejecting all items not explicity shown to have been delivered for consumption on this contract.

We are not prepared to question the finding of the court that only items to the value of $702.83 were specifically traced for use on this job, so far as evidence of their sale and delivery for that purpose is affirmatively shown.

It was admitted by Jesse Knight that a large proportion of all the supplies for his horses and mules used on the Normal Heights contract was furnished by the plaintiff company, and this must have run into thousands of dollars in value. But the evidence also shows that thousands of dollars were paid on account.

The witness Granger, who was financing Knight on this contract, testified that he watched the job very closely, and knew where the grain was delivered and knew when the bills were rendered and put up the money for them, and that along the latter part he would not allow Knight to give a check unless he O. K.'d it, and that he gave checks for this grain and O. K.'d them. Summing the matter up, he testified:

"I put up the money and Jesse Knight made the checks and I O. K.'d them for this grain that was furnished by Mr. Akerman, I remember that."

The plaintiff credits defendants with payments on account of supplies furnished for use on this contract in the sum of $12,348.80. It may be conceded, therefore, that supplies to that amount were actually furnished and used. In order to recover anything in this action the plaintiff must furnish satisfactory proof that it sold and delivered to the use of this special contract supplies in excess of that amount. In view of the finding of the trial court that it can trace under the evidence materials only to the value of $702.83 to this job, and that "all of the materials sold or delivered or furnished to Jesse Knight by plaintiff for use upon the said work had been fully paid for," and the admitted payments exceeding $12,000, and with the general declarations of defendants' witnesses that all payments for such supplies had been made, we find ourselves unable, under the record here, to find proof of an unsatisfied balance on this account.

It may be conceded that the same degree of certainty in tracing the materials furnished into the actual application to the work under the contract is not required or perhaps possible under the law governing this class of contracts as would be required in the case of mechanics' liens, where the materials furnished enter into and become part of the structure.

Here, the sureties became liable for materials and supplies which contributed to the carrying on of the work. Feed furnished to the contractor's mules and horses used in prosecuting the work would be chargeable to this account, though delivered and used miles from the actual scene of operations. But it is incumbent upon the plaintiff to satisfactorily prove that all of the materials charged were delivered and used, or, at least, contracted for the promotion of this specific job, and although it is clearly established that some of the items of this account were so contracted and used, and it is apparent from the admissions of defendants that much more of the materials than were specifically traced to the job were actually received and used, it would be purely a conjecture to find that there had been materials furnished in excess of those covered by the credited payments.

This is one of the class of cases peculiarly difficult to review from the printed transcript. The trial court was in a much better position to unravel the intricacies of this confused account than this court can possibly be, and in view of the substantial conflict in the vital point in this controversy, as to the identification of the items properly chargeable to the defendants, we cannot disturb the conclusions of the court that there is nothing due the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed.

RIDEOUT v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (two cases). (L. A. 6499, 6500.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 31, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 28, 1921.)

1. Elections ⟹166 — General ballot requirements apply to ballots at special municipal election on propositions.

Under Gen. Laws 1915, No. 2371, p. 1151, and Los Angeles Charter, § 2, subd. 4, and sections 199, 202, requiring municipal elections to be held in accordance with the provisions of the state laws, the ballots at special municipal elections to vote on propositions submitted to the electors, as well as those containing names of candidates, must be marked "Municipal Ticket" and contain the instructions to voters, as required by Pol. Code, § 1197, subds. 6, 10, 11.

2. Elections ⟹291—Must be held valid unless plainly illegal.

In election contests, it is the duty of the court to validate the election, if possible, and it must be held valid unless plainly illegal.

3. Elections ⟹271—Departure from directory provision invalidates only if injurious.

While a violation of a mandatory provision regarding elections vitiates the election, a departure from a directory provision does not render it void, if there is a substantial compliance with the requirements and no showing that the result was changed or the rights of the electors affected by the deviation.

4. Elections ⟹271—Requirement not going to merits of elections is directory.

A provision, the observance of which is not expressly declared to be essential to the validity of the election, is mandatory if the act enjoined goes to the substance or necessarily affects the merits or results of the election; otherwise it is directory.

5. Elections ⟹186(1)—Requirement of printing "Municipal Ticket" on back of ballot is directory.

The requirement of Pol. Code, § 1197, that the words "Municipal Ticket" shall be printed on the back of the ballot, was intended primarily for the convenience of the election officials, in view of section 1257, requiring the canvass of general tickets to be completed before that of municipal tickets, and is directory, not mandatory.

6. Elections ⟹189—Proportion of space allotted to instructions on ticket submitting propositions held not to invalidate ballot.

The fact that the space allotted to instructions to voters on a special municipal ticket submitting propositions was greater than that in the sample ballot contained in Pol. Code, § 1197, does not invalidate the ballot, where it appeared that the question submitted was printed in full and in type not unreasonably small.

7. Elections ⟹186(1) — Noncompliance with directory provisions which prevent electors' expression of wills is fatal.

Though the requirements not observed in the printing of ballots were directory, the election cannot stand if the departure therefrom was of such nature that it precluded a considerable number of electors from expressing their wills at the polls, thus preventing a free and fair election.

8. Elections ⟹291—Burden is on contestant to prove defective ballots invalidated.

Where the violations of the directory provisions regarding the form of ballots were not so gross or radical as to give rise to a presumption of unfairness, the burden is on one contesting the result of the election to prove the unfairness claimed to have resulted.

9. Elections ⟹295(1)—Evidence held not to support finding defects in ballots affecting result.

In proceedings to annul a special city election on propositions submitted to the voters, evidence that more than enough ballots to have changed the result were voted blank or not voted by those who cast ballots at the general election held at the same time, and that some of the voters stated they thought the special ballots were samples, does not show that the form of instructions to voters or the omission of the words "Municipal Ticket" from the back of the ballots affected the result.

10. Appeal and error ⟹996—Inferences supported by evidence and not contrary to experience cannot be disturbed.

An inference by the trial court supported by the evidence, and not opposed to human experience and reason, cannot be disturbed by an appellate court, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1958, 1960.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Two actions by Mary Rideout, plaintiff, against the City of Los Angeles and others, to annul special municipal elections. Judgments for defendants in each case, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Edgar G. Pratt, of Los Angeles (Henry M. Willis, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Charles S. Burnell, W. B. Mathews, Lewis E. Whitehead, Ray C. Eberhard, and Trent G. Anderson, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The two above-entitled cases are taxpayers' actions in the nature of equity proceedings to annul two special municipal elections held in the city of Los Angeles on June 3, 1919, and practically take the form of election contests. Gibson v. Board of Supervisors, 80 Cal. 359, 22 Pac. 225. Being identical in nature and in points raised, the two cases were consolidated for trial. The present appeals are taken by plaintiff from judgments in favor of defendants.

At the special election attacked in the first above-entitled case, the question submitted to the voters involved the authorization of the issuance of bonds to the amount of $13,500,000, for the purpose of raising money to be expended partly in constructing and acquiring works for supplying the city with electricity for light, heat, and power, and partly in purchasing an electric distributing system; the proposition presented at the special election assailed in the second case was that of selling to the Southern California Edison Company, for a period not exceeding 15 years, surplus electric energy which said city might generate in excess of its own requirements, and also of supplying the city of Pasadena with such surplus energy. These two special elections were called and held at the same time, with the same precincts and polling places, as the general municipal election of the city of Los Angeles, and the same individuals acted as officials in all three elections. No consolidation of the elections was effected, however, and separate ballots were used in the three elections. Both propositions submitted at the special elections received the required two-thirds affirmative vote, the results, as ascertained upon a recount, being as follows: Bond election, 46,462 in favor and 21,270 against, or 1,308 in excess of the requisite two-thirds; power sale election, 43,679 in favor and 21,246 against, or 397 more than the required two-thirds.

[1] Alleged defects in the form of the ballots are the reasons assigned by appellant for the attempt to obtain the annulment of the special elections. According to the provisions of the Municipal Improvement Act, pursuant to which the bond election was held, that election was governed, in all particulars not recited in the ordinance calling the election, by the law covering and controlling the holding of municipal elections in the municipality. Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1151. The power sale election was held pursuant to the charter of Los Angeles (Charter of City of Los Angeles, § 2, subd. 4), and was likewise subject to the laws governing the holding of municipal elections. The ordinance calling the elections also expressly stated that the provisions for holding municipal elections applied. The charter of the municipality in question provides that all elections, except as otherwise provided in the charter, shall be "conducted and held in accordance with the provisions of the laws of the state for the holding of general elections in effect at the time." Charter of City of Los Angeles, §§ 199, 202. The form of the special election ballots here under consideration was therefore prescribed by section 1197 of the Political Code, which comprises the general law of the state upon the subject.

The omission to print the words "Municipal Ticket" on the back of these ballots and the heaviness of the type and size of the space occupied by the printed instructions to voters are the particulars wherein the special election ballots are claimed to have been defective. Subdivision 6 of section 1197 of the Political Code provides that—

> "All ballots printed by the clerks, registrars of voters or secretary of a legislative body of any incorporated city or town, shall have printed in the same manner [i. e., below the stub and immediately at the left of the center of the ballot, in 18-point gothic capitals], on the back, the words 'Municipal Ticket.'"

Subdivision 10 of the same section provides for the printing on the ballot of certain directions, under the caption "Instructions to Voters," and subdivision 11 provides, "except as to the order of the names of candidates, the ballots shall be printed substantially in one of the following forms," followed by the form, in which the instructions to voters covers a smaller proportion of the face of the ballot than in the present case. These particular provisions of the section must be interpreted as applicable to municipal ballots presenting propositions to be voted upon as well as to municipal ballots containing names of candidates. That such is the interpretation necessarily to be accorded these provisions is made evident by the generality of the language as well as by the fact that ballots presenting propositions are, by several subdivisions, expressly brought within the operation of the section.

[2, 3] It is appellant's contention that the fact that the ballots in controversy varied in the particulars stated from the prescribed statutory form in and of itself invalidated the election. It is a primary principle of law as applied to election contests that it is the duty of the court to validate the election if possible; that is to say, the election must be held valid unless plainly illegal. People v. Prewett, 124 Cal. 7, 56 Pac. 619; State v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of Hudson County, 35 N. J. Law, 269, 277. Accordingly, a distinction has been developed between mandatory and directory provisions in election laws; a violation of a mandatory provision vitiates the election, whereas a departure from a directory provision does not render the election void if there is a substantial observance of the law and no showing that the result of the election has been changed or the rights of the voters injuriously affected by the deviation. Russell v. McDowell, 83 Cal. 70, 23 Pac. 183; Tebbe v. Smith, 108 Cal. 101, 41 Pac. 454, 29 L. R. A. 673, 49 Am. St. Rep. 68.

[4] Whether or not a provision, the observance of which is not expressly declared by law to be essential to the validity of the election, is mandatory or merely directory, depends upon the character of the act prescribed. If the act enjoined goes to the substance or necessarily affects the merits or results of the election, it is mandatory; otherwise directory. Murphy v. San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444; Dennen v. Jastro, 23 Cal. App. 264, 137 Pac. 1069; Parvin v. Wimberg, 130 Ind. 561, 30 N. E. 790, 15 L. R. A. 775, 30 Am. St. Rep. 254. Provisions prescribing minor details in regard to the form of ballots are held to be in a large measure directory, in so far as the voter is concerned, upon the theory that, where there are errors on the part of those intrusted with the preparation of ballots, the disenfranchisement of voters for these violations of the law over which they have no control would result in defeating the will of the people by technicalities, unless it appears that the mistakes in fact operated to prevent a free, fair and honest election. Dennen v. Jastro, supra; Miller v. Pennoyer, 23 Or. 364, 31 Pac. 830; Olson v. City of Lemmon, 33 S. D. 380, 146 N. W. 592; McCrary on Elections, § 538. It has been held that violations of statutes prescribing the dimensions of the ballots and the character of type and color of ink to be used in printing them do not, in themselves, render the election void, and an election was held valid where, in violation of the provisions of the election law, the marks on the face of the ballots were discernible on the back thereof, owing to insufficient thickness of the paper. Kirk v. Rhoads, 46 Cal. 398; Short v. Gouger (Tex. Civ. App.) 130 S. W. 267. An erroneous omission to print on the ballots instructions for voting a straight ticket and the erroneous designation of an office on the ballot as "councilman" instead of "trustee" were held not to invalidate the election. Jones v. State, 153 Ind. 440, 55 N. E. 229.

[5] There is no proof of fraudulent intent on the part of the officials having charge of the printing of the ballots in the instant case, and the deficiencies in the ballots under consideration were no more vital than in the instances enumerated. Section 1197 of the Political Code requires that the form prescribed must be "substantially" followed. The words "Municipal Ticket" on the back of the ballot are intended primarily for the convenience of the election officials. Section 1257 of the Political Code provides that—

> "At all elections where a general ticket and a municipal ticket are used, the canvass of the general ticket shall be completed before the canvass of the municipal ticket is commenced."

Clearly, the indorsements "General Ticket" and "Municipal Ticket" called for by section 1197 of the Political Code are designed to enable the election boards to distinguish and separate general and municipal tickets from a mere inspection of the backs of the ballots. In this case all three ballots were municipal ballots.

[6] Considering the other alleged defect, the law does not specify the size of type to be used in the printed instructions to voters; it merely provides a form in which the instructions are allotted a certain space. It is claimed by appellant that the instructions on the special election ballots should have covered no greater space in proportion to the face of the ballot than they did in the prescribed form. Conceding this to be the case, nevertheless the variance in question did not alter the form in which the propositions to be voted upon were submitted to the voters, for there was neither a diminution in the number of words nor an unreasonable small size of type in the printing of the propositions; the words "yes" and "no" were printed to the right of the proposition in large type, followed by ample space for the marks of the voters. Nothing of substance, either as to content or arrangement, was omitted or materially changed, and the ballots must therefore be pronounced adequate.

[7] However, while ballots which fail to comply with directory provisions may fulfill legal requirements in the sense that they are not lacking in fundamentals, it may still be true that the departure from the directory provisions was of such a nature that it precluded a considerable number of electors or voters from expressing their will at the polls, thus preventing a free and fair election. If the defects in the ballots actually produced that result, the elections cannot stand. Tebbe v. Smith, supra; Dennen v. Jastro, supra. Appellant claims that the violations in the instant case were the direct cause of confusing a considerable number of electors so that they refrained from voting.

[8, 9] We do not think the violations of the directory provisions were so gross or radical as to give rise to a presumption of unfairness. Atkinson v. Lorbeer, 111 Cal. 419, 44 Pac. 162. The burden was therefore upon appellant to prove the unfairness claimed to have resulted. Dennen v. Jastro, supra; Taylor v. Taylor, 10 Minn. 107 (Gil. 81). It was stipulated that, in the returns, there were 6,673 blank ballots in the bond election and 9,316 blank ballots in the power sale election, which had been deposited in the ballot boxes. In the bond election returns 180 ballots were missing, while 199 ballots were missing in the sale election returns. Appellant introduced as witnesses election officials from 75 precincts, who testified concerning the conduct of the voters at the elections. It was thereupon stipulated that appellant was prepared to call officials from 450 additional precincts, whose testimony would be of the same character as that already given. Briefly stated, this testimony was to the effect that, in each precinct, several voters attempted to leave their special election ballots in the booths, throw them on the floor, or carry them away. When they were discovered doing so, the election officials asked for the ballots, whereupon some declared that they thought the ballots in question were sample ballots or instructions how to vote. Plaintiff claims thus to have proved that the blank and missing ballots, which were sufficient in number to have turned the election, were the result of the failure of the electors to understand that they were ballots. There was, however, considerable testimony to the effect that, after being informed that the papers were ballots containing propositions to be voted upon, the electors displayed indifference, either by stating that they did not care to bother with the special elections, or by failing to take time to do so. In this connection there is a further fact to be considered. The general municipal ballot, voted at the same time as the special election ballots, contained one proposition in addition to the names of candidates. This proposition concerned the incurring of a bonded indebtedness to raise money to be expended for sewer purposes. No confusion is claimed to have affected the voting on this proposition, yet the vote was as follows: 47,084 in favor, 17,612 against, total 64,696, which is less than the number of ballots voted at either of the special elections.

[10] Furthermore, still considering the question of confusion, there was no direct evidence that the defects in the ballots complained of were the cause of the misunderstanding of some of the electors. As previously stated, three ballots were delivered to each voter, the general municipal ticket, approximately 13 by 14 inches, and the two special election ballots, one yellow and the other blue, each about 4½ by 7 inches. Appellant merely proved statements of some electors to the effect that they thought the special election ballots were sample ballots or instructions to voters. This oversight might very likely have been due to the fact that each voter was given three ballots instead of one and to the difference in the size of the ballots, the electors in question carelessly assuming that all voting was to be done on the large ballot. At any rate, it is clearly apparent that carelessness in neglecting to read the ballots handed them was an actively contributing cause of the mistakes of many voters. From the facts proved the trial court evidently drew the inference that the claimed defects in the form of the ballots were a negligible factor, and that the real reasons for the blank and missing ballots in the special election returns were indifference and carelessness, combined with misunderstanding arising from the fact that the three elections were not consolidated, necessitating the use of more than one ballot. Such an inference was supported by the evidence. It is not opposed to human experience and reason, and therefore it cannot be disturbed by an appellate court. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1958, 1960. It follows that the conclusion of the trial court that plaintiff is entitled to no relief in this action must be upheld.

1. Partnership ⊂=64—Statutes requiring filing of certificate held not to apply to firm without place of business in state.

Civ. Code, §§ 2466–2472, requiring filing with the clerk of a county of certificates stating the names in full of all members of a partnership doing business under a fictitious name, etc., do not apply to persons carrying on business in another state without a place of business in California, and merely buying commodities in wholesale lots in California for delivery to them on board cars in the state; the orders being sent by mail or telegram to the California sellers.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by John S. Moon and others against Albert G. Martin and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

George E. Farrand and Leonard B. Slosson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Ben F. Gray, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The object of this action was to recover damages on account of the failure and refusal of the defendants to deliver to plaintiffs two carloads of beans, in the performance of an agreement for the sale and delivery thereof by the defendants to the plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs were partners doing business under the firm name of Moon-Taylor Company. They carried on their business in the city of Lynchburg, in the state of Virginia. The contracts for the sale of the two carloads of beans aforesaid were made in the month of May, 1916, by letters and telegrams through the mail and over the wires, passing between the plaintiffs in Lynchburg, Va., and the defendants in Los Angeles, Cal. The plaintiffs had no place of business in California, and, so far as appears from the evidence, they did not carry on any business here with any other persons except the defendants, and that business consisted of occasionally buying beans from them in carload lots, to be shipped from California to Lynchburg, Va. This had been going on for about 18 months prior to May, 1916. The business was all conducted by correspondence. None of the plaintiffs ever personally appeared in California, except that at one time one of them, happening to be in California, bought one carload, not however either of the carloads in question here.

The defendants admitted the making of the contract, but denied that the damages for the refusal to perform it were equal to the amount demanded in the complaint. As a further defense they alleged that the plaintiffs were copartners and were doing business under the firm name of Moon-Taylor Company in the state of California at all the times involved in this action, and that they had not, nor had any one for them, ever filed with the clerk of any county in the state a certificate stating the names in full of all the members of the partnership; nor had they, or any one for them, published such certificate at any time in any newspaper in any county in the state, as required by section 2466 of the Civil Code.

The court below found that these allegations of the answer relating to the filing of the certificate were true, and that said name, "Moon-Taylor Company," is fictitious and does not disclose the names of the persons interested as partners in the business; that the plaintiffs had carried on the business of buying beans and other commodities in wholesale lots in the state of California under said partnership name for more than a year prior to May, 1916, such commodities so bought to be delivered to them on board cars in the state of California. Thereupon judgment was given and entered for the defendants, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

[1] We are of the opinion that the provisions of sections 2466 to 2472, inclusive of the Civil Code, do not apply to persons carrying on business in the manner disclosed by the evidence in this case. The plaintiffs had no place of business in this state. They did not come here to do any business. The transactions in question were carried on by correspondence as above stated. The business simply consisted of orders, sent by mail or telegram to the defendants and accepted by them, for the shipment of beans to be delivered to plaintiffs on the railroad somewhere in California for shipment to them at Lynchburg. We think this does not come within the scope of section 2466. That section provides that "every partnership transacting business in this state under a fictitious name, or a designation not showing the names of the persons interested as partners in such business, must file with the clerk of the county in which his or its principal place of business is situated, a certificate, stating" the names in full of all the members of the partnership and their places of residence. The certificate must also be published in a newspaper, if there be one in the county, and, if not, then in a newspaper in an adjoining county. This language clearly implies that the partnership so transacting business and required to make the certificate is a partnership having a place of business in some county in the state. Otherwise there would be no significance in the requirement that the certificate must be filed with the clerk of the county in which "its principal place of business is situated." We cannot conceive that it was intended to apply to persons who, being engaged in interstate commerce in a distant state, send orders by mail from that state to persons in this state for the shipment of goods to them at stated prices. It is true that in a certain sense the business it transacted in this state, it being held, as a matter of law, that the person so sending the letter thereby makes the mail carrier his agent to deliver the letter to the addressee. Also, when he directs goods bought by him to be delivered for him on board cars in California, he makes the carrier his agent to transport the goods from California to his home place of business, and in such cases and in some kinds of actions it is frequently held that the contracts are made in this state. It has also been held that the making of a contract is a business transaction and constitutes, in some instances and for some purposes, a doing of business, or, as section 2466 puts it "transacting business." But all this can take place without the persons concerned having a place of business in the ordinary sense of the word in the state or in the county where the transaction occurs. We know of no decisions upon this point with respect to partnerships, but it has frequently been decided with respect to corporations that the purchase of property in one state by a corporation having its place of business in another state, to be shipped to the place of its domicile from the state in which it is purchased, does not constitute doing business in the latter state. Jameson v. Simonds Saw Co., 2 Cal. App. 582, 84 Pac. 289; Commonwealth v. Standard Oil Co., 101 Pa. 148; Parsons, etc., Co. v. Stuart, 182 Fed. 779, 105 C. C. A. 211; Groneweg v. Estes, 139 Mo. App. 36, 119 S. W. 513; Dover L. Co. v. Whitcomb, 54 Mont. 141, 168 Pac. 947. We are unable to perceive any distinction between a corporation and a partnership with respect to this question. If the corporation is not doing business when it makes a sale in this manner without entering the state for any purpose except through the mails, clearly a partnership is not doing so. The language of section 2466, as we have stated, clearly implies that it was intended to apply only to partnerships having "a local habitation" or a "principal place of business" situated in this state.

[2] It was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in Sioux Remedy Co. v. Cope, 235 U. S. 197, 35 Sup. Ct. 57, 59 L. Ed. 193, that a provision of the laws of South Dakota requiring all corporations of other states transacting business within the state to file in the office of the secretary of state a copy of its articles of incorporation, and providing that no action should be commenced or maintained in any court of the state by such corporation on any contract or transaction made in the state by such corporation unless it should have filed said articles with the secretary of state and should have appointed a resident agent upon whom process could be served, and filed a copy of said appointment in the office of the secretary of state and in the recorder's office in the county where the agent resided, was an illegal restriction upon interstate commerce which the state had no power to make. The court said that a state has power to make reasonable police regulations for the government of foreign corporations doing business in the state, calculated to protect and promote the health, safety, morals, and welfare of its people, and thereupon it proceeded to say:

"We think that when a corporation goes into a state other than that of its origin to collect, according to the usual or prevailing methods, the purchase price of merchandise which it has lawfully sold therein in interstate commerce, it is there for a legitimate purpose of such commerce, and that the state cannot, consistently with the limitation arising from the commerce clause, obstruct or hamper the attainment of that purpose."

Thereupon it held that the provisions we have stated making the maintenance of an action in the state conditional upon the filing of the articles of incorporation and appointment of an agent as aforesaid were invalid and void so far as actions to enforce contracts made in interstate commerce are concerned. If such conditions are an unreasonable burden on interstate commerce carried on by a corporation, they would be equally so where the interstate commerce was carried on by a partnership. This subject is one for consideration and decision of the courts of the United States. We are not concerned to consider whether the decision is or is not correct, for the state courts are bound by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States on questions depending upon the construction of the United States Constitution. Under the principle of this decision, the plaintiffs could maintain this action without filing or publishing a certificate, even if our Code should declare that they could not do so.

It follows that the court below erred in holding that the plaintiffs could not maintain the action under the circumstances stated.

The judgment is reversed.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CALIFORNIA IN AND FOR TUOLUMNE COUNTY et al. (L. A. 6492.)

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 27, 1921.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(6)—Stipulation extending time for bringing case to trial does not defeat right to dismissal after expiration.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, requiring dismissal of an action not brought to trial within five years after the answer was filed except where the parties stipulated that the time might be extended, a stipulation extending for one year the time within which the action must be brought to trial does not bar defendant's right to a dismissal under that section after the expiration of the time so extended.

2. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜45—Statute for dismissal for nonprosecution is one of public policy.

The fact that Code Civ. Proc. § 583, requiring dismissal of actions not brought to trial within five years after answer, is, to an extent, one of public policy as well as of private concern to the litigants, affords the occasion for inserting therein the provision for extended time by stipulation, since, if the rights of the parties only were affected, they could enlarge or curtail the operation of the statute by stipulation at their pleasure, under Code Civ. Proc. § 3513.

3. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(6)—Stipulation held merely to postpone right to dismissal for nonprosecution.

A stipulation postponing the time for trial for one year, and providing that no part of that year should be considered should any question arise concerning the failure to prosecute, merely extends the time within which plaintiff must bring the action to trial under Code Civ. Proc. § 583, but does not waive defendant's right to dismissal for failure to prosecute within the time so extended.

4. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(6)—Stipulation postponing trial does not extend time for dismissal.

A stipulation merely postponing the time of trial for a specified period does not thereby extend the period of five years after answer, within which the case must be brought to trial to avoid dismissal under Code Civ. Proc. § 583.

5. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(6)—Stipulation for 90-day notice before setting cause for trial does not extend time for dismissal.

In a stipulation postponing the trial of an action for one year and providing that such time shall not be considered in determining plaintiff's failure to prosecute, a provision that the action can be brought to trial only after 90 days' notice to the opposite party does not extend the period within which the plaintiff must bring the action to trial to avoid dismissal.

6. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜50—Conferences and negotiations held not to waive defendant's right to dismissal for nonprosecution.

Conferences and negotiations between the parties to an action after the answer was filed relative to the place of trial and the judge before whom it was to be tried, with tentative suggestions for settlement, in none of which defendant indicated an intention not to rely on his right to a dismissal for plaintiff's failure to prosecute, but by stipulation extending the time within which the action must be brought to trial, indicated an intention to rely on his right of dismissal, do not defeat defendant's rights to a dismissal on the expiration of the extended time.

7. Dismissal and nonsuit ⊜60(1)—Importance of action or equities do not warrant denial of dismissal for nonprosecution.

The right of defendant to a dismissal of the action for failure to bring it to trial within the time fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 583, as extended by stipulation, is not affected by the importance of the action nor by the equities of the parties on the merits.

Original application for a writ of mandamus by the City of Los Angeles against the Superior Court of California, in and for the County of Tuolumne, and the Judge thereof, to require the entry of dismissal of an action by the Inyo Development Company against the City of Los Angeles pending in that court. Peremptory writ issued.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., of Los Angeles, W. B. Mathews, of Los Angeles, W. A. Lamar, of Independence, Rowan Hardin, of Sonora, and S. B. Robinson, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

William M. Abbott, William M. Cannon, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

SLOANE, J. This proceeding involves the construction and interpretation of section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires the dismissal of an action on motion of the defendant, or on the court's own motion, if not brought to trial within five years after answer is filed.

The matter is before this court on petition for a writ of mandate to require the superior court of Tuolumne county and the judge thereof to enter an order of dismissal in the case of Inyo Development Co. v. The City of Los Angeles, pending in that court. The action was begun July 19, 1913, and was brought to enjoin the city of Los Angeles from diverting the waters of the Owens river from their natural channel, to the alleged detriment of plaintiff's prior rights.

Although there is some controversy as to the date of the filing of the answer of defendant, it satisfactorily appears that such answer was filed on or about the 17th of November, 1913. The action was never brought to trial, and on or about the 21st day of November, 1919, over six years after answer was filed, the defendant served its notice of motion for a dismissal. On the hearing of the motion the court made its order denying the application, and thereafter defendant filed its petition in this court for the issuance of the writ which is the subject of this hearing.

Section 583 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads as follows:

"The court may in its discretion dismiss any action for want of prosecution on motion of the defendant and after due notice to the plaintiff, whenever plaintiff has failed for two years after answer filed to bring such action to trial. Any action heretofore or hereafter commenced shall be dismissed by the court in which the same shall have been commenced or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant, after due notice to plaintiff or by the court on its own motion, unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer, except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

The principal contention arises upon the interpretation of the last clause of the section, wherein the requirement for a dismissal after five years is qualified by the words, "except where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time may be extended."

Respondents insist upon a literal and restricted interpretation of the clause quoted as meaning that if there has been an extension of time by written stipulation, whether for a day or a year, whether expressly limited or general in its terms, that the mandatory force of the provision is forever waived and nullified.

In this case there was a stipulation which resulted in an extension of the five year limitation.

The case had been set for trial on the application of the defendant for the 4th day of October, 1915, nearly two years after the filing of the answer. A continuance was demanded by the plaintiff, which was opposed by the defendant on the ground, among others, that there were important witnesses who could not be obtained again for many months if the trial was postponed. A continuance for one year was finally agreed to, however, under the following stipulation, signed by both parties:

"It is hereby stipulated by and between the plaintiff and the defendant, the City of Los Angeles, that the above-entitled cause shall not be tried prior to one year from the date hereof unless by the mutual consent of the parties hereto, and that at least ninety days' notice of the time set for the trial of said cause shall be given by the party moving for the setting of said cause, to the other party hereto.

"It is further understood that the said period of one year from the date hereof, during which the said cause shall not be tried, is consented to by both parties hereto; that the said plaintiff shall not be held to have failed to prosecute said cause during the said year, and that no part of the said year shall be considered should any question arise in said cause concerning the prosecution thereof."

There is nothing in the first paragraph of this stipulation postponing the trial for one year and requiring a notice of ninety days upon resetting the case for trial, which affects the operation of the statute. It would have still been incumbent upon the plaintiff to bring the matter to trial within the five-year period. The parties evidently recognized this fact and for plaintiff's protection the second clause was added, providing that the year covered by this postponement should not be taken into account if any question thereafter arose as to the due prosecution of the cause.

This provision was not an express stipulation that the time for trial might be extended beyond the five-year period. Defendant was still at liberty, after a reasonable space of time, at least beyond the year's continuance, to move the court for a dismissal under the discretionary power of the court to dismiss after two years for want of prosecution under the first provision of section 583; but it did have the further effect of eliminating the year covered by the stipulation from consideration if application for dismissal should be made under either clause of the Code section. It might still be questioned, however, if we are to insist upon a strict and literal interpretation of the statute, if this can be construed as a stipulation or consent that the bringing of the cause to trial could be postponed beyond the five years' limit. It merely effected an estoppel upon the defendant to count the period of this continuance as part of the time limit of the Code provision.

But conceding that the stipulation is within the exception of the Code section, and is an express stipulation in writing that the time in which to bring the cause to trial may be extended beyond the statutory limit, we cannot agree with respondents that the mandatory force of the statute is destroyed thereby. Its operation is merely postponed. It is clear that such was the intention of the parties. This express agreement that the year of continuance should not be counted was an implied notice that the right to rely upon the statute should not be otherwise impaired.

[1] Respondents' position goes to the extent of holding that an express agreement which would extend the time within which to bring a cause to trial beyond the five years for "one day and no more" would be a complete waiver of all right to a dismissal under this section for all future time. We think the requirement means that such dismissal "shall be granted unless such action is brought to trial within five years after the defendant has filed his answer," except where, pursuant to a stipulation of the parties, a different limit has been fixed. It would be a strange situation if a defendant who had the right under this section of the Code to a peremptory dismissal of the action against him could not give the plaintiff a few days of grace and at the same time reserve his right to insist upon such dismissal if the stipulated conditions were broken.

This exception was not intended to detract anything from the mandatory force of the statute. The provision was made for the benefit of both the courts and litigants. The court may exercise the power of dismissal on its own motion, but the right is given to the parties to extend the period, providing it is done by a written stipulation. The very word "extended" negatives the idea of termination or abrogation. The statute fixes the limitation at five years, the parties, by written agreement, may extend this period for a day, a month, or a year, which is the most that can be said for the stipulation in this case.

[2] Were it not for the fact that this enactment to prevent unlimited postponement of trials is to an extent one of public policy as well as of private concern to the litigants, there would have been no occasion for providing permission for an extension of the time by stipulation of the parties. Ordinarily, in matters affecting only the rights of the parties they are at liberty to enlarge or curtail the operation of the statute by stipulation at their pleasure. Civil Code, § 3513.

[3] And no one would think of construing a stipulation extending the time of a party to plead or serve notice, or to perform any other act, as a waiver of the right to its enforcement beyond the time expressly stipulated. None of the decisions cited by respondents covers the point raised here. Perhaps the nearest expression on the subject is in Larkin v. Superior Court, 171 Cal. 719, 154 Pac. 841, Ann. Cas. 1917D, 670, where the court was dealing with fixing dates of trial, extending time to plead, consenting to continuances and the like, all within the five years' period, and which the court holds not to constitute an extension of the statutory period for bringing the cause to trial. In that opinion the court uses the following language:

"A stipulation in terms waiving the benefit of this section, or one in terms providing that the time fixed by the section within which trial must be had, shall be extended indefinitely or for a definite time, or a series of stipulations continuing the trial to a date beyond the five-year period, might any of them suffice as an answer to a motion to dismiss, and constitute a stipulation in writing that the time (the five-year period) shall be extended."

This expression was outside the issues before the court, but it correctly states the law. Just what happened in the instant case was a stipulation not to take into account the period of the one year's postponement of the trial, in the consideration of any motion to dismiss for want of prosecution. Its effect was to postpone for a definite period of one year the time when defendant could avail itself of the right to this mandatory provision, and it was not until the expiration of six years, a full five years without taking into account the year covered by the stipulation, that the motion here sought to be enforced was made.

Johnston v. Baker, 167 Cal. 260, 139 Pac. 86, merely holds that the provision of section 583, authorizing the court in its discretion to dismiss an action for failure to bring to trial within two years, impliedly denies the power to exercise such discretion within a less period. Pistolesi v. Superior Court, 26 Cal. App. 403, 147 Pac. 104, and Long v. Superior Court, 31 Cal. App. 34, 159 Pac. 734, were both on motions to dismiss after appeal from justices' courts on questions of both law and fact where the cases had been brought to trial and tried in the lower court after answer filed. In the former of these cases one ground of denial of the writ arose through the inadvertent misinterpretation of the court of the provision that the action shall be dismissed "by the court in which the same shall have been commenced, or to which it may be transferred on motion of the defendant." The words "on motion of the defendant" were misapplied as referring to a transfer from one court to another on motion of the defendant, whereas the reference is to a dismissal on motion of the defendant, as obviously appears from the context. In Hickman v. Lynch, 27 Cal. App. 354, 149 Pac. 997, some 2½ years after the answer was filed, permission was granted defendant to file a cross-complaint. The court held that for this reason "it appears that the case at bar was not fully and finally at issue for five years, but only for a period of three years."

[4] Respondents call special attention to the decision in Nathan v. Dierssen, 164 Cal. 607, 130 Pac. 12, as being decisive in their favor. There is nothing on the face of that opinion to indicate the grounds upon which the order denying dismissal was sustained. The only comment made in the decision on appeal is that there was ample evidence to justify the court in holding that stipulations extending the time for bringing the action to trial had been made.

If it may be inferred from the record on that appeal that the court was of the opinion that mere written extensions of the time of trial during and not extending beyond the five-year period were stipulations within the meaning of section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, operating to prolong or extinguish the time within which an order of dismissal should be made, in the absence of conditions creating an estoppel, such opinion is overruled by the decision of this court in bank, in the case of Larkin v. Superior Court, supra.

In the absence of such express stipulation or equitable estoppel, the rule as laid down in Larkin v. Superior Court, is that no such extension of time can be inferred, from a stipulation fixing a trial date or granting continuances for periods within the five years, under circumstances which do not preclude the plaintiff from bringing the cause to trial within the prescribed time, notwithstanding such stipulated delay. As is said in that opinion:

"There is nothing in this that can fairly be taken as indicating any consent on the part of the defendants that the five-year period shall be extended by as much as a single minute, or as intimating to plaintiff that any such extension would be permitted. It is a stipulation in writing extending the five-year period that the statute provides for, and without such a stipulation, certainly in the absence of some element of estoppel, there can be no effective answer to a motion to dismiss."

For the reasons we have stated there is no merit in any of respondents' objections to the issuance of a peremptory writ of mandate, which are based upon the stipulation here considered.

It is true that the effect of the limitation in section 583, Code of Civil Procedure, on the five-year period of dismissal under the exception "where the parties have stipulated in writing that the time be extended" might well have been more fully expressed in the statute; but in view of the nature and purpose of the enactment there can be no reasonable question that this exception clearly implies that the extension referred to is only such as is covered by the stipulation. Whatever is necessarily implied in a statute is as much a part of it as that which is expressed and the statute must be construed with reference to the purpose to be served by it. Johnston v. Baker, supra; Bailey v. State, 163 Ind. 165, 71 N. E. 655.

"When the intention of a statute is plainly discernible from its provisions, that intention is as obligatory as the letter of the statute and will even prevail over the strict letter." 25 R. C. L. 968; Pickett v. U. S., 216 U. S. 456, 30 Sup. Ct. 265, 54 L. Ed. 566; State ex rel. Husting v. Board of Canvassers, 159 Wis. 216, 150 N. W. 542, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 159; Pool v. Simmons, 134 Cal. 621, 66 Pac. 872.

[5] The provision contained in the stipulation for a continuance of October 4, 1915, that at least 90 days' notice shall be given of the resetting of the cause for trial, did not operate in any way to extend the running of the five-year period. The plaintiff was at liberty to have the trial set for the day after the stipulated year of continuance had expired, and could have served notice thereof at any time within 90 days of such date. It had no more right to have a continuous extension of its time in which to bring the case to trial under this 90 days' stipulation than it would have had under the 5-day notice required by statute. It is true that under this stipulation for 90 days' notice there would have been no date within 90 days of the expiration of the 5-year period for bringing the cause to trial when it could have been set without the consent of defendant, but that was one of the contingencies arising under the stipulation that plaintiff was bound to provide against. No such attempt to set for trial was made, but it could not have extended plaintiff's rights in the premises if it had been made and opposed by defendant.

There are a number of other circumstances arising out of the proceedings in this case, which respondents contend should operate to establish waiver or estoppel of the defendant in pressing this motion for dismissal, which we do not deem it necessary to discuss separately. They are all based upon the nature and importance of the issues involved in the action, the delay in determining the court in which the action should be tried, and the judge who should preside at the trial, demands and agreements for continuances, negotiations for stipulations as to uncontested facts, correspondence and conferences with a view to reaching a settlement out of court.

[6] We, of course, are not concerned with the matters involved or the time that elapsed prior to the filing of the answer, as the five years only began to run from that date. After the answer, proceedings were had on the application of the defendant for procuring a trial before another judge, as the superior judge of Inyo county, where the action was commenced, was disqualified, and after negotiations between the parties it was in the early part of May, 1915, stipulated that the cause be transferred to the superior court of the county of Tuolumne. On application of defendant thereafter the trial was set for October 4, 1915. A postponement was then had at the instance of plaintiff for one year under the stipulation herein discussed. No further move was made towards again setting the date for trial until in November, 1918. In the early part of December, 1918, the new date of trial was agreed upon between the parties as of March 10, 1919. Discussion was had as to whether the trial should be held in Tuolumne county, or for the convenience of witnesses in the county of Inyo. Plaintiff claims that at the time of agreeing upon the date for trial it was orally stipulated that there might be further postponement at the instance of either party. Later, at the request of plaintiff, the order setting the cause for trial on March 10th was vacated. So far as we are able to discover from the record, no further effort was made to bring the matter to trial, although the notice of motion to dismiss was not filed until the 21st of November, 1919. During all the pendency of the action there was correspondence and conferences regarding preliminaries to the trial, and tentative attempts to settle the case out of court; but accepting as true the facts as stated in respondents' answer and affidavits, we fail to find any intimation by word or conduct that suggests a concession on the part of defendant or an understanding on the part of plaintiff that defendant might not avail itself of the provisions of section 583. Indeed, the express stipulation of the parties, taking the period of the one year's continuance from the statutory period, shows a reservation at that time of all rights under the statute except as modified by the stipulation.

[7] Counsel for respondent urge upon our attention the importance of this case to the plaintiffs, and both sides discuss at some length their respective equities on the merits; but these are considerations we cannot take into account. The question before us is on the construction of this statute, and we cannot make it over to fit the exigencies of this particular litigation. It is a salutary law and mandatory in its requirements. It can seldom happen that any good excuse exists in delaying trial of a cause for five years.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed for.

PARKER v. FUNK. (L. A. 6555.)

1. Sales ⊂=476—Buyer in possession of part only held not in default.

Where a conditional sales contract of a truck not delivered recited receipt of the truck by the buyer, who later took possession of a part of the truck, his obligation to pay was subject to the implied condition of a full delivery, and he was not in default until delivery or a request by the seller to be allowed to attach the undelivered part to the part in the buyer's possession.

2. Sales ⊂=475—Seller's assignee took only the rights of the seller in conditional sales contract.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 368, the assignee of the seller in a conditional sales contract took the contract and the title to the thing sold subject to any rights existing in favor of the buyer against the seller.

3. Estoppel ⟸78(2)—Purchaser's conditional contract held not an estoppel as against seller's assignee.

A conditional sales contract of a truck acknowledging receipt by the buyer when a part was not delivered did not constitute estoppel by contract precluding him from showing the fact of nondelivery as against an assignee of the seller; Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subdiv. 2, permitting dispute of recital of consideration.

4. Estoppel ⟸97—Recitals in sales contract held not an estoppel in pais as against seller's assignee.

Recital in conditional sales contract that seller had received the goods was not an estoppel in pais precluding him from disputing the recital as to his seller's assignee, not being intended as a representation on which a third person might rely.

5. Estoppel ⟸52—In pais is founded on doctrine that the truth would defraud.

The doctrine of estoppel in pais proceeds on the theory that the party estopped has by his declaration or conduct misled another to his prejudice, so that it would be a fraud on such other to allow the true facts to be proved.

6. Assignments ⟸100—Debtor may as against assignee assert existing equities not conforming to face of contract.

A party to a contract may assert as against the assignee of the other party any right which he could assert against the other party, regardless of whether such right conforms to the face of the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Replevin by Edward F. Parker against B. E. Funk. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. S. Parker, of Pasadena, for appellant.

J. R. Whittemore, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. The present action is one of replevin for the possession of an automobile truck. Pending its determination, the plaintiff secured possession of a part of the truck, which was all the defendant had, upon a claim for delivery pursuant to sections 509 to 521 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action was tried and resulted in a judgment that the plaintiff take nothing and that he either return the part of which he had secured possession or the defendant recover of him the value thereof, $300. The plaintiff appeals.

The facts are:

One Moon was engaged in the business of making automobile trucks by taking the front part of a Ford automobile with its engine and attaching to it what is known as an Ameston truck unit. The defendant was an automobile salesman and desired to purchase a truck for demonstration purposes. Moon had in his garage or place of business the front part that was necessary to make a truck, but without the Ameston unit attached. Under these circumstances, Moon and the defendant entered into a conditional sales contract, whereby the defendant agreed to purchase "One Ameston truck unit and Ford automobile, motor No. 1757717 ——— body ——— with complete equipment. Serial No. ———," for the price of $900, of which he paid $300 down and agreed to pay the balance in monthly installments of $50 each. The Ford automobile motor designated by the number quoted was the one owned by Moon, so that it was specified as a part of the subject of the sale. Whether there was any truck unit that was also agreed upon as the remaining part does not appear. Although the Ford part and the truck unit had not been attached and it was evidently intended that they should be before the subject-matter of the sale was complete, and although there was no actual delivery of anything to the defendant, the contract contains an acknowledgment by him of the receipt of "said property," which is described as quoted, and that it was in good condition and repair. The contract also contains the usual provision as to title remaining in the vendor until the purchase price should be fully paid, and that in case of a failure to pay any installment of the price as it became due the vendor should have the right to retake possession without demand.

Immediately upon the making of the contract, Moon, for a valuable consideration, assigned it and the title to the property specified in it to the plaintiff. A few days thereafter Moon's garage and the property in it, including the Ford automobile part, were attached by his creditors. The defendant thereupon secured possession of the part from the sheriff upon a third party claim. After securing such possession, he failed to make further payments on the purchase price, the truck not being complete, and because of his failure in this respect the plaintiff endeavored by the present action to secure possession of the part which the defendant had.

The position of the defendant, as might be surmised from the foregoing facts, is that he wants either a complete truck, for which he is willing to pay the agreed purchase price, or else the return of what he has already paid, and that until he receives either one or the other he is entitled to keep as much of the truck as he has secured. The position of the plaintiff, on the other hand, is that the completion of the truck is no concern of his; that he purchased the contract of sale from Moon in reliance upon the acknowledgment of the defendant, which it contained, that he had received the subject of the sale in good condition and repair; that it is not open to the defendant to show that the subject of the sale was not in fact complete; and that the defendant is in default on the purchase price and the plaintiff is therefore entitled under the contract provisions to whatever of the truck that was to be the defendant has.

The merits of the controversy can best be gotten at by considering the case in the first instance as if it were one between Moon, the original vendor, and the defendant, and then considering to what extent, if at all, the rights of the plaintiff, the assignee of Moon, differ from those of Moon. As between Moon and the defendant, the acknowledgment or recital of the contract that the latter has possession of the subject of the sale can be given effect only by considering that the making of the contract was a constructive delivery of the truck or its parts by Moon to the defendant, so that thereafter Moon's actual possession was that of a bailee or agent for the defendant. On the other hand, reading the contract in the light of the circumstances under which it was made, it is evident that the parties contemplated that Moon should complete the truck, and that the contract was subject to the implied condition that he do so. We have, then, a case of a conditional sale of an uncompleted article, with possession of the parts of the article, or of such of the parts as had been specifically agreed upon, constructively in the vendee but actually in the vendor, and with an obligation on the part of the vendor constituting an implied condition of the contract that he should complete the thing called for by the contract.

[1] In this condition of affairs, the parts, or some of them, are taken from the possession of the vendor under process against him, and the defendant then claims and secures from the attaching officer one of such parts. It is evident that the actual possession so obtained by the defendant is a lawful possession as between him and his vendor, since as between them the part had been, in legal contemplation, in the possession of the defendant at the time the sheriff seized it; the actual possession by the vendor being but a possession held for the defendant. It is also evident that the defendant is entitled to hold such possession until he is in default under the contract for the nonpayment of some installment of the purchase price as it becomes due. It is also evident that while the contract specifies the installments of the purchase price as falling due on certain fixed dates, the vendee's obligation to pay is subject to the implied condition that the vendor complete the machine, and as long as the vendor is in default in completing it he cannot insist that the vendee pay anything further. If the vendor had requested possession of the part which the vendee had for the purpose of performing his obligation to complete the truck, the vendee would have had to give it to him or, at least, would have had to make the part available to him for that purpose, but the vendee could not be put in default in this respect until such request was made. None was made and until it was, and was refused and the vendor thereby prevented by the vendee from assembling the machine, the latter was not in default in failing to make further payments on the purchase price. As a consequence, the vendor would not have had the right, by reason of the vendee's failure to make such payments, to retake possession of the part which the defendant had. The fact was that defendant was not as yet in default.

[2-4] Is the situation any different as to the actual plaintiff, the vendor's assignee? It is not different unless there be some element of estoppel as between him and the defendant. As an assignee merely, the plaintiff but stepped into the vendor's shoes and took the contract and the title to the article specified in it subject to any rights which existed in favor of the defendant against the vendor. Section 368, Code Civ. Proc. The final question in the case, then, upon the merits, is as to the validity of the plaintiff's contention that because of the defendant's acknowledgment in the contract that he had received the subject of the sale in good condition and repair he is estopped as to the plaintiff from showing that the subject-matter was not in fact complete, with the consequence that the defendant's obligation to pay was not absolute as it appeared on the face of the contract, but was conditional on the subject-matter being completed. The contention is a somewhat novel one, and practically no assistance in determining the correct answer to it is given us by the briefs, which, in effect, but affirm the contention on the one side and deny it on the other. It is, however, fairly certain that the contention is not valid. There is no estoppel by contract, since the acknowledgment of the receipt of the article is in effect but an acknowledgment of the receipt of the consideration received by the defendant for the contract, and it is always open to a party to dispute the recital of a consideration. Section 1962, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc. If there be an estoppel, it must be one in pais, arising from considering the recital in the contract as a misrepresentation by the defendant in effect made to and acted upon by the plaintiff.

[5, 6] The doctrine of estoppel in pais proceeds upon the theory that the party estopped has by his declarations or conduct misled another to his prejudice, so that it would be a fraud upon the latter to allow the true state of facts to be proved. Martin v. Zellerbach, 38 Cal. 300, 99 Am. Dec. 365. It follows that the representation must be one intended by the party making it to be acted upon by the other, or made under such circumstances that the other had the right to believe that it was so intended, since otherwise there is no fraud, nor anything in the nature of fraud. 16 Cyc. 726, 749; Boggs v. Merced Mining Co., 14 Cal. 367; Smith v. Penny, 44 Cal. 161; Breeze v. Brooks, 97 Cal. 72, 31 Pac. 742, 22 L. R. A. 257. Now, a recital in a contract is not ordinarily intended as a representation to be acted on by third persons. Its sole purpose is to make plain, or affect in some manner, the rights of the parties as between themselves alone. The result is that a party to a contract may assert as against an assignee of the other party any right which he could assert against the latter, regardless of whether such right conforms or does not conform to the face of the contract. Rauer v. Fay, 110 Cal. 361, 42 Pac. 902. As a particular instance of this, it is permitted to show as against the assignee of a contract, even one reciting a consideration, either that there was no consideration or that the consideration has failed. Bergson v. Builders' Ins. Co., 38 Cal. 541; Meyer v. Weber, 133 Cal. 681, 65 Pac. 1110; Briggs v. Crawford, 162 Cal. 124, 121 Pac. 381; Crawfis v. Edwards, 178 Cal. 805, 175 Pac. 410. The present case would seem to be of just this character.

It is, of course, not difficult to imagine a case where a recital is put into a contract for the very purpose of having it acted on. For example, conditional sales contracts of automobiles are largely dealt in by way of sale and assignment, and if it appeared in the present case that the defendant had acknowledged the receipt of the subject of the sale prior to his actually having received it, in order that his vendor might the more easily realize upon the contract, or even under circumstances such that he should have known that some one in reliance upon the recital would not improbably purchase the contract as one for the sale of a completed and delivered article, he would undoubtedly be estopped from showing the contrary. Fugate v. Hansford's Exrs., 3 Litt. (Ky.) 262; National, etc., Co. v. Sherwood, 165 Cal. 1, 130 Pac. 881. It is not at all impossible that such was the fact, but if it was, it devolved upon the plaintiff to prove it, and there is no evidence upon the point. It follows that the plaintiff stands in the shoes of his assignor, and as to him, as well, the defendant was not in default in refusing to make further payments until the article which he was to receive was completed.

Judgment affirmed.

HODGE et al. v. McCALL et al. (L. A. 6199.)

1. Public lands ⊂=128 — Person patenting lands by mistake holds legal title in trust for person entitled to patent.

If through a mistake of law on the part of officials of the Department of the Interior a patent to land to which one person is entitled under the public land laws erroneously issues to another, the latter will be held by the courts to hold the legal title received from the government in trust for him who should have received it.

2. Constitutional law ⊂=77 — Regulations of government departments cannot enlarge or impair right given by statute.

The function of government department regulations is to carry out the purpose of the statutes for whose administration they are adopted, and they must be reasonable and appropriate for this purpose, and cannot either enlarge or impair rights given by the statute.

3. Statutes ⊂=219 — Construction put upon doubtful statute by administering officers given weight.

Construction put upon ambiguous statute by administrative officers should be given great weight by the courts in determining its true meaning, but if its meaning is not doubtful, and regulations of a government department are in conflict with that meaning, they are simply void.

4. Public lands ⊂=33 — Statutes ⊂=49 — Statute giving preferred right to enter land to be applied where possible; impossibility of universal application does not destroy it.

Act Cong. March 3, 1909, providing that landowner or entryman whose land adjoined any lot should have a preferred right to purchase the one-half of the lot which abutted on his land, must be given effect as far as possible, and the fact that it might not be possible to give it effect as to lots which abutted on one side on the lands of more than one owner would be no reason for not giving it effect in other cases where it is possible.

5. Public lands ⊂=33—Landowner entitled to purchase one-half of lot abutting on property.

Under Act Cong. March 3, 1909, giving any landowner or entryman whose land adjoined any lot between subdivisions a preferred right to purchase the one-half of the lot which abutted on his land, each landowner had the preferred right to purchase the one-half of any lot on his side which was in front of or abutted upon his land; and, where a lot abutted on one side on the lands of more than one owner, each landowner had the preferred right to purchase the one-half of the strip on his side which was in front of or abutted upon his land.

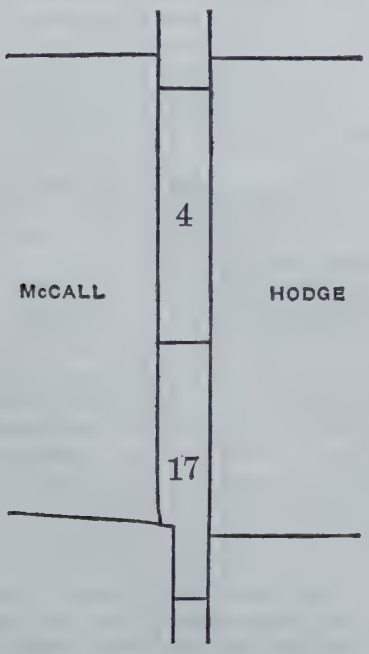
Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin T. Cole, Judge.



Action by Jennie M. Hodge and another against Cora McCall and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellants.

Charles L. Childers, of El Centro, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The original survey of the public lands in the Imperial Valley was exceedingly inaccurate, and when the valley came to be settled up another survey became necessary. This was made, and in its making the government subdivisions for which entry had been made were located as actually claimed by the entrymen on the ground. When so located, what theoretically should have been adjoining subdivisions were in many instances separated by small strips of land which did not come in either subdivision. The situation may be made clearer by the accompanying diagram of it as it exists in the present case:

The areas marked McCall and Hodge represent the governmental subdivisions upon which the plaintiff and the defendant, or their predecessors in interest, had respectively entered, and to which they had acquired title from the government. The strip between them, portions of which are marked 4 and 17, is one of the strips of which we are speaking. The strips were divided into subdivisions called lots, designated by numbers, and the numbers 4 and 17 are the numbers of the lots involved in the present controversy.

The strips were too narrow to be suitable for separate homesteads or farms, and could best be improved and used in connection with the homesteads and farms which they adjoined. To meet this condition of affairs, Congress passed an act (Act March 3, 1909, 35 Stats. at Large, 779) providing for the sale of the lots into which the strips were subdivided, at a price and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, but with a proviso that any landowner or entryman whose land adjoined any lot should have a preferred right to purchase the one-half of the lot which abutted on his land. The proviso reads:

"Provided, that any entryman or owner of such entered or patented tract shall have a preferred right to buy one-half of all such lots as abut on lands held under his entry or owned by him within six months after the time when the said Secretary shall fix the price of such tracts, and this preferred right shall not prevent such entryman or owner from buying all of any such abutting lots as may remain unsold at the expiration of said six months."

Pursuant to the act the Secretary of the Interior, through the Commissioner of the Land Office, fixed the price at which the lots would be sold by the government and promulgated regulations for their sale. These regulations however, instead of providing for a preferred right to each landowner to purchase one-half of any lot abutting upon his land, as the act prescribed, declared that literal compliance with the act in this particular was impossible and that preference would be given to those owners whose lands adjoined any particular lot who were best entitled to purchase under the special facts of each case. The regulations also provided that any landowner might claim a preferred right to purchase, not merely a half, but all, of any lot which adjoined his land, and that "if more than one application be made for the same tract by parties separately claiming preference of purchase, such right will be awarded to the applicant most equitably entitled thereto under all the facts and circumstances of the particular case."

Following the promulgation of these regulations, the plaintiff Jennie M. Hodge made application within the prescribed six months to purchase as a preferred purchaser the east half of lots 4 and 17 abutting on her land on the west, and the defendant Cora M. McCall made a similar application to purchase all of the same lots as abutting on her lands on the east. The Land Department decided that the defendant was more equitably entitled to purchase the lots than the plaintiff, rejected the application of the latter, and approved the application of the former for the whole of the lots. Upon appeal to the Secretary of the Interior, this ruling was affirmed, and patent issued to the defendant for the whole of the lots accordingly. Thereupon the plaintiff brought the present action against the defendant, alleging that upon the foregoing facts the plaintiff was legally entitled to purchase the east half of the lots in preference to the defendant, and that through mistake of law on the part of the officials of the Interior Department her right had been denied and a patent for the whole of the lots issued to the defendant. The complaint asked for judgment, declaring that the defendant held the east half of the lots in trust for the plaintiff, and directing that the defendant convey it to her. Judgment went for the defendant in the court below, and the plaintiff appeals.

[1] The rule is well established that if, through a mistake of law on the part of the officials of the Department of the Interior, a patent to land to which one person is entitled under the public land laws erroneously issues to another, the latter will be held by the courts to hold the legal title received from the government in trust for him who should have received it. Sanders v. Dutcher, 168 Cal. 353, 143 Pac. 599. It is clear also that if there was any mistake on the part of the department officials in rejecting the application of the plaintiff, such mistake was a mistake of law, consisting in the belief of the officials that upon the facts, which are not in dispute, she did not have a preferred right to purchase. The question in the case therefore resolves itself into one as to whether or not the plaintiff had such preferred right.

[2, 3] This question must be determined by the statute and not by the regulations of the department. It is the rule that the function of department regulations is to carry out the purpose of the statute for whose administration they are adopted and that they must be reasonable and appropriate for this purpose and cannot either enlarge or impair a right given by the statute. U. S. v. United Copper Co., 196 U. S. 207, 25 Sup. Ct. 222, 49 L. Ed. 449; U. S. v. George, 228 U. S. 14, 33 Sup. Ct. 412, 57 L. Ed. 712; Anchor v. Howe (C. C.) 50 Fed. 366. If the plaintiff in this case was given by the statute a preferred right to purchase, it is wholly immaterial that the regulations purport to deny her that right. The only bearing which the regulations can have on the question is in connection with the construction to be given the statute. If its meaning be doubtful, then the construction put upon it in actual administration by the officers intrusted with that administration should be given great weight by the courts in determining its true meaning. But if its meaning be not doubtful, and the regulations are in conflict with that meaning, they are simply void. If this be not true, it is within the power of the department officials to override and annul an act of Congress.

[4, 5] As to the meaning of the statute, we do not see how there can be any reasonable question. The proviso under which the plaintiff claims, to quote again the pertinent portion of it, reads:

"Provided that any entryman or owner of such entered or patented tract shall have a preferred right to buy one-half of all such lots as abut on lands held under his entry or owned by him."

This language seems perfectly plain, and the carrying of it out in connection with such lots as the lot 4 involved in this case would seem to present no difficulty whatever. The only difficulty in carrying it out would seem to arise in connection with such lots as lot 17 which abut on one side on the lands of more than one owner. If the statute be read with the utmost literalness, it would seem to give to each of such owners the right to purchase the whole of that half of the lot which is on their side of the center line dividing the lot longitudinally. In other words, two men would seem to be given the preferred right to purchase the same thing, a manifest impossibility. But even if this difficulty exists in such cases, that fact would not justify the annulment of the statute in cases such as lot 4, where it does not exist. The statute certainly must be given effect as far as possible, and the fact that it may not be possible to give it effect in one class of cases is no reason for not giving it effect in other cases where it is possible. As to lot 4, then, we do not see how there can be any serious question but that the plaintiff had the preferred right to purchase, and, as a result, has a right to the relief which she now seeks.

It remains to consider the case as to lot 17. Here there is the difficulty mentioned. That difficulty, however, arises only by construing the statute with the utmost literalness. But it should not be so construed. It should be construed in the light of the situation which it was enacted to meet and the purpose which it seeks to accomplish. So construed, we have no doubt as to its meaning. The situation was one wherein lands which had come into private ownership were separated by strips of public lands too narrow to be desirable as separate holdings, and which could best be used and improved in connection with the holdings on each side. The thing which the statute manifestly sought to accomplish in this situation was to provide that the strips should be divided equally between the landowners on each side, provided they cared to purchase them. There is no difficulty whatever in accomplishing this purpose. If a lot extends beyond the boundary of one owner so as to abut on the same side on the land of another, then each of such owners would have the right to purchase the portion of their half of the strip which abuts on his land. It is perfectly plain that it was a division of the strips between the adjoining landowners in just this manner, in case they desired to purchase, which the statute sought to accomplish. The claimed impossibility of carrying out the statute arises only from an ignoring of this purpose and a construing of the statute with extreme literalness to provide the absurd thing of giving to each of two or more parties the preferred right to purchase the same land. This is not, in our judgment, a rational construction of the statute. It should be construed to mean that each landowner has the preferred right to purchase the half of the strip on his side which is in front of or abuts upon his land. With the statute so construed, the plaintiff here had the preferred right to purchase, not all of the east half of lot 17, but that portion of it which abuts upon her land. As to that portion of lot 17, as well as to the east half of lot 4, she is entitled to the relief which she seeks.

The facts in the case all appear in findings, so that, while the judgment denying the plaintiff relief must be reversed, there is no necessity for a new trial.

Judgment reversed, with instructions to the lower court to enter judgment for the plaintiff in accordance with this opinion.

1. Municipal corporations ⊂=346—Sureties on bonds taken out in name of contractor's son not liable to materialmen.

Where street contractor's bonds under street improvement act of 1913 were executed in the name of the contractor's son instead of the contractor, sureties were not liable to materialmen.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=348—Materialmen suing on street contractor's bond must prove valid statutory bond.

Materialmen suing on street contractor's bond under street improvement act of 1913 must prove the execution of a valid statutory bond.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Actions by the Los Angeles Lime Company against H. C. Withers, Martha McLain, and Katherine Ludwig, and against H. C. Withers, James M. Wadsworth, and John Hayes. Judgment for defendants other than H. C. Withers, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Albert J. Sherer, Robert Young, and Clarence J. Walker, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The plaintiff, Los Angeles Lime Company, brought two actions to recover on contractor's bonds for materials furnished and used on street grading contracts, alleged to have been executed by one H. C. Withers and the sureties named, under the street improvement act of 1913 (St. 1913, p. 954). In each case the materials were furnished to H. C. Withers. The contracts were with the city of Los Angeles and were executed in the name of H. O. Withers, as contractor, and the statutory bonds sued on here were executed in the name of H. O. Withers as principal, with defendants Martha McLain and Katherine Ludwig as sureties in one instance and defendants James M. Wadsworth and John Hayes as sureties in the other, but suit is brought upon them naming H. C. Withers as principal.

The name of H. O. Withers was signed to both contracts and both bonds by H. C. Withers. It does not appear from either the pleadings or the findings of the court that this was done with the knowledge or consent of H. O. Withers, and the sureties deny in their answers, and it is so found by the court, that they, or any of them, knew that H. O. Withers was not the real party in interest, and it is alleged and found that they signed as sureties in the belief that H. O. Withers was the actual principal and real party in interest on both the contracts and the bond. This finding is sufficiently sustained by the evidence.

In reality, H. C. Withers was the real party in interest, and executed these instruments and prosecuted the work under the contracts for his own sole benefit as is alleged in the plaintiff's pleadings and found by the court. H. O. Withers is his son, and was employed by the father on these street contracts, but had no other interest therein, and was not made a party to the actions. H. C. Withers used his name for his own personal reasons.

[1] We are unable to see on what theory these sureties can be held liable on a bond which they never entered into and for a principal for whom they never assumed liability. Surely, a surety has the right to choose the principal for whose obligations he becomes liable, and it is no answer to say that some undisclosed party to the contract may be a safer risk than the ostensible one.

The sureties here, for reasons of their own, may have been willing to assume responsibilities for the son when they would not for the father. There is some evidence in the record that H. O. Withers had authorized his father to use his name in executing these contracts, but as pointed out, no such authorization is pleaded or found by the trial court, and no attempt was made by the plaintiff to make him a party defendant; the father, H. C. Withers, being named as principal in both actions.

On the record here shown the sureties would be without recourse against their ostensible principal if judgment was given against them. In short, the bonds sued upon, as alleged and proven, are not the contracts executed by the defendant sureties.

[2] It is entirely immaterial in this connection that statutory bond under the street improvement acts is for the benefit of all persons furnishing materials and supplies for use on the improvement, and the cases of Williams v. Tingey, 26 Cal. App. 574, 147 Pac. 584, and Hub Hardware Co. v. Ætna, etc., Co., 178 Cal. 264, 173 Pac. 81, have no bearing under the circumstances of this case. There must be in the first instance a valid statutory bond imposing this liability on the sureties before such a result can follow. It devolves on a materialman seeking to recover on such a liability to show such a bond. In these cases the plaintiff materialman has failed to show the bonds alleged in the complaint. To the contrary, it has shown that its only claim against the sureties here is based on bonds given by them for a different principal, without any knowledge that there was any other principal or real party in interest in so far as the street improvement contract was concerned.

The determination of the trial court under its findings was correct. We are not inclined to regard the technical objections made by the respondents to the consideration of this appeal as meritorious; but our position upon this matter is of no consequence to the respondents in view of our determination that the judgment should be affirmed.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re GARTENLAUB'S ESTATE.

GARTENLAUB v. UNION TRUST CO. OF SAN FRANCISCO et al.

(Supreme Court of California. March 28, 1921, as Modified April 27, 1921, by Order Denying Rehearing.)

1. Life estates ⇐15(2)—Beneficiary of life interest held entitled to dividends from profits arising from sale of land by corporation.

Where corporation was maintained and conducted for the sole purpose of selling a tract of land in parcels at a profit and dividing the proceeds as dividends among its stockholders, life beneficiary under trust created by deceased stockholder giving such beneficiary a share "of the entire net income, revenue, and profit of every kind arising from said estate" was entitled to share in the profits realized from the sale of such parcels, but remainderman was entitled to the value of the corporate stock on the death of the decedent.

2. Life estates ⇐15(2)—Remainderman entitled to value of stock as of date of creation of trust.

Where corporate stock forms a part of a trust estate created by will, the income of which is to be paid to one for life with remainder to another, the remainderman is entitled to the value of the stock as of the date of the creation of the trust—that is, the testator's death—and any accumulations beyond that date are distributable as profits.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. V. Coffey, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Abraham Gartenlaub, otherwise known as A. Gartenlaub, deceased. From an order settling the second annual account of Union Trust Company of San Francisco, trustee, and apportioning certain funds between Sarah Fox and others, Alice G. B. Gartenlaub appeals. Reversed.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Norman A. Eisner, Heller, Powers & Ehrman, and Samuel S. Stevens, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal by a beneficiary of a life interest under a testamentary trust from an order of the superior court settling the second annual account of the trustee and apportioning certain funds in the hands of the trustee between the interests created by the trust.

The entire residue of the estate of the testator, appraised at over $400,000, and consisting of real and personal property, stocks, bonds, and securities of various kinds, was distributed to the trustee under the terms of the will. It was directed that the entire trust property be sold and converted into certain interest-bearing securities. It was also directed that the trustee pay to the widow of said decedent, the appellant here, monthly for the remainder of her life, three-fourths "of the entire net income, revenue, and profit of every kind arising from said estate in said month in any way whatever," and the remaining one-fourth to a sister of decedent.

Part of the property of this trust which came into the hands of the trustee under the decree of distribution consisted of five hundred shares of the capital stock of the F. & K. Land Company, a California corporation. After the decree of distribution certain dividends were declared on this stock, and the estate's proportion thereof, aggregating $4,500, was paid to the trustee. These dividends were declared wholly from moneys derived from sales of a part of a tract of land belonging to the corporation, which sales were made after the decree of distribution. How these dividends should be apportioned between the life beneficiary and the remainder interests is the question in dispute.

While the purposes embraced in the articles of incorporation of this company authorize a general investment business, the only property it ever acquired was this tract of land, consisting of 1,920 acres in Kern county, Cal., purchased for $9,792, at the rate of $5.10 per acre, and the only business it ever engaged in was the placing of this land upon the market and from time to time selling portions of it.

The land was prospective oil land and was clearly bought and held on a speculation. No attempt by the corporation was ever made to develop the property, or in any way derive a profit from it, other than by sale. Of this tract 450 acres were transferred to two of the seven stockholders for their two-sevenths of the corporate stock, which was then distributed between the remaining five stockholders. The property advanced rapidly in value, and prior to the death of the decedent 600 acres of the remaining land had been sold for $232,750, one-fifth of which had been distributed to decedent in dividends.

At the time, therefore, of the distribution to the trustee of these 500 shares, being one-fifth of the corporate stock, the assets of the corporation, upon which the value of the stock rested, consisted of the remaining 870 acres of this land. Although these 500 shares of stock were only appraised at $2,000 in the inventory of the estate, it is apparent from the figures shown by these various sales that the shares had an immensely greater value than indicated by this appraisement.

In any event, it is fairly obvious that at the time of the death of the testator, June 1, 1914, the corpus of the estate passing to the trustees, as represented by these shares, was the stock with its fair value as based on the remaining assets of the corporation.

The sole question before us is as to the relation of the dividends from the subsequent sales thereafter to be declared by the corporation and paid to the trustee to "income, revenue, and profit" upon this corporate stock. The trust under which these shares were distributed to the trustee directed that "as soon as may be" after the death of decedent the trustee shall "sell and convert into money" said estate and property, except such portion thereof as already consisted of interest-bearing securities, and invest the proceeds in certain enumerated classes of bonds and mortgages.

Such sale has not been made as to this stock. The trustee doubtless considered the investment in its present form more advantageous to the estate as a whole than it would be to immediately convert the stock into cash and invest the proceeds in the class of securities prescribed under the trust.

Under such circumstances the duty of a court of equity dealing with the administration of this trust fund is to determine in the light of all the peculiar facts, and the respective interests of the life beneficiary and the remaindermen, what is a fair apportionment of the proceeds of these dividends resulting from land sales, and which represent almost in their entirety a clear gain of some sort on the original investment, whether considered as stock dividends or income profits.

We do not need to concern ourselves as to how the dividends accruing and paid in testator's lifetime were considered or applied by him. At his death he was the owner of 500 shares, being one-fifth of the capital stock of the corporation. The value of the total stock was represented by the remaining 870 acres of land, the only asset of the corporation. These 500 shares on the death of the testator by the terms of his will, became part of the trust estate. Irrespective of what they originally cost or what dividends had previously been declared on them, they added to the capital fund of the estate just what they were worth at that date. Had the actual conversion into interest-bearing securities as directed by the will been made at that time, the securities so obtained would have become part of the residuary capital, and three-fourths of the interest therefrom would have been payable to the appellant as a life beneficiary.

As already indicated, this asset of the trust estate was not converted, but still remains in the hands of the trustee in its original form, and there has been received thereon in dividends from the corporation the $4,500 referred to. These dividends are part of the proceeds of two sales of land made by the corporation from the remaining acreage, one on December 12, 1916, of 80 acres at $1,500 per acre, and the other on March 19, 1917, of 200 acres at $1,500 per acre. The dividends were from the cash payments on the sales and interest on deferred payments. The remaining payments are owing to the corporation in periodical interest-bearing installments.

Appellant contends that the entire dividend payments upon this stock above the original investment by the testator should be treated as profits in the nature of income, and be paid to the life beneficiary.

Respondents insist that the money from which these dividends are declared is in no sense income or profits from the business in which the corporation is engaged, but the natural increment of the capital fund, and should be added to the permanent fund of the trust.

The lower court held with respondents and only allowed for distribution to the life beneficiaries such portion of the dividends as were derived from interest on the deferred payments owing to the corporation from the land sales, aggregating $832.

No subject has been more prolific of controversy or productive of more divergent judicial opinion than that of the distribution of revenues of trust property between the parties entitled to the income and the corpus of the estate. Able counsel on both sides of this controversy have been very diligent in collecting and presenting these authorities, and their number is such that it will not be practicable to attempt to review them in detail. The apparent conflicts in the decisions can be largely reconciled, however, by taking into account the great variety of circumstances out of which they arose.

In this case, it is stipulated between the parties:

That, notwithstanding it possessed general powers to engage in land investments, "the corporation has never done any business from the time of its organization except to sell from time to time portions of the land originally conveyed to it as a consideration for its stock, and divide among its stockholders the proceeds of such sale. It has never had any assets except said land and the proceeds of sales of the same. It has never bought any additional land or dealt in any other commodity or done any other business, nor has the corporation at any time developed any of the land, worked the same, or taken any products therefrom, or raised or produced any commodity thereon. It has never received any income, revenue, or profit from any source whatever except the proceeds of sales of its lands."

In other words, the sole purpose and business of this corporation has been to market this tract of land and to secure a profit to its stockholders by obtaining a price from it in advance of what it cost them. If the money obtained through this increase in value cannot be considered and divided as profits of the business in which the corporation is engaged, then there can be no profits for the stockholders. The distinction seems clear between this kind of corporate business, and one where the corporation acquires and owns land for the purpose of farming it, or leasing it or developing its mineral deposits, or selling timber from it. In such cases the stockholders are looking to the income thus produced for their profits, and any increase in the market value of the land itself is an increase in the value of the capital investment. Under the conditions first stated the dividends from the increased values would go to the life tenant, under the latter to the remainderman.

Respondents cite the case of Miller v. Payne, 150 Wis. 354, 136 N. W. 811, as being closely in point with the case before us. If we read that decision aright, it recognizes the distinction just stated. In the course of the opinion it is said:

"Any dividend derived from a mere enhancement of the value of assets representing capital from sources other than the accumulation of earnings belongs to the remainderman, and not to the life tenant. It represents corpus, not income"—citing Kalbach v. Clark, 133 Iowa, 215, 110 N. W. 599, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 801, 12 Ann. Cas. 647; Holbrook v. Holbrook, 74 N. H. 201, 66 Atl. 124, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 768; Hite's Devisees v. Hite's Ex'r, 93 Ky. 257, 20 S. W. 778, 19 L. R. A. 173, 40 Am. St. Rep. 189; Outcalt v. Appleby, 36 N. J. Eq. 73; Gray v. Darlington, 15 Wall. 63, 21 L. Ed. 45; Eisner's Estate, 175 Pa. 143, 34 Atl. 577.

"To this rule there is a well-known exception in the case of a corporation engaged in buying and selling real estate at a profit; and if the St. Paul Avenue Improvement Company could be considered a trading corporation in real estate within the meaning of the exception to the rule stated, the profits accruing to the corporation, whether derived from an enhancement of value of real estate, or from rents and profits in excess of cost and maintenance, would be considered income and belong to the life tenant."

[1] To bring the F. & K. Land Company of the instant case under this exception it, of course, must appear that it is "a corporation engaged in buying and selling real estate at a profit." This would seem to be sufficiently conceded by the terms of the stipulation hereinbefore quoted that it has not done any business except to sell from this tract of land and divide the proceeds of the sales among its stockholders, and that it never has received any income, revenue, or profit from any source except the proceeds of these sales. In other words, this corporation has been maintained and conducted for the sole purpose of managing and selling this land in parcels at a profit, and dividing the proceeds among its stockholders. The only purpose of its existence has been to realize a profit from the sale of these lands. Under its articles of incorporation it is authorized to do a general investment and trading business. It practically confined its activities to this one venture, which was clearly that of handling this tract of land as a commodity and selling it at an advanced price for the purpose of securing a profit for its stockholders.

We find a very striking analogy between this case and that of the Appeal of Merchants' Exchange Fund Association, referred to by both appellant and respondents here as the Oliver Case, 136 Pa. 43, 20 Atl. 527, 9 L. R. A. 421, 20 Am. St. Rep. 894. The closeness of the parallel appears from the syllabus given in the Atlantic Reporter as cited which is as follows:

"Testator left his residuary estate to trustees to pay the net income therefrom to his daughter during her life, and, after her death, the principal to a charitable association. Part of the estate consisted of shares in a land company, held by testator. The company was unincorporated, but was organized by a contract entered into by its members, which provided that its business should be to buy and sell land, and should be carried on by trustees in their own names; that the interest of each member should be measured by his shares of stock, which he could sell and transfer without consulting with his associates, and without impairing the power of the trustees, or the existence of the company; that the stockholders should select the trustees to manage the business, and should be entitled to a distributive share in the profits. After testator's death, the trustees sold part of the land belonging to the company, and declared a dividend of the profits thereon. The increased price of the land was due to the discovery of copper on adjacent lands after testator's death. Held, that the dividend was personal estate representing income, and that, having accrued after testator's death, it went to his daughter."

The court in its opinion says:

"The object in buying was not to mine or operate in any other manner, but to sell again so as to make gain by the purchase and sale of land; and the articles provided for the division of the profits made by such purchase and sale among the stockholders. The interest of each member was therefore an interest in the profits made. He had no title to the land bought by the trustees for the company, as a tenant in common or otherwise, and could neither convey nor incumber it. His interest in it was personal estate and the extent of that interest was shown by his certificates of stock. * * * The trustees under his will succeed him as holders of his shares, and their interest as such holders is neither greater nor less than his interest was while he was living. The company was not dissolved by Oliver's death and has not yet been dissolved. It has done but little business for several years, but has paid the taxes on its lands and kept up its own organization, and still holds undisposed of nearly 600 acres in the names of its trustees. * * * The dividend made by the company out of the proceeds of the 40 acres [sold after the testator's death] has the same character, and is governed by the same rules as though it had been made in his lifetime. It represents part of the difference between the cost of the land sold, including taxes and expenses and the price received for it. That difference is the profit made by means of the purchase and sale of the land which it is the duty of the trustees to divide among the stockholders. It is clear, therefore, that this dividend is personal estate, and represents gain or profit made in the proper business of the land company, that of buying land for the purposes of sale, and selling it with a view to make gain for the stockholders. The will directs the payment of the net income from his estate, real and personal, to his daughter, and as this dividend represents income it goes to the daughter, and not to the remainderman. The shares are part of the residuary estate and belong to appellant. The profit accruing from the sale of lands is income from the investment in the stock of the land company, and, if made since the death of Oliver, is not to be distinguished from income derived from any other source."

Respondents seek a distinction from the present case in the fact that in the Oliver Case the company bought as well as sold the land. This distinction, if important, is more apparent than real in this instance. Here the land was purchased for the purpose of sale by the incorporators who organized the corporation with the object of its taking over the land and managing and marketing it; and, as in the Oliver Case, "the object * * * was not to mine or operate in any other manner, but to sell again so as to make gain by the purchase and sale of the land."

We can see no force in the argument that the handling of this one tract of land was the only business the F. & K. Land Company ever engaged in, as affecting its status as a trading corporation. The activities of a mercantile corporation might be confined to handling a single stock of goods but, if its object was to sell the goods at retail and divide the profits among its stockholders, it would be dealing in these goods as a commodity, and its net receipts from such sales over and above the cost thereof would constitute profits of the business. Taylor on Private Corp. (5th Ed.) p. 786; Clark & Marshall, Priv. Corp. (2d Ed.) p. 1621; Fletcher's Enc. Law of Corp. vol. 6, § 3721, and citations.

The life beneficiaries here are entitled to a liberal construction of the terms of this trust in their favor under the broad provision thereof that they are to receive the net income, revenues, and profit of every kind arising from said estate in any way whatever.

While we are satisfied that the gain from this investment through increase in its selling values is to be considered as income or profits, it is equally apparent that, in the division of the proceeds of the residue of the lands which constituted the corporate assets at the inception of the trust, the value of the stock as of the date it came into the trust estate must be conserved for the remainderman. It is just as evident that the distribution as profit of all the dividends from sales of the remaining lands would destroy the value of the capital stock as that the distribution of all such dividends to the capital stock would cut off all income.

[2] The doctrine generally adopted by the courts of America, and recognized by this court in Estate of Duffill, 183 Pac. 337, is that, where corporate stock forms a part of a trust estate, the income of which is to be paid to one for life with remainder to another, what the remainderman is entitled to is the value of the stock as of the date of the creation of the trust—that is, the testator's death. Any accumulations beyond that date are distributable as profits. Estate of Duffill, supra; Appeal of Boyer, 224 Pa. 144, 73 Atl. 320; Smith's Estate, 140 Pa. 344, 21 Atl. 438, 23 Am. St. Rep. 237; Pritchitt v. Nashville Trust Co., 96 Tenn. 472, 36 S. W. 1064, 33 L. R. A. 856; In re Osborne, 209 N. Y. 450, 457, 103 N. E. 723, 823, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 510, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 298; In re Stokes' Estate, 240 Pa. 277, 87 Atl. 971; In re Quay Estate, 253 Pa. 80, 97 Atl. 1029; In re Schaefer, 178 App. Div. 117, 165 N. Y. Supp. 19, 22.

In Duffill's Estate, supra, the court says:

"In such a case as this the court will ascertain whether the giving of the stock dividend or the money dividend to the life tenant reduces the value of the corpus of the estate as it existed at the time of the death of the testator. * * * The intrinsic value as shown by the books of the corporation (and in this case by the stipulation) is to be taken into consideration. This establishes that which the remainderman is entitled to have preserved for ultimate distribution to him."

No evidence appears in the record in this case as to the value of this stock other than the statement that it was appraised at some stage of the probate proceedings at $2,000, but in view of the fact that on June 11, 1914, at the time of testator's death, the corporation held undisposed of 870 acres of this land, and that in April, 1912, two years prior thereto, 280 acres of the land had been sold at $875 per acre, and that a year and a half after the testator's death 80 acres were sold at $1,500 per acre, and a few months later 200 acres were sold at the same price per acre, equity will hardly permit such appraisement to stand as the basis of valuation in this settlement.

It is not for this court to fix such valuation, but by way of a tentative estimate it may conservatively be conjectured that at the time this stock passed into the trust estate the remaining lands of the corporation on a basis of the selling price shortly before and after had a market value somewhere between the sale prices of the earlier and later dates. The value of this land furnishes the basis for arriving at an estimate of the value of the stock, as an asset of the trust.

In what way can this value, be it more or less than the speculative figures given, be conserved to the capital fund of the trust, and at the same time meet the requirements of the will that the entire net income, revenue, and profits be paid to the life beneficiaries?

As the only value of the stock is based upon the value of the land, the necessary computations can be made in terms of price per acre of the land. Assuming, for illustration only, that the land was worth $1,000 per acre at the time the trust estate vested, every acre since sold at the $1,500 rate represents an advance of $500, or one-third of the total. So long as this ratio exists between the basic price representing the stock interest of the trust estate and the selling price, whatever dividends are declared should be divided in that proportion. If other portions of the tract are sold at a greater or less advance in price over the fixed value due the corpus of the trust estate, the proportion of profits to the life interests will vary accordingly.

The dividends from these sales, of course, represent both principal and interest derived from the sale of land, less the operating costs and liabilities of the corporation, but there is no reason why this fact should alter the ratio of the division.

The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the probate court to ascertain and fix the value of the stock of the F. & K. Land Company belonging to the trust estate as of date June 1, 1914, and to apportion respectively between the remainder interest and the life beneficiaries any dividends arising from subsequent sales by the corporation, on the basis of the ratio between the value of the land at date June 1, 1914, and the advanced price at which such sales have been and may be made.

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃931(1)—Findings liberally construed in support of judgment.

The finding of a trial court must be liberally construed in support of the judgment given.

2. Sales ⊂⊃153, 391(9)—Tender of goods unnecessary on refusal to go on with contract; on buyer's default, seller can retain payment made.

Where, day after agreement to purchase machine from defendant, plaintiff definitely and finally refused to go on with the contract and demanded back a payment made, defendant was not called upon to make any tender of the machine in the absence of a retraction of the refusal in order to avoid a default on his part in the matter, and could retain the payment made.

3. Sales ⊂⊃391(9)—No recovery of money paid by vendee on refusal to accept property.

In the absence of a mutual rescission of a contract of sale of a machine, there can be no recovery of a payment made by the vendee who without lawful right refuses to go on with his contract.

4. Sales ⊂⊃92—Subsequent sale by vendor immaterial on question of consent to a rescission.

Where plaintiff purchased machine and made down payment, and then, without lawful right, refused to go on with the contract, a sale of the machine by the vendor to a third person within a month after the repudiation of the contract by plaintiff cannot be taken as a consent to rescission on the part of the vendor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Tomboy Gold & Copper Company against D. O. Marks and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Burns and Hocker & Austin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Wm. L. Jarrott and James S. Jarrott, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an action for $500 alleged to have been had and received by defendants for the use of plaintiff. Judgment went for defendants, and plaintiff appeals upon the judgment roll alone. The claim is that the findings of the trial court do not support the judgment, and that upon such findings judgment should have been given for the plaintiff.

As to the defendant D. O. Marks, referred to in the answer as the president of defendant corporation, it is clear that the findings fully support the judgment in his favor.

As to plaintiff and defendant corporation, the findings are, in accord with affirmative allegations of defendants' answer, substantially as follows: On December 12, 1916, plaintiff agreed with defendant corporation to purchase from the latter a milling machine known as the Marks pulverizer for $1,625, paying to the latter $500 in cash on account thereof, and agreeing to pay the balance of $1,125 on the delivery of the machine, which delivery was to be made on or before December 18, 1916. The machine was one used for the reduction of rock. "Defendant corporation did not manufacture said machine, but assembled it from constituent parts, which, according to its practice, it purchased ordinarily, after the order for the machine. * * * Plaintiff selected the machine from a demonstrating machine at the place of business of the defendant corporation. At that time said defendant corporation had just one machine like the demonstrating machine, which it could assemble and deliver. Other deliveries could be secured by the defendant corporation from the manufacturer in not less than 60 days." On December 13, 1916, the day after the agreement for the sale, "the plaintiff, concluding that he (it) did not want the machine, believing that it would not serve plaintiff's purpose, so informed the defendant corporation, and demanded back said sum of $500. The defendant corporation declined to repay said sum. The defendant corporation within a month thereafter sold the machine for the same price that the plaintiff had agreed to pay."

[1, 2] It is a thoroughly well settled rule that the findings of a trial court must be liberally construed in support of the judgment given. So construed, we are satisfied that they must be held to mean, as is apparently conceded by counsel for both parties in their briefs, that the plaintiff absolutely refused to complete its purchase, and by its notice and demand on December 13, 1916, finally renounced and repudiated the contract. It was substantially alleged in the answer that on December 18, 1916, defendant corporation notified plaintiff that the machine was ready for delivery, and that plaintiff then refused to receive the same, but the court did not specifically find on this allegation. However, because of the construction that must be given to the findings made in view of the judgment, the absence of such a finding is immaterial. If on December 13th plaintiff definitely and finally refused to go on with the contract on its part, defendant corporation was not called upon to make any such tender, in the absence of a retraction of the refusal, in order to avoid a default on its part in the matter.

[3] The case then, as presented by the findings, is simply that of a vendee on a contract for the purchase of specific personal property, who, without lawful cause, finally refuses to go on with his contract by accepting the property and paying the balance of the purchase price, seeking to recover from the vendor, who is in no way in default, the money paid by him to such vendor on the contract for purchase, on the theory of an implied promise to repay the same. This is the exact situation, unless the mere fact that within a month after plaintiff's renunciation of the contract defendant corporation sold the personal property to another purchaser compels the conclusion that said defendant acquiesced in and agreed to plaintiff's attempted rescission, thereby accomplishing a rescission of the contract by mutual consent. In the latter event plaintiff would, of course, be entitled to be repaid the money it had paid on account.

In the absence of a mutual rescission there can be no recovery by the vendee under such circumstances. No rule is more firmly settled with relation to contracts for purchase, whether concerning real or personal property, than that to the effect that a vendee who without lawful right refuses to go on with his contract, cannot recover from a vendor not in default, who is ready and willing to proceed and fulfill all his obligations, all or any of the money that he had paid to the vendor in accord with the terms of the agreement. This rule has been uniformly applied in California. It was declared in both opinions in Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 10, 19, 20, 55 Pac. 713, 716, 720 (43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17), the opinion of Mr. Justice Henshaw saying that in such a case the vendor, "still resting upon the contract, * * * may remain inactive, yet retain to his own use the moneys paid by the vendee, so that it is of no moment whether or not the contract declares that such moneys shall upon the breach be forfeited as liquidated damages," and the opinion of Mr. Justice Harrison declaring it to be the law of the state that "the vendee, who was himself in default in the payment of a portion of the money, could not against the will of the vendor repudiate the contract and recover the portion already paid." Many cases might be cited in which this rule has been applied, but the rule is not disputed, and it is plain that plaintiff has no right of recovery here except upon the theory of mutual abandonment and rescission. Upon the facts of this case there is no other possible foundation for a right of recovery on the part of plaintiff.

[4] The single question presented, then, is whether the sale of the machine to another vendee by defendant corporation within a month after the final and definite repudiation of its contract by plaintiff must be taken as a consent to rescission on the part of defendant corporation. We think this question was squarely decided against the contention of plaintiff in Rayfield v. Van Meter, 120 Cal. 416, 52 Pac. 666. In that case the defendant, in an action to recover the property brought by the vendor against the vendee who refused payment and also refused to restore the property, sought by cross-complaint filed after plaintiff had obtained possession of the property, by process of claim and delivery, and had sold all of the same to others, to recover the money paid by him on the contract less such compensation to plaintiff for the use of the goods as justice might require. This relief was granted by the trial court, and the judgment was here reversed. It was held that the vendee, having without lawful justification repudiated any further obligation under the contract, by his acts "the vinculum juris arising from the contract was broken, and there was nothing which plaintiff needed to rescind." The court then, declaring that a buyer who, without lawful excuse, refuses to go forward with his contract is not entitled to recover back money paid on account thereof, and that the rule applies to agreements for sale of personalty as well as realty, said:

"It is immaterial that plaintiff sold the goods. In Ketchum v. Evertson, 13 Johns. 359, 7 Am. Dec. 384, an action for money paid on a contract for the conveyance of land, it was justly and forcibly remarked: 'To say that the subsequent sale of the land gives a right to the plaintiff to recover back the money paid on the contract would, in effect, be saying that the defendant could never sell it without subjecting himself to an action by the plaintiffs. Why should he not sell? The plaintiffs renounced the contract and peremptorily refused to fulfill it; it was vain, therefore, to keep the land for them. The plaintiffs cannot, by their own wrongful act, impose upon the defendant the necessity of retaining property which his exigencies may require him to sell. This would be most unreasonable and unjust, and is not sanctioned by any principle of law.' These views are equally appropriate to a case of sale of chattels."

The court then distinguished Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 402, 89 Am. Dec. 124, relied on by plaintiff, showed that section 1749, Civil Code, had no application under the circumstances, and also that no ground for relief in equity appeared. The decision was approved in Liver v. Mills, 155 Cal. 459, 463, 101 Pac. 299, 300, where it was substantially said that a distinct and unequivocal repudiation of his contract by the vendee relieves the vendor "from all obligation to perform on his part," and that, "in the face of a repudiation of the contract by respondent, they were not bound to rescind, but were at liberty to treat the right of purchase as ended and to retake the property," being entitled to such possession as the owners thereof. (Italics are ours.) The theory of the decision is that the vendor in such a case has the right, if he so elects, to regard the rights of the purchaser under the contract as ended solely by the purchaser's unlawful repudiation thereof, and that in so far as he is concerned there is nothing to rescind. He may treat such rights as ended solely by the default of the vendee, retaining the money paid him by the vendee thereunder. See Oursler v. Thacher, 152 Cal. 739, 93 Pac. 1007. In such a situation the mere subsequent sale of his own property by the vendor is, of course, entirely immaterial on the question of consent by him to a rescission.

The decision in Rayfield v. Van Meter, supra, is in accord with the rule generally prevailing in other states. See 27 Ruling Case Law, 624. The opinion in Sanders v. Brock, 230 Pa. 609, 79 Atl. 772, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 532, which, like this, was an action by the vendee in default for money paid on such a contract, the vendor having within a very short time resold the property for a larger sum than that fixed by the agreement, contains an exceedingly clear discussion of the principles applicable, entirely in line with our own decisions. We are satisfied that, in view of our own decisions it must be held that there was no such mutual rescission of the contract for purchase as would give to plaintiff, the sole party in default, the right to recover moneys paid under the contract.

It is, perhaps, needless to say that the question of actual detriment to the vendor by reason of the vendee's breach is in no way involved in this action. Entirely regardless of gain or loss to the vendor, the vendee has no right of recovery in view of his own repudiation of the contract. However one may feel as to the disposition of the vendor under such circumstances as are found to exist in this case, to insist on retaining all of the money paid by plaintiff, it is simply standing on its strict legal right.

The judgment of the superior court is affirmed.

In re RICCOMI'S ESTATE.

BARTOLOZZI v. MALLEGNI.

(Sac. 3104.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 28, 1921.)

1. Death ⟸18(1)—Action solely for benefit of heirs for pecuniary losses suffered by them.

The action for wrongful death authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 377, is solely for benefit of the heirs, to compensate them for pecuniary loss suffered by them by reason of the death, the sum recoverable being the aggregate of their losses; and no substantial recovery being authorized on account of any heir who has not suffered pecuniary injury.

2. Executors and administrators ⟸51—Recovery for death not part of estate, but held in trust for heirs.

The money recovered in action under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, for wrongful death does not belong to decedent's estate, but where action is by his personal representative he acts solely as statutory trustee for benefit of the heirs, on account of whom recovery is had.

3. Death ⟸101—Distribution of recovery on basis of pecuniary loss of each heir.

Distribution among heirs of money paid to the personal representative of deceased in settlement of any claims of heirs on account of death of deceased must be on the basis of the pecuniary loss of each, and not on the basis of their rights under the succession statute with regard to property of decedent's estate.

4. Appearance ⟸19(1)—Gave court jurisdiction of parties, so that, it having jurisdiction of subject-matter, judgment was effective.

Though the proceeding was entitled in the matter of the estate of deceased, and was treated as a proceeding in probate, it being in substance one on behalf of an heir against a trustee for an accounting and recovery of money as to which a beneficial interest on behalf of the heir is alleged, the subject-matter of which the court had jurisdiction, appearance of the parties gave the court jurisdiction of the parties, so that its order or judgment is an effective adjudication between the parties.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; W. A. Anderson, Judge.

Proceeding, entitled in the matter of the estate of Egisto Riccomi, deceased, instituted by Costanza Riccomi, for whom on her death Artomira Bartolozzi, her administratrix, was substituted as petitioner, against Maria Mallegni, formerly Maria Riccomi, individually and as administratrix of Egisto Riccomi, deceased. From an adverse order of judgment, the substituted petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Zagoren, Geo. E. Foote, Downey, Pullen & Downey and Markham Johnson, all of Sacramento, for appellant.

Thos. H. Christiansen, of Sacramento, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding instituted by Costanza Riccomi, mother of Egisto Riccomi, deceased, against the surviving wife of said Egisto Riccomi, deceased, both as administratrix of his estate and individually, to obtain one-half of $3,000 paid to the latter as such administratrix by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company in full settlement of any claims the "heirs" of Egisto Riccomi might have against said company on account of his death, which death it was claimed was caused by "the wrongful act or neglect" of said company. Admittedly the money came into the hands of the administratrix as the personal representative of the deceased, Egisto Riccomi, and as money recovered by such personal representative under the provisions of section 377, Code of Civil Procedure. Pending determination of the matter in the superior court, the mother died, and the administratrix of her estate was substituted as petitioner. The superior court concluded that fifteen-sixteenths of the money so received should go to defendant, as the surviving wife of Egisto Riccomi, and one-sixteenth to the mother's estate, and made its order or judgment accordingly. The petitioner appeals from this order, claiming that the mother was entitled to one-half.

The material facts, in addition to those we have already stated, are as follows: At the time of his death the deceased, Egisto Riccomi, was 45 years of age. Maria Riccomi, aged 26, was then, and for many years immediately preceding had been, his wife, living with him as such, and entirely dependent on him for her support and maintenance. The mother, Costanza Riccomi, was a resident of the kingdom of Italy, of the age of 75 years. She was not dependent on deceased for care, support, or maintenance, but for a few years prior to his death deceased had voluntarily sent her $30 per year. The wife and mother were the only heirs left by deceased.

The claim of appellant is that, in view of the language of section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, any amount recovered thereunder as damages for the death of a deceased person must be divided among those who constitute his lawful heirs under our statutes of succession, in the proportions provided by those statutes; in other words, that it must go exactly as his own property would pass under our succession statutes. The wife and mother being the only heirs of deceased, and each being entitled to succeed under our succession statutes to one-half of his property, it is claimed that this money should have been distributed in the same proportions, one-half to each. It is not claimed that the apportionment in fact made was erroneous if the statute authorizes an apportionment upon any other basis than that of dividing the money among those constituting the heirs of the deceased in the same proportions as it would be divided if it constituted part of the estate of the deceased.

Section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, is as follows:

"When the death of a person not being a minor is caused by the wrongful act or neglect of another his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action for damages against the person causing the death, or if such person be employed by another person who is responsible for his conduct, then also against such other person. In every action under this and the preceding section, such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case, may be just."

A review of the decisions in this state under this statutory provision makes it clear that the claim of appellant is based upon a complete misconception of the settled construction of the statute and its purpose and object.

[1, 2] It is settled that the action authorized by the section is one solely for the benefit of the heirs by which they may be compensated for the pecuniary loss suffered by them by reason of the loss of their relatives. The money recovered constitutes no part of the estate of deceased, and where the action is brought or the money recovered by the personal representative of the deceased, such personal representative is acting solely as a statutory trustee for the benefit of the heirs on account of whom the recovery is had. See Ruiz v. Santa Barbara, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 191, 128 Pac. 330; Webster v. Norwegian M. Co., 137 Cal. 399, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181. In this case the important thing to bear in mind is that the action "for damages" for the benefit of the "heirs" is one solely for the purpose of compensating them for the pecuniary loss suffered by them by reason of the death of the deceased. An examination of the decisions involving questions of the elements of damage to be considered in such cases demonstrates this. While there can be but one action brought or one recovery had, either by the personal representative of the deceased or the heirs (see Daubert v. Western Meat Co., 139 Cal. 480, 69 Pac. 297, 73 Pac. 244, 96 Am. St. Rep. 154), and while the recovery in such an action should be of a single "lump sum" for all (see Robinson et al. v. Western States, etc., Co., 194 Pac. 39), the total recovery to be had is the aggregate of the pecuniary loss of each of the heirs who has suffered a pecuniary loss by reason of the death of the deceased. As put in Robinson v. Western States, etc., Co., supra, this "lump sum" includes "of course, the damages to each of them." In Johnson v. Southern Pacific Co., 154 Cal. 285, 297, 97 Pac. 520, 526, an action by the surviving husband and the children of a deceased wife and mother, it was held that the trial court properly instructed the jury:

"That the husband was entitled to recover the value of the present and future services of the 'wife and companion,' and the children the value of the mother's 'nurture and instruction, moral and physical, and intellectual training'; that they 'must award such a lump sum for damages as will fully compensate the plaintiffs, both the husband and children, for the pecuniary value to them of the life of the wife and mother."

It is the pecuniary loss to an heir by reason of the death that is recoverable, and that only. See generally on this subject Simoneau v. Pacific Electric Railway Co., 159 Cal. 494, 505, 509, 115 Pac. 320. It follows, inevitably, that there can be no substantial recovery on account of any heir who has not suffered substantial pecuniary injury. This was in effect decided by this court in Burk v. Arcata, etc., R. R. Co., 125 Cal. 364, 57 Pac. 1065, 73 Am. St. Rep. 52, where the syllabi correctly state the questions decided as follows:

"In an action for a death brought by the adult collateral heirs of the deceased, the mere fact that they are such heirs does not tend to show pecuniary damage; and in the absence of other proof tending to show actual damages, or, at least, probable loss, resulting to them from the death, the jury should be instructed that their recovery must be limited to nominal damages."

"Mere speculative or conjectural possibilities of benefits to the parties complaining are not a proper basis for an estimate of damages resulting from a death."

[3] In the light afforded by the views expressed in our decisions, it is obvious that the distribution among "heirs" of damages recovered by the statutory trustee must be upon the basis of the pecuniary loss of each, rather than upon his rights under our succession statutes with regard to property constituting the estate left by the decedent. How perfectly absurd it would appear to be to hold that where the whole amount of a recovery is given solely on account of the pecuniary injury to the surviving wife, one-half thereof must go to a surviving father or mother or brother or sister of decedent who has suffered no pecuniary injury whatever. Yet such would be the effect of appellant's construction of the section. Her contention is based almost solely on the use of the word "heirs," and the meaning of that word as used in the law of this state. Appellant is undoubtedly right in her claim as to the meaning of the word "heirs." It denotes, as said in Redfield v. Oakland, etc., Co., 110 Cal. 277, 290, 42 Pac. 822, 825, all "those who are capable of inheriting from the deceased person" under our statutes of succession, or as said in Estate of Watts, 179 Cal. 20, 22, 175 Pac. 415, 416, "the persons who would by the statute succeed to the real estate [or in California estate of any kind] in case of intestacy." But, as said in the Redfield Case, supra:

"The recovery is for the injury inflicted upon the plaintiffs personally, and not for injuries inflicted upon her [the deceased]; and the word 'heirs' in the statute is intended to limit the right of recovery to a class of persons who, because of their relation to the deceased, are supposed to be injured by her death." (Italics are ours.)

In other words, the plain design of the statute is to give solely to the members of a certain class the opportunity to recover damages for such pecuniary loss as they had suffered by reason of the death of the decedent, and to recompense, in so far as the law can do so, each of such class who has suffered pecuniary loss.

There is nothing in our statute compelling a different construction from that which, in our opinion, our decisions give to section 377, Code of Civil Procedure, as was the situation in Snedeker v. Snedeker, 164 N. Y. 58, 58 N. E. 4, relied on by appellant. The New York statute expressly provided that the amount collected in such an action "must be distributed by the plaintiff, as if they were unbequeathed assets, left in his hands after payment of all debts and expenses of administration." Manifestly this decision cannot assist in the construction of our statute. And we may well say with relation to decisions from other states relied on by counsel for appellant, as was said in Earley v. Pacific, etc., Ry. Co., 176 Cal. 79, 80, 167 Pac. 513 (L. R. A. 1918A, 997):

"It would not be without interest, but at the same time it is wholly unnecessary to follow these learned counsel in their analyses of the varying statutes and the decisions of the courts upon them. For when the last word shall have been said in such a consideration, the paramount fact will still remain that rights under our section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure are to be defined, not by what other courts have said touching their own statutes, but from the meaning and intent of our own law derived from a reading of it."

It is interesting to note that our original statute relative to actions of this character (Stats. 1862, p. 448) contained a provision directing distribution of the proceeds of the action to "the widow and next of kin," "in the proportions provided by law in relation to the distribution of personal property left by persons dying intestate," and that when it came to the enactment of the Codes the whole subject-matter was revised and the direction as to distribution entirely omitted.

[4] One word more with relation to the procedure adopted in this matter. The matter was apparently treated as a proceeding in probate, and is entitled "In the matter of the Estate of Egisto Riccomi, deceased." As we have seen, this money constituted no part of the estate of said deceased, and the proceeding is not one within the probate jurisdiction of the superior court. However, the proceeding was in substance one on behalf of an heir of the deceased against a trustee for an accounting and recovery of moneys as to which a beneficial interest on the part of such heir is alleged. It was one as to the subject-matter of which the superior court had full jurisdiction, and by virtue of their appearance the court had jurisdiction also of the parties, with the result that its order or judgment is an effective adjudication as between the parties. See Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 707, 711, 712, 137 Pac. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209.

The judgment or order appealed from is affirmed.

KAVANAUGH v. FRANKLIN FIRE INS. CO. OF PHILADELPHIA, PA. (L. A. 6479.)

1. Insurance ⟸328(5) — Buyer of property "sole and unconditional owner," within policy.

The buyer and not the seller of property was the "sole and unconditional owner," within the meaning of the term as used in a policy of fire insurance, providing the policy should be void, unless otherwise agreed in writing, if insured was not sole and unconditional owner.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Second Series, Sole and Unconditional Ownership.]

2. Insurance ⟸377(1)—Fire insurer, which did not know of changed ownership, could not have waived condition of policy.

Where a fire insurance company knew nothing of the changed ownership of the insured premises, it cannot be said that it waived the condition of the policy that it should be void if the interest of insured should be other than unconditional and sole ownership.

3. Insurance ⟸392(1)—Fire insurer not estopped to set up invalidity of policy under clause relative to unconditional ownership.

Fire insurer, which issued policy providing it should be void, unless otherwise agreed in writing, if insured was not sole and unconditional owner, held not estopped to set up invalidity of the policy under such provision, where, immediately on ascertaining the fact that a mistake had been made, the company recovered the policy from its custodian and issued a new and valid policy, and did not collect the premium on the old policy from plaintiff insured, but collected the premium from the person properly insured under the new policy.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by John A. Kavanaugh against the Franklin Fire Insurance Company of Philadelphia, Pa. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. W. Hindman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Allison & Dickson, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover for a fire loss upon an insurance policy issued by the defendant corporation May 26, 1915, in San Bernardino. The policy was in the standard form required by our statute (Stats. 1909, p. 406, § 1), which statutory form contained the following provision:

"Unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, this entire policy shall be void * * * (b) if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership. * * *"

It is required that there shall be printed upon the back of such policy the following:

"Read this policy. * * * Policy is void, unless otherwise agreed in writing, if * * * (5) insured is not sole and unconditional owner."

Section 9 of the statute (page 411) provides:

"Clauses may be added to the standard form (a) covering property and risks not otherwise covered; * * * (d) waivers of any of the matters avoiding the policy or suspending the insurance. * * *"

And section 12, page 411, provides as follows:

"Any insurer, or the agent, countersigning or issuing a fire insurance policy covering * * * property in California varying from the * * * standard form of policy except as herein provided is guilty of a misdemeanor but any policy so issued shall notwithstanding be binding upon the company issuing the same."

On the trial it was stipulated: That plaintiff at the time the policy was written was in San Diego, and that he made no written representation to the company and no representation to the company of any kind, character, or nature regarding his title of the property. That prior to the issuance of the policy in question there was a policy that had been issued by N. Adair as the agent for this defendant company. That the policy was made payable to plaintiff and to the Santa Fé Building & Loan Association, mortgagee. That that policy was at the time of the issuance of the policy in suit in possession of the building association. That at the time the former policy expired N. Adair, as agent of the company, without any solicitation from the plaintiff in this case, but with his full approval and consent that a new policy be issued, issued the policy in question and delivered it to the Santa Fé Building & Loan Association, the policy of the defendant company. That at the time this policy was issued and delivered neither the defendant nor its agent, N. Adair, knew or had notice of the fact that plaintiff in this case had executed and delivered to one Marks an agreement of sale for the premises insured. After the making and executing of the policy, and on the 22d day of June, 1915, the agent of the defendant company, N. Adair, went out to the insured house to collect the premium on the policy of insurance that had been issued and delivered to the building association in the name of Kavanaugh and the building association, and inquired of the occupants of the house where Mr. Kavanaugh was. That he was informed by the wife of Mr. Marks that plaintiff had sold the property to Mr. Marks and had placed him in possession thereof, and that that was the first actual notice that he had of any change of title to this property, or anything that would affect the title of the property. On the same day, and immediately upon receiving such information, the agent of the defendant company went to the Santa Fé Building & Loan Association, and requested them to return the policy of insurance in this case, which was done, and that that policy was at once canceled by the agent of the defendant company, N. Adair. The plaintiff, however, did not give his consent to the cancellation of the policy, and no notice of cancellation was given him, as required by the terms of the policy, of an intended cancellation. He simply asked the building association for the policy, and they delivered it up to him, and he took it over to his office, and marked "Canceled" across the face, and sent it to the company. No notice of any kind was ever given by N. Adair, the agent of the company, to plaintiff of his intention to cancel it, until August, 1917, after the fire, which occurred December 29, 1916. That immediately after taking up the policy of insurance in question in this case, on the 22d of June, 1915, the defendant company, through its agent, N. Adair, issued another policy, being policy No. 2,741,852 and made it out in favor of A. L. Marks, with a loss payable clause to the Santa Fé Building & Loan Association, mortgagee. That that policy was delivered to the building and loan association at the time of its issuance. That after its issuance the building and loan association was paid off in full, and the policy was then delivered to Mr. Marks. After the fire occurred Mr. Marks made claim on the defendant for the loss, and the defendant settled with Mr. Marks for the loss, and refused to recognize the rights of the plaintiff in this case. No premium was ever paid on the policy in question. Marks paid the premium on the other policy issued to him.

As to the nonpayment of the premium, the plaintiff offered the following explanation, stating that it would be substantiated by Mr. Marks, namely, that Mr. Marks had paid the premium; that Mr. Kavanaugh was in San Diego; and he relied upon that information, and no bill was sent to him, and he assumed it had been paid, having no information to the contrary; and it being proper and right Mr. Marks should pay it, Mr. Marks being indebted to Mr. Kavanaugh.

On July 31, 1914, the plaintiff and one Arthur L. Marks had entered into a written contract for the sale of the insured premises for the sum of $2,800. The vendee was immediately given possession of the premises and continued to keep up his payments upon the property, and at the time of the fire had paid approximately $1,100, and after the fire paid $1,285, and had received a deed from the plaintiff, and was at the time of the trial the owner of the property. With reference to the effecting of the insurance the plaintiff testified that—

"Mr. Marks agreed to pay the premium; that he had never been billed by the company or any of its agents for the premium on the policy; that Mr. N. Adair had been writing plaintiff's insurance for about ten years, and he was to write this policy for three years and deposit it with the Building and Loan and I would pay the premium. I don't think I saw a policy for ten years. I trusted him to be my agent for the insurance, and he deposited it with the Building and Loan."

Plaintiff testified that he received a letter from Mr. Adair, stating that he had written the policy; that when the property was sold it was with the understanding that plaintiff pay the premium and protect the building and loan association and that Mr. N. Adair would write the policy and deposit it with the building and loan association. He was questioned and answered as follows:

"Q. You told him to keep the property insured? A. Well, he just took it for granted.

"The Court: You mean insurance agents don't need any telling? A. He didn't seem to. When the policy of insurance expired, he would notify me and say he had deposited the policy with the Building and Loan, and I supposed he was protecting my interest.

"Q. (by Mr. Hindman): You expected him to protect your interest? A. Yes.

"Q. And did you have a conversation with him about protecting your interest? A. Only originally. When I bought the place there was a policy on it then, and he said that policy would continue, and I would pay my pro rata. That was more than ten years ago, and I don't think we ever had any conversation about protecting my interest after that. It was just a matter of course.

"Q. Did you tell him to issue the policy of insurance? A. I did not. He just issued them, and sent them, and sent me the bill. * * *

"Q. You say this course was kept up for 10 years? A. Yes; I think it was over 10 years. My impression is there were four policies issued; that is, with the one I took up in the first place."

The plaintiff recovered judgment for $350.09. The amount was arrived at by a somewhat Solomonic process. The defendant appeals, but makes no complaint concerning the amount of plaintiff's loss.

[1] The plaintiff was not the sole and unconditional owner of the property at the time the policy was issued. Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., 167 Cal. 117, 138 Pac. 708, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 670. On the contrary, the vendee was the sole and unconditional owner, within the meaning of that term as used in the policy of insurance. McCollough v. Home Ins. Co., 155 Cal. 659, 102 Pac. 814, 18 Ann. Cas. 862. This seems to be the general rule in the United States. See note to Sharman v. Continental Ins. Co., supra, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 670, where it is said:

"As stated in note in 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 512, it is held that one who is at the time of the issuance of a policy of fire insurance under contract to sell to another who has absolutely bound himself to purchase the property involved cannot recover in case of loss upon a policy providing that it shall be void if the interest of the insured (unless otherwise stated) be other than 'unconditional and sole ownership.'"

See, also, Turner v. Home Ins. Co., 195 Mo. App. 138, 189 S. W. 626; Livingstone v. Boston Ins. Co., 255 Pa. 1, 99 Atl. 212; Waller v. City of New York Ins. Co., 84 Or. 284, 164 Pac. 959, Ann. Cas. 1918C, 139; Globe & Rutgers Fire Ins. Co. v. Creekmore (Okl.) 171 Pac. 874. It follows that the policy sued upon was void ab initio, and that plaintiff can recover, if at all, only upon the theory of waiver or estoppel as to the ownership of the insured property.

Prior to the enactment of the law establishing the form of a fire insurance policy, this court held that a policy issued to a person other than a sole and unconditional owner was valid as to the insurable interest of the insured, where the policy was issued without inquiry as to the title, and without any misrepresentation or concealment by the insured, and was accepted by the insured where the premium was paid to and retained by the insurer, without offer of rescission after knowledge of the facts, notwithstanding a clause that, if the interest of the insured be other than unconditional and sole ownership, the policy should be void. Sharp v. Scottish Union, etc., 136 Cal. 542, 69 Pac. 253, 615. This was a step in advance of the rule stated in Allen v. Home Ins. Co., 133 Cal. 29, 65 Pac. 138, where it was held that the issuance of such a policy waived known facts inconsistent with the conditions of the policy, as pointed out in the dissent of Chief Justice Beatty in Sharp v. Scottish Union, etc., Co., supra, 136 Cal. 546, 69 Pac. 253, 615.

Respondent relies upon the case of Raulet v. N. W., etc., Ins. Co., 157 Cal. 213, 107 Pac. 292. There a widow, sole executrix and sole devisee and legatee under the will of her deceased husband, insured the property in her own name as the sole and unconditional owner thereof. The house was destroyed by fire April 19, 1906, and thereafter, on January 8, 1907, the real estate was distributed to her. In considering the matter the court said:

"In the light of subsequent events it is clear that, if it could be said that technically she was not the sole and unconditional owner of the property because of her right to its temporary possession as executrix, she had the insurable interest in it, and no one else had any title to it, and defendant suffered no prejudice by her representation as to ownership. * * * The entire loss was sustained by plaintiff, and it seems to be a narrow view that would defeat the claim on the ground that within the contemplation of the policy she was not 'the sole and unconditional owner.' * * * In the case at bar there was no actual nor constructive fraud, no intentional misrepresentation nor concealment, no inquiry on the part of the insurance company; the plaintiff was really vested with the title, the entire loss was sustained by her, and it cannot be held that the policy was void by virtue of the sole and unconditional ownership clause."

It is apparent that the effect of this decision is that in substance and effect the widow was the "sole and unconditional owner of the insured premises." However, in that case, in discussing the question of waiver and estoppel as to a chattel mortgage upon the property, a case involving the sale and unconditional ownership clause is extensively quoted. Philadelphia Tool Co. v. British America Assurance Co., 132 Pa. 236, 19 Atl. 77, 19 Am. St. Rep. 596. It was held that the condition as to incumbrances was waived by the conduct of the defendant. It was there stated:

"There was no written application for the insurance, and, as we have seen, no actual fraud and no intentional misrepresentation by plaintiff. She was ignorant of this provision in the policy, which was secured by her agent, and no inquiry was made by the company as to the existence of any chattel mortgage.

"It must be presumed, ordinarily, that persons are familiar with the terms of written contracts to which they are parties, and in the absence of fraud they are justly bound by the provisions therein; but the rule should not be strictly applied to insurance policies. It is a matter almost of common knowledge that a very small percentage of policy holders are actually cognizant of the provisions of their policies, and many of them are ignorant of the names of the companies issuing the said policies. The policies are prepared by the experts of the companies, they are highly technical in their phraseology, they are complicated and voluminous—the one before us covering 13 pages of the transcript—and in their numerous conditions and stipulations furnishing what sometimes may be veritable traps for the unwary. The insured usually confides implicitly in the agent securing the insurance, and it is only just and equitable that the company should be required to call specifically to the attention of the policy holder such provisions as the one before us. The courts, while zealous to uphold legal contracts, should not sacrifice the spirit to the letter, nor should they be slow to aid the confiding and innocent. The defendant should either have made inquiries in reference to the chattel mortgage, required a written application covering by question and answer all the material provisions of the policy, or have consulted the records in the recorder's office where it would have been apprised of the incumbrance. Considering the nature of the contract and the relation of the parties, there should be no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that this provision was waived; and it therefore constitutes no bar to recovery."

The appellant contends that these rules which have been evolved as a part of the law relating to insurance policies have no application to the situation in California, where the form of the policy is prescribed by statute and the insurance company is prohibited by penal enactment from issuing any other form of policy. While it is true that an insurance policy is a contract, it is recognized that, in the decisions bearing upon the responsibility of the insurance company, the policy has been treated more as a commodity than as a contract, and rules have been evolved which are not applicable to ordinary contracts. It is therefore considered that when an insurance company, without any inquiry as to the character of the ownership of the insured, issues a policy and receives a premium therefor, it is just to assume that the insurance company intended to cover whatever interest the insured had in the property, and that the insured, by accepting a policy and paying the premium, had the same understanding as to the legal effect of the policy. This conclusion is based somewhat upon the fact that insurance policies are usually very lengthy and contain a great many conditions in language which is somewhat obscure to the layman, and that the insurance company, having the power to write its policy in any form and in any language it chooses, should be deemed to have adopted language which would fulfill the mutual intent of the parties, or, if not, should be estopped from claiming that its policy was void ab initio. A number of states have adopted laws providing for a standard form of insurance policy. These laws are not uniform in terms, and the decisions thereunder have varied, not only because of such lack of uniformity, but because of a divergence of views of the courts passing upon the effects of such legislation. Cooley, Briefs on the Law of Insurance, 528.

[2] This much is clear, at least, that both parties to the fire insurance policy must be deemed to have entered into a contract with reference to the statutory form. In other words, the statutory form is the commodity which is bought and sold in an insurance transaction. The policy in this case, as already stated, was void ab initio. It can only be given validity as against the insurance company by the applications of the principles of waiver and of estoppel. It cannot be said that the insurance company waived this condition of the policy because the company knew nothing of the changed ownership of the premises. Byrant v. Granite Fire Ins. Co., 174 Mich. 102, 107, 140 N. W. 482; Dahrooge v. Fire Ass. Co., 175 Mich. 251, 141 N. W. 572.

[3] Is the company estopped under the circumstances to set up the invalidity of the policy herein sued on? Assuming that the agent, N. Adair, was at all times acting for the corporation, we find that the policy was issued under a mistake of facts, which resulted from the fact that the insured had sold the property and thus invalidated the policy of the defendant company then in existence, and had failed to notify the company in connection wth the renewal of the insurance that such change of ownership had occurred. Immediately upon ascertaining the fact that a mistake had been made, the company recovered the policy from its custodian and issued a new and valid policy covering the same property. It did not collect the premium upon the old policy from the plaintiff, who was thereby insured, but, instead, collected the premium from the person who was properly insured under the new policy. On the other hand, plaintiff made no application for the insurance, did not accept the policy when issued, and failed to pay the premium thereon when demanded. In short, he did nothing, said nothing, and paid nothing, and now seeks to recover upon a policy which he never received, never saw, and of which he alleges in his complaint he does not now know the contents. If the plaintiff can be said to have acted at all in the matter, he acted either through N. Adair, who issued the policy and replaced it by the new, or through the building and loan association, which accepted the old policy and surrendered it for the new, or through Marks, who, upon being notified of the issuance of the policy which was void ab initio, arranged for the issuance of a new policy properly covering the property and paid the premium thereon. All of these parties actively participated in the arrangement by which the new policy was substituted for the old.

It is proper to observe in this connection that both the policy sued on and the one issued in lieu thereof contained the provision that, "if the insured now has or shall procure any other insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy," the entire policy shall be void. The second policy enabled the purchaser to secure the money with which to pay the purchase price, notwithstanding the fact that the building purchased had been destroyed. It is fairly apparent, though not expressly proven, that this insurance money was in fact used to pay the plaintiff the balance upon the contract price. It would obviously be unjust to the insurance company under such circumstances to hold them under both policies, where each contemplated that no other policy should be issued or should be in existence. There is no basis upon which to establish an estoppel against the company. The only wrong complained of is that they substituted a valid policy for a void policy; that they secured the premium for the issuance of the valid policy, and refrained from collecting the premium upon the void policy; and that when the loss occurred they paid the full amount of the loss to the holder of the valid policy, who in turn was thereby enabled to pay to the plaintiff the amount of his purchase price.

WESTERN LITHOGRAPH CO. v. VANOMAR PRODUCERS. (L. A. 6423.)

1. Corporations ⟸410—President of canning company held authorized to order labels.

President of a canning corporation, who was also the general manager and in general charge of its business, had authority to contract for the purchase of labels, their purchase being but a detail of the business.

2. Corporations ⟸426(10)—Use of labels a ratification of contract of purchase by president of canning company.

Where president of canning corporation without authority contracted to pay a price in excess of contract price for labels purchased, there was an ample ratification by the corporation where it accepted the labels and paid for them at the increased price for one season and part of another.

3. Contracts ⟸75(2)—Promise to pay consideration in excess of contract without consideration.

Where plaintiff agreed to sell to a canning company all labels it should require for five years for a certain price, its naked promise to pay an increased price by reason of increase in cost of labor and material is not supported by a valuable consideration and is not enforceable, under Civ. Code, § 1605.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by the Western Lithograph Company against the Vanomar Producers. Judgment for plaintiff and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Bryant, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant, a corporation, from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action to recover the price of certain labels sold and delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. It appears that the defendant is a fruit canning concern requiring labels for its goods, and the plaintiff is a maker of labels. In February, 1916, they entered into a formal contract in writing whereby the defendant agreed to buy of the plaintiff and the plaintiff agreed to furnish the defendant all the labels the latter should need during the next ensuing five years at certain specified prices dependent upon the character of the labels ordered. The contract was performed for the year 1916 at the prices specified. By June of the next year, however, the cost of materials and labor had increased greatly, with a consequent increase to the plaintiff of the cost of making labels. This was represented to the president and general manager of the defendant, and he was requested to agree to a flat increase of thirty-five cents per thousand on the contract prices. This he did by letter dated June 15, 1917, addressed to the plaintiff, and reading:

"Gentlemen: Referring to the conversation held between your Mr. Courtlander and the writer, we wish to say that we shall be very glad to pay you a sum equal to 35c per M., beyond our contract price, for all labels which we may receive from you this season's pack.

"We appreciate the efforts you have made in the past to meet our wishes and requirements and thoroughly understand some of the obstacles which confront you in the endeavor to take care of your large business this season."

The labels for 1917 were delivered and paid for at the increased rates. Those for 1918 were likewise delivered and payments on account made. There was, however, an unpaid balance of some $6,700 at the original contract prices and of some $9,400 at the increased prices, and for the latter sum the present action was brought. The defendant's answer admits liability for the $6,700, but denies it for anything over that amount. The plaintiff recovered judgment for the $9,400, and the defendant appeals.

It is evident that the defendant's liability for the difference between the two sums mentioned, which is all that is in controversy, turns on the validity of the defendant's promise to pay the extra thirty-five cents per thousand evidenced by the letter quoted.

The defendant advances two grounds why the promise is not valid—first, that the defendant's president had no authority to give it, and, second, that it is not supported by a consideration.

[1] The first of these grounds cannot be sustained. It is true that the original contract was formally executed in the name of the defendant by its president and secretary and under its seal and with authority from its board of directors while the letter was not under seal, was signed by the president only, and was not authorized by the defendant's board of directors, who knew nothing about it. But the fact was that the president was also the general manager of the corporation and in general charge of its business, that the matter of purchasing labels was but a detail of that business, and that the president was permitted by the defendant to make other contracts of similar nature, either for the purchase of supplies or for carrying on the regular business of the company in other respects, without reporting them to the directors or securing specific authority from them. This was enough. The authorities on the point are numerous, and the more modern ones are practically without conflict. It is necessary only to refer to Crowley v. Genesee Mining Co., 55 Cal. 273, and Aigeltinger v. Burke, 176 Cal. 621, where at page 626 of 176 Cal., page 376 of 169 Pac., the following is quoted with approval:

" 'Where one has the actual charge and management of the general business of a corporation, with the knowledge of the members, or the directors, this is sufficient evidence of authority, and the company will be bound by his contracts, made on their behalf, within the apparent scope of the business intrusted to him. * * * A corporation which suffers appearances to exist, and its officers and agents to so act, as to give one employed by such officers and agents reason to believe that he is employed by the company, becomes liable to such person as his (its) employee to pay for the services rendered.' "

[2] Furthermore, it made no difference whether the defendant's president originally had authority or not. It accepted the labels and paid for them at the increased price for one season and part of another. This was an ample ratification. McKell v. Chesapeake, etc., Co., 175 Fed. 321, 99 C. C. A. 109, 20 Ann. Cas. 1097.

[3] The second contention of the defendant, however, must be sustained. A naked promise unsupported by a consideration is not enforceable, and a consideration is defined by the Code (section 1605, Civ. Code) as follows:

"Any benefit conferred, or agreed to be conferred, upon the promisor, by any other person, to which the promisor is not lawfully entitled, or any prejudice suffered, or agreed to be suffered, by such person, other than such as he is at the time of consent lawfully bound to suffer as an inducement to the promisor, is a good consideration for a promise."

Now, the letter of June 15, 1917, was merely an agreement to pay an increase over the prices at which the plaintiff was already lawfully bound to the defendant to deliver labels. It is evident that because of the promise the defendant received no benefit, nor was it agreed that it should receive any, to which it was not already lawfully entitled. It is likewise evident that the plaintiff did nothing and agreed to do nothing which it was not already obligated to do. A plainer case of a mere naked promise it would be difficult to imagine. The courts in some instances have held that where one party to a contract refuses to go on with it, and the other party to induce him to go on promises to pay him additional compensation, such promise is supported by a consideration. The theories upon which this conclusion is reached are various and it is exceedingly doubtful if any of them are sound. Alaska Packers' Ass'n v. Domenico, 117 Fed. 99, 54 C. C. A. 485. The authorities are collated and their different rules well stated in 13 Corpus Juris, 351–355. But so far as we are aware, the authorities are in practical agreement that where, as here, all that appears is that one party found himself with a losing contract and, without abandoning it, requested the other party to pay him more, which the other party promised to do, the promise is without consideration.

It is stated in Corpus Juris (vol. 13, p. 355) that—

"In Minnesota the court, while adopting the view that the obligation imposed by a contract is to perform the contract and not to pay damages, and that there is ordinarily no consideration for a promise of additional pay to induce performance, introduces the anomalous exception that, where the party refusing to complete his contract does so by reason of some unforeseen and substantial difficulty in the performance of the contract, which was not known or anticipated by the parties when the contract was entered into, and which cast on him an additional burden not contemplated, and the opposite party promises him extra pay or benefits if he will complete his contract, and he so promises, the promise to pay is supported by a valid consideration. * * *"

The plaintiff seeks to bring the present case within this supposed rule of the Minnesota cases because of the unexpected increases in the cost of manufacture which confronted it. But surely unexpected increases in manufacturing costs are just the risk which every manufacturer assumes and contemplates when he enters into a contract to make goods for future delivery. Furthermore, an examination of the Minnesota cases will show that the unforeseen difficulties to which they refer are difficulties existing by reason of facts unknown to the parties when they enter into the contract, so that it was entered into under a mistake. Michaud v. MacGregor, 61 Minn. 198, 63 N. W. 479; King v. Duluth, etc., Co., 61 Minn. 482, 63 N. W. 1105. In the latter case it is said: "Inadequacy of the contract price which is the result of an error of judgment and not of some excusable mistake of fact, is not sufficient." Whether the rule of these cases be correct or not, it has no application to a case where the increased costs of the contractor are due merely to fluctuations in the market price of labor and materials. The risk of such fluctuations is a burden which he necessarily contemplates and assumes when he makes the contract. Such, and such only, is the present case.

Judgment reversed.

THOMAS HAVERTY CO. v. JONES. (L. A. 5711.)

1. Contracts ⊂=294—Party not entitled to any part of contract price until full performance, unless excused or prevented.

At common law, the general rule is that one agreeing to do a thing for another for a specified sum, to be paid on full performance, is not entitled to any part of the contract price until he has done the thing he agreed to do, unless full performance has been excused, prevented, or delayed by the other party, by operation of law, or by the act of God or the public enemy.

2. Contracts ⊂=295(1)—Rule as to recovery on substantial performance of building contract stated.

Where the owner has taken possession of a building, and is enjoying the fruits of the building contractor's work in performance of the contract, if there has been a substantial performance by the contractor in good faith, and the failure to make full performance can be compensated in damages, and the omissions and deviations were not willful or fraudulent, and do not substantially affect the usefulness of the building for its intended purposes, the contractor, in an action on the contract, may recover the contract price, less the amount allowed as damages.

3. Contracts ⊂=295(1)—Curable defects in construction of plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant held not to prevent substantial performance.

Where the contract price for constructing a plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant was $27,332.66, and the total cost of the building about $186,000, defects in the construction of the plant, which could be removed or compensated at a total cost of $99.21, did not prevent recovery as for substantial performance.

⊂=For other cases see same topic and KEY-NUMBER in all Key-Numbered Digests and Indexes

4. Contracts ⊂⊃295(1)—Defects in plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant, reducing value of building, held within the rule as to substantial performance.

Where the contract price for installing a plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant was $27,332.66, and the total cost of the building about $186,000, omissions and substitutions in the construction of the plant, not virtually affecting the usefulness of the systems, nor impairing their efficiency, serviceability, or durability, but which reduced the value of the building in the sum of $2,180.88, held within the rule as to substantial performance.

5. Appeal and error ⊂⊃989—Evidence contrary to findings and creating conflict cannot be considered.

Where the trial court's findings are supported by substantial evidence, opposing evidence, which merely creates a conflict, cannot be considered by the Supreme Court.

6. Contracts ⊂⊃295(1)—Injury to supports of building by contractor's employees held a trespass, not affecting the question of substantial performance.

The cutting of cantilevers, composing part of the foundation supports of a building, by employees of a contractor installing a plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant, was a mere trespass, and had no bearing on the question of substantial performance of the contract.

7. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1011(1)—Findings on sharply conflicting evidence not disturbed.

Where there was a sharp conflict in the evidence as to whether cantilevers, cut by employees of a plumbing contractor, could be repaired, so as to support additional stories, which the owner intended to erect, the findings cannot be disturbed.

8. Evidence ⊂⊃568(1)—Opinion not admissible as to whether supports of building, when repaired, would uphold additional stories.

Whether cantilevers supporting a building, cut by employees of a plumbing contractor, could be repaired, so as to sustain additional stories which the owner intended to erect, was a question of fact, and not of law, to be determined from the evidence, and not solely from the opinion of the owner, his engineers, and architect.

9. Contracts ⊂⊃284(3)—Performance to satisfaction of architect not required, when named architects discharged, and no other substituted.

Where a contract required the work to be performed to the satisfaction of architects named therein, but they were discharged, and another architect employed, without any agreement for his substitution, architect's certificates were not required, and performance to the satisfaction of the architects was not a condition of the contractor's right to recover.

10. Contracts ⊂⊃282—Performance of building contract, which should satisfy reasonable persons, satisfies contract providing for performance to owner's satisfaction.

A contract to install a plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant to the satisfaction of the owner was complied with by performance which should be satisfactory to a reasonable person; the question being one of operative fitness or mechanical utility, and not involving matters dependent on fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment.

11. Appeal and error ⊂⊃970(3)—Permitting testimony that contract was performed according to specifications, without requiring specific proof, held harmless.

In an action on a contract for the installation of a plumbing, heating, and ventilating system, the admission of testimony in answer to a general question asked the contractor's employees, that work was performed in accordance with the specifications, was harmless, where ample opportunity was given to cross-examine them, and the whole matter was gone into at great length.

12. Contracts ⊂⊃305(1)—Strict performance of provision of plumbing contract as to making drawings held waived.

Where a contract for the installation of a plumbing, heating, and ventilating plant required the contractor to keep complete records of his installation, and to show by drawings every important detail of the system, but the owner never expressed dissatisfaction with inaccurate drawings, or demanded any different or additional report or statement, strict performance was waived.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Thomas Haverty Company against G. M. Jones to recover an unpaid balance on a contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying a motion to set aside the judgment, and render judgment for defendant, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Meserve & Meserve, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. Shankland, Sheldon Borden, and George H. Moore, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and also from an order, made after judgment, denying his motion to set aside the judgment and render a judgment in his favor on the findings.

The complaint states a cause of action to recover the balance alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon a contract for the construction of the plumbing, steam heating, and ventilation plant in a four-story building erected by the defendant. The answer admitted the making of the contract but denied that the same had been fully performed by the plaintiff, and also alleged that the performance was defective in many particulars, whereby he was damaged in a large sum of money, exceeding the amount claimed by the plaintiff, and also that certain damages had been caused to the building by the carelessness of the plaintiff in doing the work called for by the contract, whereby he was also damaged. He asked judgment for the amount of damages claimed in his answer. The same matters were also set up in a separate pleading designated as a cross-complaint.

The court found that the plaintiff had performed the work called for by the contract, except in certain particulars set forth at length in the findings, concerning which the court found that the specifications included in the contract were not directly followed. As to nine of these particulars the court found that the omissions could be remedied at a cost amounting in all to $99.21. With respect to certain other defects, the court found that they could not be remedied without a greater expense than their importance would justify, but that the resulting damage to the building amounted to only $2,180.88. With respect to these failures to fully perform the contract the court further found that they were not done willfully or fraudulently, but that the same were due to mistakes and misinterpretations of the contract by the plaintiff's employees, or because the deviations from the specifications were believed to be necessary for the proper construction of the work and beneficial to the defendant; that there was a substantial performance of the contract, and that the difference in value to the defendant by the failure in full performance, and the damages caused thereby could be compensated by a deduction from the contract price. It also found that in the course of construction certain workmen of the plaintiff, without its orders, partially cut through some cantilevers in the basement of the building, and that the same could be repaired at an expense of $650.78. The balance due to the plaintiff upon the contract price, including the charges for extras furnished in pursuance of a provision of the contract, after deducting certain omissions which were agreed to, certain labor performed by the defendant himself, and the payments made by him before the beginning of the action, amounted to $10,775.64. From this sum the court deducted the sum allowed for the remediable defects, as aforesaid, the damages amounting to $2,180.88 arising from the irremediable defects, and $650.78, allowed for the cost of the repairing the cantilevers, amounting in all to $2,930.87, leaving a balance of $7,844.77, for which sum judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff.

[1, 2] The principal point presented in the case is the question of the right of a building contractor to recover the contract price where he has not completely performed the contract. The law in this state on this subject has been considered in several recent decisions and is now comparatively well established. The general rule on the subject of performance is that—

"Where a person agrees to do a thing for another for a specified sum of money to be paid on full performance, he is not entitled to any part of the sum until he has himself done the thing he agreed to do, unless full performance has been excused, prevented, or delayed by the act of the other party, or by operation of law, or by the act of God or the public enemy." Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 696, 109 Pac. 30.

This, of course, refers to actions upon the contract for the contract price. The right to sue on an implied contract for the value of a partial performance is a different question, and is not here involved. The rule just stated is that prevailing at common law. It has now been greatly relaxed, and it is settled, especially in the case of building contracts, where the owner has taken possession of the building and is enjoying the fruits of the contractor's work in the performance of the contract, that if there has been a substantial performance thereof by the contractor in good faith, where the failure to make full performance can be compensated in damages, to be deducted from the price or allowed as a counterclaim, and the omissions and deviations were not willful or fraudulent, and do not substantially affect the usefulness of the building for the purposes for which it was intended, the contractor may, in an action upon the contract, recover the amount unpaid of his contract price less the amount allowed as damages for the failure in strict performance. 9 Corp. In 9 Corpus Juris, 739, the rule is summarized as follows:

"The hardship of the rule requiring strict performance in order to permit recovery on a contract generally, when applied to a builder who has undesignedly violated his contract, and the inequitable advantage that it gives to an owner who receives and retains the benefit of the builder's labor and materials, have led to its qualification; and it is generally held that, where the compensation is due only on the performance of the contract, a literal and strict performance is not required, and if the builder, acting in good faith and intending and attempting to perform his contract, does so, he may recover the contract price, notwithstanding slight and trivial defects or deviations in performance, for which compensation may be made, in all its material and substantial particulars, by an allowance to the owner; but the owner is entitled to an allowance for the damages he may suffer by reason of the failure to perform strictly, such as the cost or expense of putting the structure or work in the condition called for by the contract."

Many cases supporting the several statements of the text are cited in the footnotes. One of the clearest statements of the law on the subject is found in Handy v. Bliss, 204 Mass. 518, 90 N. E. 864, 134 Am. St. Rep. 673, where the court said:

"There must be such an approximation to complete performance that the owner obtains substantially what was called for by the contract, although it may not be the same in every particular, and although there may be omissions and imperfections on account of which there should be a deduction from the contract price. It is not necessary that the work should be complete in all material respects, nor that there should be no omissions of work that cannot be done by the owner, except at great expense or with great risk to the building. There may be omissions of that which could not afterwards be supplied exactly as called for by the contract without taking down the building to its foundations, and at the same time the omission may not affect the value of the building for use or otherwise, except so slightly as to be hardly appreciable. Notwithstanding such omission, there might be a substantial performance of the contract. * * * An intentional omission to do certain things called for by the contract, if he believes that they are not called for, and intends in good faith to do all that he has agreed to do, does not prevent the application of the doctrine."

It is worthy of remark that this relaxation of the rigid rule of the common law is, after all, little more than a change from form to substance in the administration of justice. At common law, where a person failed to strictly perform a building contract, if the work actually done benefited the owner and to some extent served his purpose, the contractor could recover the reasonable value of the work done, in an action in quantum meruit, and the owner could recoup the damage he had sustained from the breach of the contract to fully perform. But if the contractor, believing he had fully performed, sued on the contract for the agreed price, the action, under the rigid rules as to forms of action, would be defeated upon a showing by the owner that there had been a failure to perform the contract in the least material particular. Forms of action are now abolished, and one of the main reasons for adherence to the rigid rule of the common law is thereby removed. Since the contractor would in justice be entitled to recover the reasonable value of the work done, not exceeding the contract price, no good reason now appears why, in a suit upon the contract for the price, he should not be allowed to recover the price, less the reasonable compensation to the owner for any damages arising from a failure to completely perform, provided the contractor has acted in good faith, and the article or building is so far completed that it reasonably serves the purpose for which it was intended by the owner. Substantial justice is provided by this course of procedure and no real property right is violated.

The question what constitutes substantial performance is one of some difficulty. In Connell v. Higgins, supra, it was said that the question is usually "to be determined in each case with reference to the existing facts and circumstances." In 9 Corpus Juris, 741, it is said that there is a substantial performance where the variance from the specifications of the contract does not impair the building or structure as a whole, and where after it is erected the building is actually used for the intended purpose, or where the defects can be remedied without great expenditure and without material damage to other parts of the structure, but that the defects must not run through the whole work, so that the object of the owner to have the work done in a particular way is not accomplished, or be such that a new contract is not substituted for the original one, nor be so substantial as not to be capable of a remedy, and the allowance out of the contract price will not give the owner essentially what he contracted for.

[3] According to the testimony of the defendant, the actual cost of the building, including the Haverty contract was about $186,000. The contract price of the work to be done by the plaintiff under the contract sued on, including the extras, was $27,332.66. The sum of $99.21, deducted as the cost of remedying the curable defects, was of course, a trivial matter. In Rischard v. Miller, supra, the defects could be removed or compensated at the total cost of $99.50 in the building of a house costing $2,600, and we there held that the performance was substantial, and that the contractor could recover the balance due on the contract price, less the $99.50. So far as this point is concerned, that case fully answers the objections of the defendant.

[4] The sum of $2,180.88, allowed as damages on account of defects which could not be removed or remedied, seemed at first blush to be rather large to come within the rule as to substantial performance. It was because of our desire to further consider this point that a rehearing of the case was granted after decision of the District Court of Appeal affirming the judgment. The finding as to damages from these defects is that they reduced the value of the building by the amount of $2,180.88. As compared to a building costing $27,332, a reduction in value of $2,180.88 by departures from the contract might appear to be substantial, although we would not say, in view of the above authorities, that it would of necessity prevent a recovery of the contract price less the damages. But, when the reduction is only $2,180.88 in the value of a building costing $186,000, it does not seem so large in comparison. Upon a consideration of the details of the respective failures in performance, we find them to be really of trifling character compared to the cost of the building. The character and effect of the departures from the contract as shown by the detailed findings, scarcely sustain the general finding as to the reduction in the value of the building caused thereby. Certainly the court gave the defendant the benefit of every doubt on the subject.

There were twelve so-called "irremediable defects," to wit: (1) The substitution of wrought iron screw fittings to waste and drain pipes, instead of cast iron fittings, known as "Durham couplings." (2) The substitution of galvanized steel pipe for extra heavy cast iron pipe in certain sewer connections. (3) The failure to cover with asbestos paper the hot-water pipes extending through parts of the second and third stories, which failure was in part due to the fact that the defendant inclosed the walls before the covering was put on. The defendant erected the other parts of the building. (4) The substitution of galvanized iron sleeves where pipes passed through walls and floors, instead of so-called Crane telescoping sleeves; the latter being unsuitable for such a building. (5) The failure to install 597 feet of radiation out of 3,502 square feet required by the specifications. This omission was due in part to the fact that part of the specified radiation was omitted by order of the defendant. (6) The failure to install air chambers at the top ends of service pipes for hot and cold water in the attic. (7) The installation of cut-out valves on the hot-water pipes in the attic, instead of installing them near to the ceiling of the top floor. (8) The use of short bends, instead of long turn bends, in the 3-inch cold-water main supply pipe at several places in the basement and attic, and at one place between the basement and attic. (9) The use of supply pipes in the attic for a portion of the distance required to be run, which were smaller than the sizes specified. (10) The substitution of three-fourths inch pipe, instead of one-inch pipe, in 15 out of 31 of the cold-water pipes extending through the third and fourth floors. (11) The substitution of three-fourths inch pipe for one-inch pipe in eleven out of 31 of the hot-water pipes extending through the third and fourth floors. (12) The substitution of No. 8 steel for No. 10 steel in the breeching of the boiler.

With respect to the defects numbered 1, 2, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 12 the court found that the material and construction substituted for that specified was equally as efficient and durable when so placed, as that which was specified would have been. As to the failure to cover the hot-water pipes with asbestos paper (No. 3), the court found that it was not true that it would or did result in serious damage or injury to the building. With respect to the failure to install the whole of the radiation (No. 5), the court found that the radiation as constructed is amply sufficient for the purpose intended. With respect to the substitution of smaller for larger sizes of cold-water and hot-water pipes (Nos. 10 and 11) the court further found that the smaller sizes are sufficient to amply supply with water the fixtures connecting therewith.

It further appears from the evidence that the difference between the actual cost of the articles substituted and the actual cost of those specified in the several defects classed as irremediable amounted to only $196.32. Of this difference $137.31 is due to the cost of the 597 square feet of radiation omitted by the plaintiff. Some of this, but how much does not appear, was omitted by direction of the defendant. This leaves $59.01 as the difference on account of the other items. The evidence also shows that the plaintiff in many things substituted better and costlier material in place of the material specified, and that this additional cost was greater than the reduction in cost by the substitutions of less expensive material. It also appears that in some instances it was difficult, and in other instances impossible, to obtain materials of the exact character prescribed in the specifications, and that the plaintiff obtained such material as could be had, sometimes at greater and sometimes at less expense than adherence to the specifications would have required.

In summing up the case finding X states that the changes and substitutions made by plaintiff in the systems of plumbing, heating, and ventilation it constructed in performing the contract "do not virtually affect the usefulness of said systems," nor "impair the efficiency, serviceability, or durability thereof," that they have performed, are performing, and are adequate to perform all the purposes intended, "to the same extent as if there had been no departures from the contract"; "that the same are useful and beneficial to said building and to the defendant, and that he has taken possession of the same and has voluntarily accepted the benefit thereof"; and that ever since the completion of the building he has used and is now using it for the purposes for which it was intended.

[5] All the findings are supported by substantial evidence. We cannot consider the opposing evidence. It merely created a conflict. The court's final conclusion was that the imperfections due to plaintiff's failure to perform the contract in strict accordance with its terms are trivial and of a minor character, as compared with the extent and magnitude of the entire work embraced in said contract, and that the damages occasioned thereby can be recouped by the defendant in this action. We agree with this conclusion, and we are of the opinion that the case comes within the established doctrine under which a contractor may recover in a suit for the contract price upon showing substantial, though not in all respects complete, performance.

[6-8] The item of $650.87, deducted from the price on account of the injury by the plaintiff's employees to the cantilevers composing part of the foundation supports of the building, has no bearing on the question of substantial performance. It was no part of the work of construction required by the contract, but was a mere trespass by the employees of the plaintiff, committed in the course of their work. The court found that it did not destroy the use or value of the cantilevers, and that the damage to the defendant therefrom did not exceed said sum of $650.78. The court found that this sum would be the reasonable cost of repairing them, and that when so repaired they would fully serve the purpose for which they were designed, and would support and sustain the three additional stories which the defendant intends at some future time to erect on the building. The defendant claims that these findings are not in accordance with the evidence. On this point, however, there was a sharp conflict in the evidence, and we cannot disturb the findings thereon. The question whether or not the cantilevers, when repaired, would support the additional stories, was a question of fact, not of law, and it was to be determined from the evidence and not, as defendant claims, solely from the opinion of himself and his engineers and architect. This part of the findings and judgment must therefore be upheld.

[9, 10] The appellant claims that the plaintiff was not entitled to a judgment because it does not appear that the contract was performed "to the satisfaction of the defendant" nor "to the satisfaction and acceptance of the architect," nor that it had obtained the architect's certificate of acceptance. The court upon this subject found that the contract was not performed to the satisfaction of the defendant, but that it was "performed in such a manner as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person." The contract stated that two persons, named MacGibbon and Frary, were the architects for the building, and with respect to many of the matters required thereby it stated that the performance should be to the satisfaction of said architects. The court found, however, and the evidence is sufficient to sustain the finding, that in the course of the work MacGibbon and Frary were discharged as architects, and that no person was substituted in their place. One C. H. Russell was employed by the defendant as advising architect, but there was no agreement between defendant and plaintiff that he should be substituted for MacGibbon and Frary. The result was that after the discharge of the architects named the architect's certificate was no longer required, nor was performance to the satisfaction of the architects a technical condition of the right of the plaintiff to recover. The finding of the court that the contract was performed in such a manner as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover in the action, so far as that point is concerned. As was stated by the District Court of Appeal:

"A stipulation in the contract to perform to the satisfaction of one of the parties only calls for such performance as should be satisfactory to a reasonable person." Gladding, McBean & Co. v. Montgomery, 20 Cal. App. 276, 128 Pac. 790; Bryan, etc., Co. v. Law, 31 Cal. App. 204, 160 Pac. 170; Bruner v. Hegyi (App.) 183 Pac. 369.

This rule does not apply where the performance involves matters dependent on fancy, taste, sensibility, or judgment of the other party, but it does apply where the question is merely one of operative fitness or mechanical utility, and especially to contracts for the erection of buildings. Tiffany v. Pacific Sewer Pipe Co., 180 Cal. 702, 182 Pac. 428, 6 A. L. R. 1493.

We do not think the findings sustain the contention of the defendant that the court measured the damages by the difference in the service value of the building rather than by the difference in the market value thereof. For the defects classed as remediable the damage was measured by the reasonable cost of correction thereof. For the other defects, it is plain that the damages allowed did not consist of the difference in cost, but were measured by the difference between the value of the building with those imperfections and its value without such imperfections. This contention, therefore, is not sustained by the record.

[11] In proving its case the plaintiff was allowed to introduce its employees in charge of the work to testify that, in answer to a general question, the work had been performed in accordance with the specifications. It is earnestly contended that in this the court erred; that the plaintiff should have been required to prove exact performance of each and every item concerning which there was a contest. We do not find it necessary to decide whether this is technically correct or not, although there are many reasons for allowing such prima facie proof of performance to be made. The record shows that no harm ensued to the defendant from this ruling. Ample opportunity was given to cross-examine these witnesses, and the whole matter was gone into at great length during the trial.

[12] The contract provided that the contractor should keep careful and complete records of his installation of the systems provided for, and show by drawings "every important detail of the system," and that this record should be delivered to the owner before final acceptance. It is claimed that this condition was not complied with. Drawings were furnished to the defendant in attempted compliance with this provision; but they were, in certain unimportant particulars, inaccurate. The court found that no damage was sustained by reason thereof. The evidence shows that the defendant never expressed any dissatisfaction therewith or demanded any different or additional report or statement. We think strict performance of this provision was waived.

In conclusion we quote the following from the decision of the District Court of Appeal:

"Upon other issues, covering the many details about which appellant has made exceptions and has presented exhaustive arguments, a separate statement and decision on each point would require far more space than even a generous indulgence should allow. Counsel will, we trust, content themselves with the assurance that these questions have had the attention of the court. Having reached the conclusions which have been announced upon the principal issues of the case, we need only say in addition that the evidence was fully and fairly received and considered by the trial court, that the judgment expresses a correct conclusion upon the facts found, and that the evidence is sufficient to justify those findings upon the material issues necessary to support the judgment."

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HAMMOND LUMBER CO. v. YEAGER et al.

1. Mechanics' liens ⟸288(3)—Completion of building is question of fact.

Whether or not a building has been completed within Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, so as to start the running of the time for filing mechanics' liens is a question of fact, and not of law.

2. Appeal and error ⟸842(1)—What constitutes trivial imperfection permitting filing of mechanic's lien is question of fact.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, providing that trivial imperfections shall not be deemed such a lack of completion of a contract as to prevent the filing of a mechanic's lien, what constitutes a trivial imperfection is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court under the conditions and circumstances of each case, and its finding can only be overturned when there is no substantial evidence to support it.

3. Mechanics' liens ⟸132(7)—"Trivial imperfections" not preventing recovery for substantial performance do not delay time for filing lien.

Imperfections in the performance of a building contract so trivial in character as to permit the contractor to recover for substantial performance are trivial imperfections not preventing the filing of a mechanic's lien under Code Civ. Proc. § 1187.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Trivial Imperfection.]

4. Mechanics' liens ⟸132(7)—Time for filing not delayed because contractor after acceptance replaced defective work.

Where a building contract was substantially completed on September 20th, and the owner accepted it, took possession, and entered into its occupancy on September 28th, a finding that the building was completed September 20th so as to start running the time for filing mechanics' liens was warranted, though the contractor after the owner had taken possession replaced work defectively done at a cost of $35.50.

5. Mechanics' liens ⟸96—Contractor's representations as to date of completion of contract did not estop owner.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, providing that contractors, etc., shall be held the agents of the owner for the purposes of that chapter, a building contractor was not the agent of the owner in informing a materialman as to the date of the completion of the contract, and his representations did not estop the owner where he was acting in his own interest in endeavoring to hold off the materialman's lien until he obtained a certain payment.

6. Mechanics' liens ⟸132(1)—Owner's refusal to make payment until claims settled held not contemporaneous construction as to date of acceptance.

An owner's refusal to pay a building contractor a "35-day payment" under the contract until he had settled with all lien claimants held not a contemporaneous construction by the owner as to the date of acceptance of the building, as respected the time for filing mechanics' liens.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the Hammond Lumber Company against W. S. Yeager and others to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. L. Horton and C. S. Anderson, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George W. McDill, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff brought this action to foreclose a mechanics' lien for the value of building materials furnished to defendant Yeager as contractor for the construction of a dwelling house on the real property of the defendants Woods.

The cause of action was fully maintained under the evidence, with the exception that it was found that plaintiff's claim of lien was not filed in time, and judgment rendered for the defendant.

The controversy on this point arises upon a dispute as to the time of the completion of the contract. The trial court found that the plaintiff's contract for furnishing materials was fully performed and completed on or about the 20th day of September, 1917, and that the building was completed on the 28th day of September, 1917, and that the defendants Woods paid the contractor, Yeager, the completion payment under the contract for the erection of said building on the said 28th day of September, 1917, and that said defendants Woods accepted said building as completed and entered into its use and occupation on said date and ever since said date have continuously occupied and used said building for the purpose for which it was built, to wit, as their private home, that no notice of completion of the construction of such building has ever been filed of record, but that more than 90 days since the said completion of said building has elapsed before the date of filing of the mechanic's lien sued upon herein.

Section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, provides:

"* * * And, in all cases, any of the following shall be deemed equivalent to a completion for all the purposes of this chapter: The occupation or use of a building, improvement, or structure, by the owner, or his representative; or the acceptance by said owner or said agent, of said building, improvement, or structure, or cessation from labor for thirty days upon any contract or upon any building, improvement or structure or the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof; the filing of the notice hereinafter provided for. * * *"

In the case at bar the evidence is undisputed that the defendants accepted the building as completed on the 28th day of September, 1917, and on that date entered into the possession and occupancy thereof and had continued at all times subsequent thereto to occupy the same as their home.

Appellant's contention that the building was not completed until the 26th day of October, 1917, is based upon the undisputed fact that after such acceptance and occupancy it was discovered by the contractor that certain woodstone work constituting the floor of the bathroom and the sinks in the kitchen, composed of a chemical composition, were defective by reason of the fact that the chemicals were improperly mixed. The contractor, believing and claiming that such work would rapidly deteriorate, persuaded both the owner and the subcontractor who laid the woodstone work to replace the same. The work of replacement was completed October 26, 1917. The appellant's contention is that the removal of the defective work and its replacement was a part of the original contract, and that the time for filing liens began at the time the work was finally replaced by good material, and that therefore, its claim or lien having been filed within 90 days after October 26, 1917, it was filed in time.

[1-3] The question as to whether or not a building has been completed is a question of fact, and not a question of law. It is provided in section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, that—

"Any trivial imperfection in the said work, or in the completion of any contract by any lien claimant, or in the construction of any building, improvement or structure, or of the alteration, addition to, or repair thereof, shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of any lien; * * *"

What constitutes a trivial imperfection is a question of fact to be determined by the trial court under the conditions and circumstances of each case (Willamette, etc., Co. v. College Co., 94 Cal. 229, 238, 29 Pac. 629; Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 24, 27, 56 Pac. 610. This finding can only be overturned when it can be said that there is no substantial evidence to support it. Harlan v. Stufflebeem, 87 Cal. 508, 25 Pac. 686; Schindler v. Green, 149 Cal. 752, 755, 87 Pac. 626. No doubt any imperfections in the performance of the work which were of so trivial a character as to permit the contractor to recover for substantial performance notwithstanding such defects would be trivial inperfections within the meaning of section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure. This was the view of the court in Willamette, etc., Co. v. College Co., supra.

"In the absence of any statutory qualification or definition of the term 'completion,' there would be no room for its construction by the court, but it would be construed to mean actual completion, and would be a question of fact to be determined in each case. The statute has, however, provided that a substantial completion is all that is required in any case, whether the work be done at the direct instance of the owner, or under the provisions of a contract between him and an original contractor, by declaring that a 'trivial imperfection' shall not be deemed such a lack of completion as to prevent the filing of a lien."

[4] There have been a number of recent decisions by this court upon the subject of substantial compliance in the case of building contracts and there has been a tendency to a more liberal view of that subject than formerly. These cases are cited in the recent case of Thomas Haverty Co. v. G. M. Jones, 197 Pac. 105, decided March 14, 1921. In the case of Rischard v. Miller, 188 Pac. 50, the contractor was allowed to recover for a substantial performance of the contract, although there were much more serious imperfections than in the case at bar. It is clear from the foregoing cases that the trial court was justified in finding that there was a substantial performance of the contract on September 20th. This performance was followed by acceptance and occupancy and payment of the installment due upon the completion of the building on September 28th.

That the contractor subsequently replaced the work defectively done at a cost of $35.-50, instead of paying damages in that amount by way of deduction from the contract price, does not alter the fact that the work had been substantially completed on September 20th and accepted as such on September 28th.

We conclude, therefore, that the finding of the trial court that the building was completed September 20, 1917, is sustained by the evidence.

[5] Appellant also claims that the defendants are estopped from contending that the 26th of October is not the date of completion because of certain conversations between appellant and the contractor with relation to the completion of the building. These conversations were testified to by R. C. Johnson, collector and credit man for the appellant. He testified as follows:

"I presented our bill to Mr. Yeager, and he said that he could not pay us for the reason that the woodstone work that had been put in was very poor, and that he would have to have that replaced before he could—before the Woods would accept the job, and before he could get his payments from them."

He also testified that on October 27, 1917, he again presented his account to the contractor, and the contractor said:

"The woodstone people had just replaced their work, and that undoubtedly now he would be able to get the job accepted, and have our money for us very shortly. * * * He said that the job had been completed the day before —that is, on the 26th of October. * * *"

The witness also testified:

That shortly before filing the claim of lien he again saw Mr. Yeager and told him "that the account was long past due, and our time for filing the lien was getting rather short, and that we must insist on his paying it or the lien would be filed; and I told him that on account of his past business relations with us we didn't care to file a lien if there was any opportunity for him to get the money and pay it, and he said, 'Well, I will tell you what you do, Johnson; you hold that off as long as possible, if you do have to file a lien, and you can collect from the Woods; why, if there is a deficiency, why, I will give Woods my note for the deficiency.' I told him we insisted upon being paid in full."

Johnson also testified that he relied upon the date given him by Yeager.

Appellant's claim is that the contractor was the agent of the owner, and that his representations were consequently binding upon the owner and operated to estop the owner from claiming that October 26th was not the date of completion. This contention is based upon that portion of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, reading as follows:

"* * * Every contractor, subcontractor, architect, builder or other person having charge of the construction, alteration, addition to or repair either in whole or in part of any building, or other improvement as aforesaid shall be held to be the agent of the owner for the purposes of this chapter."

There is nothing in the chapter which requires the owner to inform the materialmen as to the date of the completion other than by filing a notice of completion. The statute does not purport to give authority to a contractor or architect to represent the owner in fixing the date of completion. The interests of the contractor and owner with reference to the date of completion are hostile, and it is apparent from the record in this case that the contractor was acting in his own interest in endeavoring to hold off appellant's lien until after he had obtained his 35-day payment. Our view concerning the limited nature of the contractor's agency is in accord with the views of the Supreme Courts of Washington, Oregon, and Idaho. Whittier v. Puget Sound, etc., Co., 4 Wash. 666, 30 Pac. 1094, 31 Am. St. Rep. 944; Fitch v. Howitt, 32 Or. 296, 52 Pac. 192; Valley Lumber Co. v. Nickerson, 13 Idaho, 282, 93 Pac. 24. The owner is not estopped by the representations.

[6] There is nothing in the point that the owner by withholding and refusing to pay the contractor the 35-day payment under his contract until he had settled with all lien claimants, including the plaintiff, was a "co-temporaneous construction" by plaintiff that the building was not accepted until October 26, 1917.

1. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃581 — Deed to purchaser at sale for nonpayment of assessment without personal notice to owner of record to redeem held void.

Deed to purchaser at sale thereof for nonpayment of street assessments under St. 1903, p. 376 (Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3928, p. 1693, as amended in 1909, 1911, and 1913, § 28), was void where personal notice to redeem was not served upon owner of record as required by section 33, subd. 7.

2. Eminent domain ⊂⊃243(2)—Judgment not adjudication as to ownership of tract of which condemned land was a part, where ownership thereof was not in issue.

Judgment of condemnation, indicating that the property condemned belonged to one of the defendants, was not conclusive that the large tract of land of which such condemned land was a part belonged to such defendant, and not to one of the other defendants, where the ownership of such large tract of land was not in issue.

3. Eminent domain ⟸243(3)—Judgment of condemnation conclusive as to ownership of land as against defendant not appearing.

Judgment of condemnation, adjudicating that the land condemned belonged to one of the defendants, was conclusive as against another defendant, who did not appear therein and assert its claim as owner of such land.

4. Boundaries ⟸20(1)—Deed of land described as bounded on street conveys to center of street.

Where land is conveyed by description which bounds it by a street, the boundary line of the land conveyed is not the side line of the street, but its center line, unless it clearly appears that it was intended to convey land only to the side line of the street, in view of Civ. Code, §§ 831, 1112, and Code Civ. Proc. § 2077, subd. 4.

5. Boundaries ⟸20(5)—Grantee of lot shown by map bounded by street takes to center of street.

Where deed describes land as a lot shown on a certain map, and where such map shows such lot to be bounded by a street, the grantee takes to the center of the street, unless it clearly appears that the intention of the parties was to the contrary.

6. Easements ⟸17(2)—Description of land as bounded by street creates street as between grantor and grantee, regardless of existing dedication as between grantor and public.

Where a deed described land as being bounded by a street, and where such street has been abandoned, a street is created as between the grantor and grantee, regardless of whether there is an existing dedication as between the grantor and the public.

7. Boundaries ⟸20(1) — Grantee of land bounded by street took to center of street notwithstanding abandonment of street.

Where deed described land as being bounded by street, the grantee took to the center of the street, where it did not appear that the parties did not so intend, notwithstanding that the street had been abandoned by the public.

8. Boundaries ⟸37(4)—Grantor's testimony as to intention insufficient to overcome rule construing deed as conveying to center of street.

Grantor's testimony that she did not intend to convey land to center of street, in execution of deed describing lot bounded by street, held not to overcome rule of construction that grantee in such case takes to center of street, unless it clearly appears that the parties intended otherwise.

9. Deeds ⟸90—Construed in grantee's favor except as to reservations.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1864, a deed in case of doubt is to be construed in favor of the grantee, except as to reservations or other provisions which it may contain for the benefit of grantor.

Sloane, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Actions by John Francis Anderson against the Citizens' Savings & Trust Company and others, from which such defendants brought action against Mary Martin. Judgments for plaintiff, and the Savings & Trust Company and others appeal. Reversed.

C. A. Stice, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Harold E. Thomas, and George W. MacLellan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. Two actions to quiet title were tried together in the court below. As the actions were originally brought, there were a number of parties, and the parties plaintiff and defendant were not the same in each, but there occurred such disclaimers, transfers of interest, and shifting of position that at the time of trial the controversy had in each case been reduced to one between J. F. Anderson, whom we may call the plaintiff, and Citizens' Savings & Trust Company, a corporation, whom we may call the defendant, each claiming to be the owner of the property involved, the latter as trustee for two minors by the name of Lempertz. Judgment went for the plaintiff in the court below in each action, and the defendant appeals. Both actions present the same questions, and, for purposes of discussion, may be treated as one.

There is no dispute as to the material facts. It appears that one J. G. Griffith was originally the owner of a considerable tract, including the land in controversy. He subdivided the tract into blocks and lots, with streets, and recorded a map of the tract as so subdivided. This map showed lot 1 in block 7 as the lot forming the easterly end of the block and extending the whole width of the block, so that on its easterly side it was bounded by a street called Vandal street, and on its northerly and southerly ends by streets called Grand and Los Feliz avenues, respectively. Each of these streets was shown as 60 feet wide, and Grand and Vandal, with which alone we are particularly concerned, were shown as and were in fact parts of the subdivided tract.

On June 29, 1889, Griffiths conveyed the lot mentioned to one Martin, describing it by lot and block number, as shown on the subdivision map. Since Griffiths was the owner of the fee in the streets, it is conceded that his conveyance of the lot operated to convey as a part of it the fee to the center line of the streets on which it abutted. In 1898, while Martin was still the owner of the lot and of the fee to one-half of the streets upon which it abutted, the two streets on the north and east of the lot, Grand and Vandal, were with her consent abandoned as public streets by order of the board of supervisors of the county. Whether the offer of dedication of them as public streets made by the recording of the map by Griffiths had ever been accepted by the public authorities or by actual user does not appear. There was, however, either an abandonment of them as public streets, or else an authorized withdrawal of the offer of dedication made by the recording of the map. The parties have treated it as an abandonment, and we may do so likewise. It is due to this abandonment that the present controversy arises, the dispute being as to the ownership of the two 30-foot strips on the north and east sides of the lot which comprised the half of the streets on those sides.

In 1911, that is, after the abandonment of the streets, Martin conveyed the lot to one Lempertz by deed likewise describing the property merely by its lot and block number according to the subdivision map, and the most importaant question in dispute is as to whether this deed operated to convey the 30-foot strips which were part of the adjoining streets as shown by the map. The claim of the plaintiff, who has succeeded to any interest which remained in Martin, is that her deed to Lempertz did not so operate, while the claim of the defendant, who has succeeded to the interest of Lempertz, is that it did.

In addition to claiming title on the ground just stated, the plaintiff also claims title to the 30-foot strip which was part of Vandal street, the street to the east, on two other grounds. The first of these is that this strip was sold to satisfy the lien of a street assessment imposed upon it for the improvement of Los Feliz street, upon which it abuts at its southerly end, and pursuant to such sale was deeded by the proper public authority to one Colkins, to whose interest likewise the plaintiff has succeeded. The second ground is based upon the following facts: For the purpose of widening Los Feliz street the city of Los Angeles brought a condemnation suit to condemn a 60-foot strip along the northerly side of that street, which strip included 60 feet off the southerly end of the 30-foot strip which was formerly a part of Vandal street. Both the defendant and Martin were made parties to the suit, and it resulted in a judgment that the latter was the owner of the portion of the 30-foot strip sought to be condemned and entitled to the compensation for its taking. The plaintiff claims that this judgment was an adjudication of the rights of the defendant and Martin, not only in the land condemned, but in the whole 30-foot strip, and that this adjudication inures to his benefit as Martin's successor. As these two grounds so claimed by the plaintiff may be easily disposed of, we will discuss them first.

[1] The street assessment proceedings were under the act of March 24, 1903 (Stats. of 1903, p. 376, Deering's Gen. Laws, Act 3928 as amended in 1909, 1911, and 1913). Section 28 of the act provides that after the expiration of 12 months from the date of the sale of any property to satisfy the lien of an assessment under the act, the property may be deeded by the street superintendent, or other corresponding public authority, to the purchaser, but only in case the purchaser has previously given 30 days' written notice to the owner of the property that the property has been sold, that a certain amount is necessary to redeem, and that, unless redemption is made within 30 days, application will be made for a deed. The section further provides that such notice must be personally served on the owner if he can be found, and, if he cannot, must be conspicuously posted on the property; that an affidavit showing such notice must be filed with the street superintendent; and that he shall make no deed until such affidavit is filed. Such an affidavit was filed preliminary to the execution of the deed under which the plaintiff claims, but it shows on its face, taken in connection with the state of the record title, that the notice given was wholly insufficient. The term "owner" is defined by the act (section 33, subd. 7) as the person in whom the legal title appears of record. At the time of the notice in question, Lempertz had died, and any interest she had acquired by her deed from Martin had been distributed to the defendant by decree of distribution in her estate, so that it was the latter who appeared of record as the owner of such interest, and upon whom the notice had to be served in order to foreclose that interest. The affidavit does not show either personal notice to the defendant, or that the defendant could not be found, nor does it show the posting of notice on the property. All that it shows as to the defendant is that notice was mailed to it. The statute requires personal service, and not service by mail, and the notice given is plainly insufficient. The affidavit does show personal notice on the administrator of Lempertz's estate and on the guardian of the two minors for whom the defendant held the property in trust, and if the property had been still under administration, or if the title had been in the minors, service upon the administrator or the guardian would have been sufficient under certain further provisions of the statute. But since the property was no longer under administration, and the title to whatever interest Lempertz had acquired was in the defendant and so appeared of record, notice in the manner provided by the statute had to be given to it. This was not done, and as a consequence the deed is void as to whatever interest the defendant held as the successor of Lempertz.

[2] As to the judgment of condemnation, it was an adjudication that the property condemned belonged to Martin, but it was not an adjudication that any other property belonged to her. It is one of the functions of a condemnation suit to determine as between the defendants, who is the owner of the property and therefore entitled to the compensation for its taking, and where it appears on the face of the pleadings that the property sought to be condemned is part of a larger tract, which is claimed adversely to each other by two or more defendants, it may well be that a judgment that one of the defendants is the owner of the property condemned will be an adjudication as to the title to the whole tract of which it is but a part. But nothing of this sort appears here. Martin did not appear in the action at all, and there were no pleadings raising any question of title as between her and the defendant, so that no such question was adjudicated as between them. It is true there are allegations in the complaint as amended which possibly might be taken as presenting an issue as to the ownership of the whole 30-foot strip, so that it may be that as between the plaintiff and the defendants that issue might be taken as adjudicated by the condemnation decree or judgment; but there was no such issue as between Martin and the defendant here, and since there was not, the condemnation judgment was an adjudication as between them of ownership only as to the land actually condemned.

[3] In this connection, however, there is a question incidentally involved and which we may as well determine at this point for the guidance of the parties on a new trial. Martin received under the decree of condemnation some three hundred odd dollars as compensation for the portion of the 30-foot strip which was taken. The defendant by cross-complaint against her in this action seeks to recover this amount from her on the ground that it, and not she, was the real owner of the property, and entitled to the compensation for its taking. But if the defendant was the real owner, it should have asserted its claim as such in the condemnation action. Not having done so, the judgment is final that as between it and Martin it is the latter who was entitled to the compensation.

[4, 5] The plaintiff, then, is not entitled to prevail over the defendant, either because of the condemnation judgment or because of the assessment deed, and we are brought to the question as to the effect of the deed by Martin to Lempertz as the final and controlling question in the case; did or did not that deed, describing the property conveyed as lot so and so in block so and so as shown by a certain map, operate to convey the land in front of the lot to the center of the streets shown on the map, although such streets had been abandoned as public streets? There can be no question but that the deed would so operate, except for the circumstance that the streets had been abandoned, so that the question is, Does such abandonment change what would otherwise be the rule? In determining this question, it is well to ascertain at the outset the reason or theory upon which the rule is based that the fee in the streets would pass by a deed of the streets, if the streets were really there. Section 831, Civil Code, reads:

"An owner of land bounded by a road or street is presumed to own to the center of the way, but the contrary may be shown."

Section 1112, Civil Code, reads:

"A transfer of land, bounded by a highway, passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant."

Section 2077, subdivision 4, Code of Civil Procedure, reads:

"The following are the rules for construing the descriptive part of a conveyance of real property, when the construction is doubtful and there are no other sufficient circumstances to determine it:

* * * * * * *

"4. When a road, or stream of water not navigable, is the boundary, the rights of the grantor to the middle of the road or the thread of the stream are included in the conveyance, except where the road or thread of the stream is held under another title."

In other words, where land is conveyed by a description which bounds it by a street, and the grantor is the owner of the fee in the street, as he is presumed to be, the real boundary line of the property is not the side line of the street, but its center line. This is stated in so many words in Moody v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 31, 36, where it is said:

"It is well settled that land described in a deed as bounded by a public highway or street, will be considered as extending to the center of the street or highway, unless it clearly appears that it was intended to make a side line instead of the center line the boundary. The highway is a monument, and in legal contemplation the thread of the highway is the monument, unless a contrary intention clearly appears. That this is the rule is established by a multitude of authorities."

A description of a lot as that shown on a certain map is a description of it as bounded by a street when the map shows it to be so bounded, so that to such a description the same reason and the same rule apply. Bissell v. N. Y. C. R. R. Co., 23 N. Y. 61; Henessy v. Murdock, 137 N. Y. 317, 33 N. E. 330. Putting it in another way, the fee in the half of the street upon which the lot abuts is in fact a part of the lot, so that a conveyance of the lot conveys the fee in the street as a part of it.

[6, 7] Such being the reason or theory of the rule, it would seem that it should make no difference that there is in fact no public street there, provided the conveyance be one which describes the lot as bounded by a street. By such a description a street is created as between the grantor and the grantee, regardless of whether or not there is an existing dedication as between the grantor and the public. This is the settled law of this state. Danielson v. Sykes, 157 Cal. 686, 109 Pac. 87, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1024; Eltinge v. Santos, 171 Cal. 278, 152 Pac. 915, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1143. Under these decisions, there can be no question but that Lempertz, under her deed from Martin, which, in effect, described the property as fronting on the two streets in question took the property as between herself and Martin as so fronting, whether there were public streets there or not. Such being the case, there would seem to be no reason for not applying as between them the rule that a conveyance of a lot bounded by a street carries the fee to the center of the street as a part of the lot. It may well be—in fact, it is certain that it would be—that in such a case the grantor would reserve an easement over the fee in the street for its use for street purposes appurtenant to other nearby property which he might retain, and to which the use of the street as such would be of value. But if he retained no such other property, as Martin did not so far as appears, then no easement would arise, and the fee of the grantee would be unincumbered.

It may likewise well be that the rule would not apply to the conveyance of a lot bounded by a street where the street is described as abandoned. The final question after all is one as to the intention of the parties, and it would seem not unreasonable to consider such a description as one of a lot bounded by what is now private property, although once a street, so that the real boundary was the line of that property. But it is to be noted that the description in this case is a description of the lot as shown by the map, and the map shows the street as existing, and not as abandoned, so that by the description the boundary line of what is conveyed would normally be the center line of the street as shown.

A somewhat analogous situation is presented where the way by which the property is bounded according to the description is a private way only. The decisions differ as to what is the rule in such a case, but the weight of authority is that the fee to the center line of the way passes. 2 Devlin on Deeds (3d Ed.) § 1025a. Another somewhat analogous situation is where the conveyance is of a lot or tract described by reference to a map, and the map shows the lot or tract as abutting on a road or street, but such road or street has not in fact been dedicated. Here, likewise, it is held that the fee to the center line of what is shown as a street passes. Bissell v. N. Y. C. R. R., supra; Easton Borough Appeal, 81 Pa. 85; Jarstadt v. Morgan, 48 Wis. 245, 4 N. W. 27; Freelon v. Adrian, 161 Cal. 13, 118 Pac. 220.

The authorities in which the exact situation found here is presented are not very numerous and are in conflict, and it would be of little purpose to review them. They are collated in the note to White v. Jefferson, 110 Minn. 276, 124 N. W. 373, 125 N. W. 262, as reported in 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 778, 784. The question is considered at length and with great care by the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit in Paine v. Consumers', etc., Co., 71 Fed. 626, 19 C. C. A. 99, Judge Taft delivering the opinion. Among the reasons advanced by the opinion in support of the view which it adopts is the following, the force and good sense of which are sufficient, it seems to us, to resolve any doubt in the matter. It is said (71 Fed. 632, 19 C. C. A. 105):

"The evils resulting from the retention in remote dedicators of the fee in gores and strips, which for many years are valueless because of the public easement in them, and which then become valuable by reason of an abandonment of the public use, have led courts to strained constructions to include the fee of such gores and strips in deeds of the abutting lots. And modern decisions are even more radical in this regard than the older cases. For a very good statement of the present condition of the law on the subject, reference may be had to the new and valuable work of Mr. Dembitz on Land Titles, § 11. Most of the decisions are rested on some peculiarity of phrase in the description, and it is very difficult to lay down any general rules for determining when the grantor has used language sufficiently explicit to exclude from the operation of the deed the fee to the center of the abutting road. The Supreme Judicial Court of Massachusetts has decided that it is impossible, if any respect is to be paid to the principles of the common law of real estate, to hold that a fee in land not described can pass as appurtenant to that which is described. Tyler v. Hammond, 11 Pick. 193. But in the later cases especially that court has used every device of logic to include in the description of a lot by the side of a road the fee to the center of the road. It has treated the highway or private way in the description of a lot as a monument, and in obedience to the rule that a reference to monuments controls descriptions by courses and distances it has carried the lot to the center line of the monument, however clear a departure this may be from the linear or superficial measurements. It would seem from the language of Mr. Justice McLean, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States in Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 512, that the difficulty of passing the fee in the adjoining street as appurtenant to the conveyance of the abutting lot did not weigh so heavily on that court, for he said: 'Where the proprietor of a town disposes of all his interest in it, he would seem to stand in a different relation to the right of soil, in regard to the streets and alleys of the town, from the individual over whose soil a public road is established, and who continues to hold the land on both sides of it. Whether the purchasers are not, in this respect, the owners of the soil over which the streets and alleys are laid, as appurtenant to adjoining lots, is a point not essentially involved in this case.'

"The whole question is most exhaustively discussed by the learned American editors of Smith's Leading Cases (8th Ed., vol. 2, p. 178) in the notes of Dovaston v. Payne, and the conclusion reached that the treatment of the highway as a monument furnishes the means to include the fee to the street center in every case where there is not express language excluding it. See, also, 3 Kent, Comm. 349. The wisdom of such a construction is manifest, and the great weight of authority sustains it."

Sanchez v. Grace M. E. Church, 114 Cal. 295, 46 Pac. 2, has been referred to in other jurisdictions and is now cited to us as supporting a contrary rule. There is language in the opinion which, taken by itself, would justify this view of the case, but which hardly does so when taken in connection with the facts with reference to which it was used. The map in that case did not show the lane on which the lots abutted as a part of the subdivided tract, nor did the grantor own the fee of the lane until after it was vacated as a public way. Moreover, the claim of the grantee was that by a conveyance of the lots, described by reference to the map, there passed, not only the fee to one-half of the vacated lane on which they abutted, but the entire width of the lane in front of them, plus land on the further side of the lane which had never been in a street and which lay between the lane and a new way which had been opened, title to all of which the grantor had obtained by conveyance from its owners after the vacation of the lane. The decision upon these facts cannot, we think, be taken as establishing as the law of this state governing such a case as the present a rule contrary to that which now so strongly commends itself to us. We hold, then, that in the absence of any circumstances showing clearly that the parties intended otherwise, the deed by Martin to Lempertz, describing the lot by reference to the map of the tract, operated to convey as a part of the lot the fee in Martin to the center line of the streets, which the map showed as bounding the lots, although such streets had been previously abandoned as public streets.

[8, 9] We have discussed the case so far as if there was no evidence other than the language of the deed, the recorded map, and the vacation of the streets as public streets, which throws light upon what the parties to the deed really meant should be conveyed by it. The final question in the case is, of course, what was the intent of the parties as expressed in the deed? and the rule which we have been discussing and which we have adopted is after all but a rule of construction, to be followed if, as is usually the case, there is nothing which points plainly and certainly to a contrary intention, but not to be followed if there is. Section 2077, Code Civ. Proc. In the present case, there was other evidence introduced for the purpose of showing the intent of the parties, but it is of little significance. That which is most significant is that the land in the streets was assessed for taxes as a part of the adjoining lots after the streets were vacated, and that apparently, for the evidence is very meager, Martin, after her conveyance, allowed it to continue to be so assessed and the taxes to be paid by Lempertz and her successors without concerning herself about the matter. The testimony shows that prior to her deed to Lempertz she was aware that it might be that as an incident of her ownership of the lot and the vacation of the streets in front of it she had the full ownership of one-half of the streets and if she conceived that she was dividing what she owned and conveying but a part of it, it is to be supposed both that she would have her deed indicate this unmistakably, and also that she would concern herself about the matter of taxes on the part she retained, and would take steps to have that part set off from the part she conveyed, and separately assessed. The fact that she did not attempt to have this done or concern herself with the matter of taxes, if be really the fact, would seem to indicate that by her conveyance she intended to part, and believed she had parted, with all she had. Outside of this evidence, there is practically nothing of any significance. Martin herself testified that she did not intend to convey the land in the streets, but her intention in this respect is to be ascertained by what she said in the deed as construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made and her conduct with reference to it, and not by extrinsic testimony as to what she intended. Her testimony was wholly incompetent, and, even though admitted without objection, entitled to almost no weight. It is wholly insufficient to control and overcome the rule of construction we have been discussing. It is also to be borne in mind that in case of doubt a deed is to be construed in favor of the grantee, except as to reservations or other provisions which it may contain for the benefit of the grantor. Section 1864, Code Civ. Proc. The rule of construction, then, which we have been discussing governs the case upon the circumstances shown and the evidence appearing, so that under those circumstances and upon that evidence the deed by Martin to Lempertz operated to convey to the latter as a part of the lot specified in the deed the land in controversy.

The two judgments appealed from are reversed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; SHAW, J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; WILBUR, J.

SLOANE, J. (dissenting). I dissent from the majority opinion that land which was formerly, but is no longer, a street or highway, passes as of course from the grantor to the grantee by a deed to land bordering on said vacated street or highway.

The common-law rule governing the presumption in relation to conveyance of land bordering on a highway or stream has been formulated in our Codes as follows:

Civil Code, § 1112:

"A transfer of land, bounded by a highway, passes the title of the person whose estate is transferred to the soil of the highway in front to the center thereof, unless a different intent appears from the grant."

Section 2077, subdivision 4, Code Civ. Proc.:

"When a road, or stream of water not navigable, is the boundary, the rights of the grantor to the middle of the road or the thread of the stream are included in the conveyance, except where the road or thread of the stream is held under another title."

The obvious limitation to this rule is that in order for it to become operative there must be an existing highway or stream at the time of the transfer. How can it be logically contended that such a conveyance carries beyond the described limits, where the highway no longer exists, more than in a case where it never existed?

The only theory that can uphold this rule as to vacated streets is that taken by the majority opinion that the actual boundary of a tract bordering on a highway is the center line of such highway, and that the abutting land of the highway is an integral part of the lot or tract, and remains such after the highway is vacated. This is avowedly the position taken in Justice Olney's opinion. He says:

"Putting it another way, the fee in the half of the street upon which the lot abuts is in fact a part of the lot, so that a conveyance of the lot conveys the fee in the street as part of it."

If this is the correct theory, it would logically follow that the soil of the street would remain a part of the lot, although the easement of the street was abandoned. Such a consideration might be tenable under a description which, in terms, carries the boundaries to and along a street or highway, such reference to the street or highway being read as referring to the median line. But it cannot consistently apply to the conveyance of a lot as delineated on a map. In such a description the outlines and dimensions of the tract conveyed are plainly defined and limited by scale and diagram, which show the area within the lines of the plat and without the street. To hold that a lot so described extends to the center of the street is a contradiction of terms. The reductio ad absurdum of such a construction is demonstrated by the department opinion of this court in the case of Earl v. Dutour, 183 Pac. 438, 6 A. L. R. 1163. In that case the plaintiff and defendant acquired title respectively to the easterly and westerly one-half each of lot 17 of the Hillard tract as per recorded map of said tract. On the westerly border of the lot as delineated on the map is a street 60 feet in width. The plaintiff, owning the easterly half of the lot, contended, in accordance with the view of the majority of the court here that the lot extended into the street, and that his half of the lot extended from the easterly border halfway to the line marking the center of the street. As a result, if the lot as marked on the map happened to be an ordinary 50-foot town lot, but included in its legal entity 30 feet additional of street, the defendant would be left with 30 feet of street and 10 feet of real available land as his westerly half of the lot.

There was some reason for plaintiff's contention in that case, since the plat by a dotted line carried the apparent boundary of the lots to the middle of the street. Of course, the court held, as justice demanded, that in such case, when the deed referred to the undivided half of a lot it meant lot and not street.

But let us consider a more extreme and not at all impossible illustration. Suppose we have a 50-foot lot abutting on the west upon a 100-foot street. The owner conveys the west half of the lot. If the boundary of the lot is the middle of the street the grantee gets nothing but street.

It would be a queer construction that would define the two halves of a lot separately conveyed as including only the land within the prescribed boundaries of the map, but would embrace 30 or 40 additional feet of street within its dimensions in the conveyance of the entire lot. It would present a condition in which the whole is greater than its parts. We must accept this incongruity as the legal effect of such a conveyance, or hold that the transfer by reference to lot numbers which carries title to the center of the adjacent street does so by way of intendment as something appurtenant to but outside the land described, and not on the theory that the law enlarges the lot by extending its boundaries to the middle of the street.

Under the plain terms of the law, this can only result when the abutting land is at the time of the conveyance impressed with the public easement of a street or highway. It is said that the intention of the parties must prevail, and that in these conveyances the law presumes the intention of the grantor to transfer his title in the fee of the street, but that is true only when there is a street. Such is the doctrine laid down in the only decision of this court heretofore considering this question. In Sanchez v. Grace M. E. Church, 114 Cal. 295, 46 Pac. 2, it was said as to land formerly part of a highway, claimed under conveyance after the public way had been vacated:

"A more serious question is whether the land in Messer's lane to the middle of it did not become, when the lane was vacated, by a sort of accretion, parcel of the abutting lots so as to pass with them by the deed to Leonis without further designation. * * * We think no such rule can obtain in this case; the conveyance of land bounded by a highway is presumed to carry title to the median line of the way, but there is no reason in a like presumption to include land which has formed, but forms no longer, part of a highway."

While the doctrine laid down in this decision is weakened as authority by uncertainty as to who was the owner in the fee of the lane, it is at least a clear and explicit expression of the view at that time approved by the court on this point.

The above doctrine is clearly adopted by the Supreme Court of Minnesota. White v. Jefferson, 110 Minn. 276, 124 N. W. 374, 125 N. W. 262, 32 L. R. A. (N. S.) 778, 784, presents a case directly in point. One Allie Hewitt owned "lots 23 and 24, Hewitt's outlots, First division, according to the recorded plat thereof." This ownership carried title to the center of an adjacent street. This street was vacated by the city council. Thereafter the defendants acquired title under a deed containing the foregoing description. Answering defendants' claim that the vacated strip, which was still owned by the grantor at the time of the conveyance, passed with the deed to the lots, the court says:

"On principle the answer is clear. In the first case at the time of the transfer, the lots would front on a street; in the second case, they would not front on a street. A conveyance according to a plat is a conveyance by recorded metes and bounds, except where the lots front on a street."

The opinion in this case contains an exhaustive examination of the principle involved and the authorities on the subject, and quotes with approval the rule stated in Sanchez v. Grace M. E. Church, supra.

Other decisions favoring the same rule are Brown v. Taber, 103 Iowa, 1, 72 N. W. 416; Overland Machine Co. v. Alpenfels, 30 Colo. 171, 69 Pac. 574; Harris v. Elliott, 10 Pet. 25, 9 L. Ed. 333; Chicago Lumber Co. v. Driving Park, 97 Iowa, 25, 65 N. W. 1017.

The presumption that a conveyance of land abutting on a public street or highway carries to the middle of the street is founded evidently on a rule of public policy which discourages the separation of the title to the soil of highways from the adjacent tracts on account of the intimate use and association of such streets to the abutting owner. For many uses the abutting soil of the streets is of value to the adjacent owner, where it would be valueless to a separate proprietor of the fee while subject to the easement of a street. 4 R. C. L., pp. 7, 8; Norcross v. Griffiths, 65 Wis. 599, 27 N. W. 606, 56 Am. Rep. 642; 9 Corpus Juris, 197, § 84. None of these reasons of policy apply where the land is no longer part of a highway.

While there is an opposing line of authorities outside of California supporting the views of the majority opinion, I think the doctrine here contended for is more in harmony with reason and the fundamental rules governing title to real property.

No question is raised in the case before us as to continued rights of easement in these streets in behalf of adjacent owners, as are involved and the subject of discussion in Danielson v. Sykes, 157 Cal. 686, 109 Pac. 87, 28 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1024, and Eltinge v. Santos, 171 Cal. 278, 152 Pac. 915, Ann. Cas. 1917A, 1143, cited in Justice OLNEY'S opinion. Nor is there any element of estoppel, as there might be in case of a grant by reference to a map showing the lands abutting upon streets, where the grantee accepts conveyance in reliance upon such map and without knowledge that the street had been vacated. In this case the streets had been closed for upwards of 12 years, the proceedings vacating them were matters of record, and there is no pretense that the grantees were not aware of the fact at the time of their purchase.

52 Cal. App. 66

ISRAEL v. BRYAN et al.

(Civ. 3438, 3450.)

1. Judgment ⟸525—Assumed to be rendered as of date.

In the absence of anything contained in the record inconsistent therewith, a recital in the judgment that it was rendered on a certain date must be accepted as true, though not filed by the clerk until later.

2. Judgment ⟸713(1)—Former determination in mandamus proceeding that court had jurisdiction to order substitution of parties held res adjudicata.

Where the District Court of Appeal, on application for writ of mandate against the superior court, determined that such court had jurisdiction to make and order a substitution of defendants in a pending action under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, such determination must be deemed res adjudicata as to such question on a subsequent appeal in the action proper by the applicant for the writ of mandate.

3. Creditors' suit ⟸48—Finding held sufficient to show that levy of execution was made.

In the absence of any evidence showing how a levy under an execution was made, the finding of the trial court that execution was served upon the person having money of judgment debtor in his possession implies that it was duly served in compliance with Code Civ. Proc. § 542, subd. 5, and section 688.

4. Creditors' suit ⟸28—No action against debtor without proof of return of execution unsatisfied or levy of attachment, but substitution of judgment creditor proper in action by third party claiming fund.

A judgment creditor cannot maintain an action at law against a debtor of his debtor without the issuance and levy of a writ of attachment, and cannot maintain a creditors' bill to subject property to the payment of the judgment without alleging and proving that an execution has been returned unsatisfied, but such rules did not apply to a judgment creditor attempting to levy execution on money deposited with a justice of the peace by the debtor, and in suit by a third person against the justice of the peace to recover the money, the judgment creditor was properly substituted as defendant on application by the justice under Code Civ. Proc. § 386, as the creditor's only course was by answer to set forth its right to the suit, and, as between itself and plaintiff as other claimant, submit the question to the determination of the court.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1170(1)—No reversal where justice was done.

Even though there were irregularities in substituting parties, judgment rendered must be affirmed under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where it was a just and righteous disposition of the case.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

6. Sheriffs and constables ⟸134 — Sheriff proper party in action to recover fund attached.

In an action against a justice of the peace to recover a deposit, where a judgment creditor of another person was substituted as party defendant, a sheriff, who had served notice of attachment on the money in the hands of the justice under a claim by the judgment creditor that the fund belonged to the judgment debtor, was properly made a defendant, where he had made no return upon the writ of attachment.

7. Sheriffs and constables ⟸130—Sheriff has right to defend title of attachment defendant.

A sheriff who has attached property has the right to defend the title of the attachment defendant thereto so as to protect his writ, at least until he has made return so that the plaintiff in the action may make his defense thereto.

8. Interpleader ⟸19—All persons having right or interest properly made parties.

The proceeding in interpleader is one in equity, and all persons having any right or interest to protect may properly be made parties.

9. Appeal and error ⟸935(1)—Assumed that amendment of judgment was made under authority of certain statute.

Where there was no notice of entry of judgment, which was entered on June 9th, an amendment dated August 6th and filed August 9th must be assumed to have been made under the authority of Code Civ. Proc. § 663a, and it must be assumed that notice of motion to amend was made within the limit prescribed.

Appeals from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by F. Israel against Solon Bryan. James C. Byers, Sheriff, and others were substituted as defendants. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Eugene Daney and Heskett & Sample, all of San Diego, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In an opinion filed on December 20, 1920, the judgment herein was reversed upon the sole ground that the court erred in making an order that upon defendant Bryan depositing in court the fund in controversy he be discharged from liability, and other defendants, who were asserting claim to the money, substituted in his place. The decision was based upon the fact that, as shown by the record then presented, Bryan had an answer on file in the action, and hence the order made was in violation of the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that in such cases it be made before answer filed. The case involves two appeals, both of which are based upon the judgment roll alone.

The history of the matter, as appears from the findings and record as corrected by diminution thereof allowed by the court after the making of the order granting the rehearing, is as follows: It is alleged in the complaint, filed on April 8, 1918, that plaintiff, on February 11, 1918, deposited with Solon Bryan, justice of the peace, the sum of $3,000 cash bail to secure the appearance of F. M. Couden at a preliminary hearing upon a criminal charge filed against him; that at said hearing, held on February 21, 1918, Couden was discharged, and on February 26th following, plaintiff demanded that Bryan return and redeliver to him the $3,000 so deposited, which demand was refused; wherefore plaintiff prayed judgment against defendant Bryan for the sum of $3,000 and interest from the date of the demand. To this complaint Bryan, on May 15, 1918, filed an answer, wherein he admitted the making of the deposit by plaintiff for the purpose stated in the complaint, but, on information and belief, denied that the same was the property of plaintiff, and alleged that in truth and in fact the same belonged to and was the property of F. M. Couden, who was entitled to the same; that on February 21st, after the release of Couden and the dismissal of the criminal charge, the sheriff of San Diego county served upon him an execution issued out of the superior court of San Diego county upon a judgment rendered against the defendant in the case of the First National Bank against F. M. Couden, and, asserting that the said sum of $3,000 in his possession was the property of Couden, demanded that defendant Bryan deliver the same to the sheriff, but that defendant Bryan refused to deliver the money to the sheriff upon said writ of execution or otherwise, or to deliver the same to plaintiff until the question as to which of said claimants was entitled to the same was determined by the court; followed by a prayer that the court determine and adjudge to whom said fund belongs.

Upon the application of Bryan he was permitted to withdraw this answer, and granted five days within which to answer the complaint. Thereafter, and within the time so fixed for filing an answer, Bryan, purporting to act under the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, and pursuant to notice given, made a motion for an order substituting James C. Byers as sheriff of San Diego county and the First National Bank of San Diego as defendants in the action, and that upon his depositing in court the said sum of $3,000 he be discharged from liability to any of said parties on account of said deposit so made with him by plaintiff. This motion was supported by an affidavit setting forth in substance the facts contained in the answer filed by Bryan to the complaint herein. Thereupon, on May 24, 1918, the court made an order granting his motion, and substituted as defendants in said action James C. Byers as sheriff and the First National Bank of San Diego, Cal., and thereafter made its order, reciting that Bryan had complied with its direction with reference to the deposit in court of said sum of money, and ordered, adjudged, and decreed that Bryan be fully discharged and released from any liability whatsoever to any of the parties in the action, and dismissed him as a defendant therein.

The sheriff and First National Bank, as substituted defendants, filed their joint answer, alleging the money upon which the execution had been levied to satisfy the judgment entered against defendant in the case of the bank against Couden was the property of the latter, and praying that the same be applied in payment of said judgment. Upon the issues so joined, the court, among other adverse findings to plaintiff, found that the sum of money so deposited with Bryan was the property of Couden, and, on June 9, 1919, rendered and entered a judgment that plaintiff take nothing, and "defendants do have and recover of and from said plaintiff the sum of $———, costs and disbursements incurred in this action," thus leaving the subject of the litigation, in so far as concerned the rights of the bank thereto, undetermined. On August 7, 1919, plaintiff gave notice of appeal from this judgment. After the rendition thereof and as recited therein, the court, on August 6th, rendered an amended judgment, dated August 6th, indorsed "Filed August 9, 1919, J. B. McLees, Clerk," whereby the First National Bank was awarded the amount due on its judgment against Couden. Thereafter plaintiff filed a notice of appeal from the judgment as so amended. As ground for the reversal thereof counsel for appellant insists that it was rendered on August 9th, two days after the appeal had been taken on August 7th from the original judgment theretofore rendered on June 9th, by reason of which, if in fact the judgment was rendered on August 9th, the effect thereof, as claimed by appellant, was to remove the case from the jurisdiction of the superior court.

[1] The amended judgment, however, contains the recital that—

> "On the 6th day of August, 1919, pursuant to due notice regularly given, the plaintiff having in open court moved that said judgment be amended by including therein a final disposition of the funds now impounded by this court, to wit, the sum of $3,000, heretofore deposited with the court by the former defendant herein, Solon Bryan, pursuant to the order of the court heretofore made herein, and the motion of the said plaintiff being now granted, wherefore, by reason of the law and the premises, it is hereby ordered, adjudged, and decreed that," etc.

Conceding that jurisdiction to render this amended judgment could not be conferred by the fact that the action of the court was on plaintiff's motion (Kinard v. Jordan, 175 Cal. 13, 164 Pac. 894; Parkside, etc., Co. v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 346, 139 Pac. 805), nevertheless, in the absence of anything contained in the record inconsistent therewith, the recital that the judgment was rendered on August 6th must be accepted as true. Hence we must assume the judgment, though not filed by the clerk or entered until August 9th, was rendered as stated therein on August 6, 1919, and prior to the appeal, at which time the court had jurisdiction to amend the judgment theretofore entered. Takekawa v. Hole, 170 Cal. 323, 149 Pac. 593; City & County v. Brown, 153 Cal. 644, 96 Pac. 281.

[2] As to the original judgment rendered on June 9, 1919, and so amended, as stated, by order of court on August 6th, appellant's chief contention is that, by reason of the fact that Bryan had filed an answer in said action so brought by plaintiff against him, the court had no power under the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, to make the order releasing him from liability as a defendant, and substituting the bank as defendant in said action. In an application made by plaintiff for a writ of mandate against the superior court, he made the same contention, based, as now, upon the ground that, notwithstanding the fact that Bryan had no answer on file when the order of substitution of defendants was made, the court had no jurisdiction to make it, and in deciding the question the court, in Israel v. Superior Court, 185 Pac. 682, said:

"That the court, in permitting the defendant Bryan to withdraw his answer, was acting within its jurisdiction, is not, and, in our opinion cannot be, questioned in this proceeding. Miles et al. v. Danforth, 37 Ill. 157; Rowan v. Kirkpatrick, 14 Ill. 1; Bash v. Evans, 40 Ind. 256. The order permitting the withdrawal of the answer and granting leave to file another was made at the same time; hence the answer on file protected defendant from default to a time when the order granting five days within which to file another answer became operative and in effect, prior to the expiration of which time the fund was deposited in court and the order made releasing Bryan from liability. In effect the situation was the same as though defendant, instead of filing the answer so withdrawn, had asked and obtained from the court an extension of time, not exceeding 30 days, within which to answer, as provided in section 1054, Code of Civil Procedure. Hence we are of the opinion that the court in the exercise of its discretion, and acting within its jurisdiction, had power to permit the answer to be withdrawn and to grant defendant time, not exceeding 30 days in addition to that allowed by the Code (section 1054, supra) within which to file an answer. This being true [and there being no answer], it must follow that the proceedings had and taken pursuant to the provisions of section 386, Code of Civil Procedure, under which Bryan deposited the fund in controversy in court and the substitution of the parties defendant was made, were within the power of the court."

Having, in Israel v. Superior Court, supra, held the court had jurisdiction to make the order, the decision there made must be deemed res adjudicata as to the question now again presented.

[3] The court in express terms found that the writ of execution was served upon Bryan, and "that on the 26th day of February, 1918, the said Solon Bryan made his return as demanded, * * * in which he reported that he had possession of and was holding said sum of $3,000." Appellant insists that such finding is insufficient to show that the levy was made in the manner provided by statute upon the money so deposited with Bryan. Section 688, Code of Civil Procedure, under title of "What Shall be Liable to be Seized in Execution," provides that all moneys of the judgment debtor are liable to execution, and where, as here, held by one other than the judgment debtor, it "may be levied upon * * * in like manner as like property may be attached." And subdivision 5 of section 542, Code of Civil Procedure, provides how such property shall be levied upon under a writ of attachment, namely, by leaving with the person having possession or control of the money a notice as therein prescribed. It is a well-settled rule that findings of fact made by a trial court are to receive such construction as will uphold rather than defeat the judgment based thereon. In the absence of any evidence showing how the levy was made, the finding of the court that the execution was served upon Bryan implies that it was duly served in full compliance with the provisions of the statute.

[4] We may concede that, as claimed by appellant, a judgment creditor cannot maintain an action at law against a debtor of his debtor without the issuance and levy of a writ of attachment, and that no proceeding therefor was had in this action, and likewise concede that plaintiff cannot maintain a creditors' bill to subject property to the payment of a judgment without alleging and proving that an execution has been returned unsatisfied. Matteson, etc., Co. v. Conley, 144 Cal. 483, 77 Pac. 1042; Herrlich v. Kaufmann, 99 Cal. 271, 33 Pac. 857, 37 Am. St. Rep. 50. But the First National Bank, as judgment creditor of Couden, was not seeking to recover from either Israel or Bryan as a debtor of Couden, but by virtue of its judgment against the latter it caused the levy of execution to be made upon the fund in the hands of Bryan, claiming that the same was the property of Couden. By reason of Bryan depositing the money in court and his release from liability, the bank could not proceed upon supplementary proceedings to have the money applied in satisfaction of the execution. As a substituted party, its only course was by answer to set forth its right to the fund, and, as between itself and plaintiff as other claimant, submit the question to the determination of the court.

[5] That the fund so deposited by plaintiff with Solon Bryan and upon which the execution was levied was at all times in question the property of Couden conclusively appears from the finding made by the court upon the trial of the issue as to ownership thereof, and that the action of the court, in the custody of which the money was by its order deposited, in applying the same to the payment of a valid judgment rendered in favor of the bank and against Couden, was a just and righteous disposition of the same, cannot be questioned. Under these circumstances, even though conceding there were irregularities in the proceedings, nevertheless the judgment, in accordance with the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution should be affirmed.

The objection that the sheriff was by the order improperly made a defendant is well founded. Sublette v. Melhado, 1 Cal. 104; Brummagim v. Boucher, 6 Cal. 16. In no event, however, could plaintiff have been prejudiced thereby.

The judgment is affirmed.

I concur: JAMES, J.

CONREY, P. J. I concur in the judgment. I do not agree that the court, on this record, had jurisdiction to render and enter the amended judgment, except under the authority conferred by section 663 and 663a, Code of Civil Procedure. But since there does not appear to have been any notice of entry of the judgment that was entered on June 9th, the notice of motion to amend was apparently made within the time limit prescribed by section 663a.

Opinion of Supreme Court, In Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court is denied.

[6-8] We are not in accord with the statement in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal that "the sheriff was improperly made a defendant" in the proceeding for an interpleader by the defendant in the superior court. The sheriff had served a notice of attachment of the money in the hands of Bryan belonging to Couden, and the sheriff had a sufficient interest to entitle him to appear and show the true title to the money in behalf of his principal, the plaintiff in the action in which the judgment was issued, unless prior to the filing of the interpleader he had made return upon the writ of attachment. This fact does not appear. A sheriff who has attached property has the right to defend the title of the attachment defendant thereto so as to protect his writ, at least until he has made return so that the plaintiff in the action may make his defense thereto. The cases cited in the opinion merely hold that the sheriff cannot recover the money from the attachment defendant, and that the court in the attachment proceeding should not order it to be paid to the sheriff prior to the final disposition of the case in which the levy was made. The proceeding in interpleader is a proceeding in equity, and all persons having any right or interest to protect may properly be made parties to such proceeding.

[9] We are also of the opinion that the amendment of the judgment made on August 6th can only be upheld on the theory that, as no notice of the entry of the judgment had been given, it must be assumed that, in effect, the amendment was made under the authority of section 663a of the Code of Civil Procedure, as indicated in the concurring opinion of Presiding Justice CONREY.

SCHWARTZ v. DIBBLEE et al. (Civ. 3437.)

1. Public lands ⊂=28—Last-accepted survey before patent controls.

Before patent the government may make as many surveys of public land as the Land Department desires, and the last-accepted survey will control.

2. Public lands ⊂=27—Survey of one township held not controlling with conflicting prior survey of another township.

A survey, purporting to be a survey of public lands in township 30, did not control over an accepted survey and subdivisional survey of lands in township 29, in an action involving the south boundary of section 33, the surveys being conflicting, in that, the surveyor of township 29 having dropped a tally of 10 chains in his survey, the surveyor of township 30 attempted to correct the error by establishing the north line of township 30 some distance south of the south line of township 29.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by S. L. Schwartz against Wm. H. C. Dibblee and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Ricketts, of San Francisco, for appellant.

C. P. Kaetzel, of San Luis Obispo, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. Appellant brought this action to recover possession and the issues and profits of lot 14, in section 33, township 29 south, range 12 east, M. D. M., in San Luis Obispo county, alleged to have been unlawfully withheld by the defendants. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff appeals therefrom.

Appellant is the owner of an undivided three-quarters, and defendant Arata is the owner of an undivided one-quarter of the land described in the complaint. They became such owners through mesne conveyances from an owner to whom the land was patented by the United States government by patent of date September 28, 1904. The patent conveyed the land "according to the final plat of the survey of the said land returned to the General Land Office by the Surveyor General." Respondents are in possession of a chrome mining property called the "London Mine," from which they are alleged to have taken a large amount of valuable ore. If that mine is located on said lot 14, plaintiff has established a cause of action. If, as claimed by respondents, the mine is located south of lot 14, the judgment should be affirmed. While township 29 was government land, several surveys of the township or parts of it were made, the last of which was that made by J. R. Glover, unless, as claimed by appellant, the Glover survey was superseded by a later survey of government land made by one Bardwell, which survey was approved and filed in the General Land Office in 1889. The Glover survey was approved and filed in 1880. The judgment herein rests upon the Glover survey, which was received in evidence over the appellant's objections, based upon his contention that it had been superseded by the Bardwell survey.

[1] It is conceded to be the law that, before patent, the government may make as many surveys of a tract of public land as the Land Department desires, and that the last-accepted survey will control. The question here to be determined is whether or not the Bardwell survey is the last-accepted survey of the land in question prior to the date of the patent. The record shows that the Glover survey was made as a survey of lands in township 29, whereas the Bardwell survey purports and was intended to be a survey of lands in township 30, which lies immediately south of township 29. Bardwell assumed, in accordance with the correct theory and practice, that the north line of sections 1 to 6 in township 30, being the north line of the same township, should coincide with the south line of township 29. The notes of his survey show that in his search for the previously established monuments of surveys he discovered that Glover had erroneously dropped a tally of 10 chains in his survey. Concluding therefore, that this error should be corrected in his own survey, he established the north line of township 30 some distance south of the south line of township 29, as shown on the Glover survey. If the acceptance of the Bardwell survey thus made had the effect to move township 29 and the subdivisions therein south so as to coincide with the north line of township 30 as established by Bardwell, it will result that the mining property in question is located on plaintiff's land. If that result does not follow, then the defendants have not infringed upon the plaintiff's property.

[2] We must revert to the language of the patent which conveyed to the patentee, through whom plaintiff's title is derived (besides other property), lot 14, of section 33, in township 29 south, etc., "according to the final plat of the survey of the said land returned to the General Land Office by the Surveyor General." Both parties to this appeal have referred to Kimball v. McKee, 149 Cal. 435, 86 Pac. 1089, as the leading case bearing upon the question at issue. The Supreme Court there said:

"We also take judicial notice that under the laws of the United States and the regulations of the Land Office no sales of public lands are made until the plat and field notes of the subdivisional survey of the township in which they lie have been returned and approved, and that the patents issued to purchasers describe the lands patented as they are delineated on the approved plat, which remains a public record in the office of the Surveyor General, and copies of which, officially certified, are deposited in the local land office."

We do not understand that the particular question upon which the present decision must turn was decided in that case, and we doubt whether any case cited by counsel does decide this question. Perhaps the nearest expression of opinion applicable to the case in point is that found in Commissioner, etc., v. Beebe, 61 Mich. 1, 27 N. W. 713, where the court was discussing a question relating to the line between section 31 of one township and section 36 of the adjoining township, and no survey had been made except the east line of section 36. This survey the court said was in fact "as much a survey of the west line of 31 as it was of the east line of 36." While that might well have been assumed to be true and in accordance with the government theory of surveying in a case where only one survey had been made, it does not touch a situation arising out of conflicting surveys as here presented. We have reached the conclusion that since the Bardwell survey did not purport to be a survey of any lands in township 29, and since the accepted Glover survey was a survey, and a subdivisional survey, of lands in township 29, that the "final plat of the survey of the said land" referred to in said patent was the Glover survey, which was the last-accepted survey of that land.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DESCHENEAU. (Cr. 743.)

1. Burglary ⟸41(1)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for burglary under Pen. Code, § 459, in that defendant unlawfully entered a warehouse with intent to commit larceny, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Burglary ⟸15 — Person entering warehouse in trunk with knowledge of manager held guilty of burglary.

One who concealed himself in a trunk, and had a confederate store it in the vault of a warehouse, with intent to commit larceny, was guilty of burglary under Pen. Code, § 459, even though a detective received information that he would be concealed in the trunk and communicated such information to the manager of the warehouse, and such manager assisted in putting the trunk in the vault, at which time it was opened by an officer.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Charles Descheneau was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. Morgan Marmaduke, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Thomas A. Wood, of Los Angeles, for the People.

SHAW, J. By information filed, the defendant was charged with the crime of burglary, in that he unlawfully entered a warehouse with the intent to commit larceny. The trial resulted in his conviction, as charged, after which, upon a denial of his motion for a new trial, he appealed from the judgment pronounced against him.

[1] It appears from the evidence, in which there is little conflict, that defendant prepared a trunk arranged so that it could be unlocked and the lid opened from the inside, in which, at his room, he concealed himself, and, pursuant to an agreement made by his confederate, Earl Wilson, for the storage thereof in the vault of the Hollywood Fire Proof Storage Company, the trunk, with defendant therein, was by Wilson transported to the warehouse of the storage company, where it was unloaded upon the receiving platform and received by the employees of the company, who placed it upon a truck and conveyed it to the door of the vault, where Mr. Leonard, the manager, assisted in putting it into the vault. Thereupon an officer who was present opened the trunk, and, finding the defendant therein, took him into custody.

[2] Section 459 of the Penal Code defines burglary as follows:

"Every person who enters any * * * warehouse, * * * or any underground portion thereof, with intent to commit grand or petit larceny or any felony is guilty of burglary."

Notwithstanding defendant's testimony to the contrary, the evidence is amply sufficient to show, as found by the jury, that the act of defendant in thus gaining entrance to the warehouse was accompanied with the intent to commit larceny by freeing himself from the trunk while it was left in the vault and, during the night following its deposit, take goods and articles from the shelves therein, and, after placing them in the trunk, return to his hiding place therein and await the return of Wilson, who, according to the arrangement, was to call for the trunk and contents the next morning. Indeed, we do not understand appellant to question the sufficiency of the evidence to justify such conclusion of the jury. The contention of his counsel is that, since it is made to appear that a detective had from some private source received information that defendant would be concealed in the trunk so delivered by Wilson for storage and communicated such information to the manager of the warehouse, defendant's entry in the manner stated was with the permission and consent on the part of the owner, and hence, having knowledge that he was concealed in the trunk and knowingly permitting him to so enter the vault, the act, whatever his intent, did not constitute burglary. In support of this contention a number of common-law authorities, together with decisions from other states, are cited. These authorities, however, have no application to the crime of burglary as defined by the section of the Penal Code above quoted. In the case of People v. Barry, 94 Cal. 481, 29 Pac. 1026, it is said that common-law burglary and statutory burglary in this state have but few elements in common, and the plain language of our statute must control as to the acts which constitute the crime. In that case the crime, the commission of which was sustained by the court, was based upon the fact that the defendant entered a grocery store during business hours and attempted to commit larceny therein. In People v. Brittain, 142 Cal. 8, 75 Pac. 314, 100 Am. St. Rep. 95, the defendant entered a store in the nighttime, but during business hours and while the store was open to the public, and because such entry was with the intent to commit larceny the act was held to constitute the offense of burglary. The court there said:

"No words are found in the statute qualifying the character, kind, time, or manner of the entry, save that such entry must be accompanied with a certain intent."

One may, during business hours when a store is open to the public, enter therein with a view to purchasing goods, and if, after he enters, he concludes to steal, such act would constitute larceny only; but if when he entered he intended to commit larceny, his act, under the statute of this state, constitutes burglary, even though the proprietor of the store, having knowledge of his purpose in entering, does nothing to prevent it.

While, according to defendant's testimony, he did not intend to commit larceny, but caused himself to be so transported to the vault with the intention to be found engaged in a game of solitaire when the employees of the warehouse opened the door, and thus create surprise and consternation on their part, with a view of attracting the attention of proprietors engaged in the moving picture business and thus obtain employment, the jury, as shown by their verdict, did not believe the story, but were satisfied from other sufficient evidence that his intent was to steal the property in possession of the owners of the warehouse, and to have himself, together with the stolen goods, transported therefrom the next day.

We find no merit in the appeal.

The judgment is affirmed.

BORGES v. HILLMAN et al. (Civ. 2217.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 14, 1921.)

1. Limitation of actions ⊂=47(3)—Action on undertaking on appeal brought 31 days after original judgment became final held not barred.

Since an action against sureties on an undertaking for costs on appeal will not lie until the original judgment becomes final, where suit on the undertaking is brought 31 days thereafter there can be no merit in the claim that the action is barred by the statute of limitations.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=1246—Whether attorney of deceased tenant's administrator had found rent receipts held proper inquiry in action on undertaking covering receipt of rents and profits.

In an action on an undertaking on appeal in an action for rents and profits, whereby the sureties made themselves liable for such rents and profits, and it appeared that the original defendant's tenant died while residing on the place covered by the lease, it was proper to inquire of the administrator's attorney if he had found any receipts for rent from such defendant as bearing on rents received.

3. Appeal and error ⊂=1246 — Evidence sustaining finding of giving of rent receipt in action on undertaking covering rents and profits.

In an action on an undertaking on appeal covering rents and profits, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that receipts for rents by the original defendant to a deceased tenant had been given, but had been lost, as bearing on the question of the amount of rents received.

4. Appeal and error ⊂=1246—In action on undertaking covering rents and profits, lease held admissible to show amount of rent collected.

In an action on an undertaking on appeal of a suit for rents and profits, a lease from the original defendant's tenant held admissible to show how much rent had been collected.

5. Appeal and error ⊂=1246 — In action on undertaking covering rents and profits, evidence of amount of rent received held admissible, although landlord not a party.

In an action on an undertaking on appeal in a suit for rents and profits, evidence as to how much rent had been collected by defendant of the original suit held admissible, although such defendant not a party.

Appeal from Superior Court, Napa County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by Joseph F. Borges against E. C. Hillman and others upon an undertaking for costs. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. L. Webber, of Napa, for appellants.

Clarence N. Riggins, of Napa, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The suit was upon an undertaking executed by defendants. Therein they guaranteed the payment of the costs on appeal from an order appointing a receiver in an action brought by Joseph F. Borges against Ida J. Dunham to have it decreed that said plaintiff was the owner of a certain tract of land comprising 170 acres, and that said defendant held the same in trust for the use and benefit of said Borges, and to recover the rents and profits of said land. In said undertaking the sureties also made themselves liable for the payment by said Dunham of said rents and profits, limiting, however, their responsibility for both purposes to the sum of $1,000. The judgment was in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $839, from which the appeal has been taken. A similar action was brought in 1915, and it was claimed by defendants, among other things, that it was premature, since the judgment in the original action had not become final. This view was adopted by the trial court, and the judgment was affirmed herein. The said original judgment became final, by virtue of the action of the Supreme Court in dismissing the appeal October 13, 1919. Thirty-one days thereafter this action was brought and resulted as we have stated. The facts are fully set forth and the validity of said undertaking upheld in the decision of this court, speaking through Justice Hart, in Borges v. Hillman, 29 Cal. App. 144, 154 Pac. 1075. That decision is virtually determinative of this appeal, and only brief consideration is required of two or three additional points made by appellants.

[1] The contention that the action is barred by the statute of limitations is virtually answered by said decision of this court. It being held therein that the action against the sureties would not lie until the original judgment became final, and this suit having been brought in 31 days thereafter, manifestly there is no merit in this claim.

It appears that the only issue of fact involved in the trial was as to the amount of rent received from the tenant by Ida J. Dunham. As to this the evidence was abundantly sufficient to support the finding of the trial court. Specific attention is called to said testimony in the brief of respondent and no reply is made thereto by appellants.

[2, 3] However, complaint is made of the action of the court in overruling an objection to some of the evidence offered to show the amount collected. It seems that one Panizza, who was the tenant of the premises, died while still living on the place covered by the lease, and the attorney for the administrator was asked if he made any search among the papers of the deceased to ascertain if there were therein any receipts for rent from the said Ida J. Dunham. The inquiry was entirely proper. If he had found any such purported receipt, the evidence would have been followed, no doubt, by a showing or an attempt to show that it was executed by said Dunham. This, of course, would have been evidence that she had received the money. The witness answered that he diligently searched among the effects of the deceased but found no such paper. His answer was thereupon used as furnishing the foundation for testimony on the part of the attorney for plaintiff that he had seen in the possession of said tenant a receipt from said Ida J. Dunham for the sum of $300. The trial court was justified in concluding that said receipt was given but had been lost. Indeed, the explanation of said attorney for plaintiff in giving his testimony made it clear why no particular effort was made to preserve said receipt.

[4] There seems to be no valid objection to the action of the court in admitting the lease in evidence. It was for the purpose of showing what was due from the tenant. This would constitute a circumstance tending to show how much rent was collected. The most that could be said against it is that it was unnecessary, but assuredly it could not have prejudiced the defendants.

[5] Appellants seem to be of the opinion that the evidence as to how much rent was collected by the said Ida J. Dunham was not admissible, since she was not a party to this action. But it is apparent that the obligation of defendants rested upon that circumstance, and it is difficult to understand how the extent of the liability of appellants could have been determined without evidence of said collection.

We find no substantial merit in the appeal. In fact, our former decision leaves little to be said.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. MUSUMECI. (Cr. 886.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 18, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1159(2, 4)—Weight of testimony, credibility of witnesses, and deductions to be drawn are matters for jury.

The weight of the testimony, the credibility of the witnesses, and the deductions to be drawn from the evidence are matters addressed to the consideration of the jurors, and not to the appellate court.

2. Homicide ⟸276 — Self-defense issue held for jury.

In a homicide prosecution, the question of self-defense held for the jury.

3. Criminal law ⟸825(1) — Court's reference to instructions as those requested by defendant not error.

Action of court in referring to instructions as those having been offered by the defendant held not error as against contention that the jury might have inferred therefrom that the defendant's instructions were of inferior importance to those given by the court, in absence of request by defendant for instruction that the jury were bound by such instructions and were required to accept them as the law in the case.

4. Homicide ⟸297—Instruction on justifiable homicide sufficient.

In homicide prosecution, where defendant requested that jury be instructed under Pen. Code, § 199, that "the homicide appearing to be justifiable or excusable the person indicted must upon his trial be fully acquitted and discharged," the court's omission of the words "upon his trial" from the instruction as given held not ground for reversal.

5. Criminal law ⟸806(3) — Omission from part of instructions of admonition as to reasonable doubt not ground for reversal.

In a homicide prosecution, court's elimination from some of the instructions requested by the defendant of admonition that, if there was a reasonable doubt as to the existence of facts, it was its duty to find defendant not guilty, held not ground for reversal.

6. Criminal law ⟸807(1)—Argumentative instructions properly refused.

Instructions which are argumentative and in the nature of special pleas may correctly be refused.

7. Criminal law ⟸782(16) — Instruction on proof of self-defense held sufficient.

In homicide prosecution, instruction as to sufficiency of proof of self-defense held sufficient.

8. Criminal law ⟸778(4) — Instruction as to presumption of innocence held sufficient.

In homicide prosecution, instruction as to presumption of innocence under Pen. Code, § 1096, held sufficient.

9. Criminal law ⟸806(1)—Substance of given instructions need not be repeated.

Instructions given in substance need not be repeated.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Luigi Musumeci was convicted of manslaughter, and from order denying motion for new trial and judgment of imprisonment, he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. Defendant was charged by information with the murder of one E. A. Weber. The jury returned a verdict finding him guilty of the crime of manslaughter. He appeals from the order of the trial court denying his motion for a new trial and from the judgment of imprisonment in the state prison.

Weber, the deceased, was employed as a conductor on one of the street cars on the Union Street branch of the Municipal Railway system in San Francisco. On the night of April 20, 1919, at about 10:30 o'clock, defendant, Musumeci, together with his sister and brother-in-law and their three children, were passengers on his car. A controversy arose between Weber and the defendant over the payment of fares. During the altercation which followed Musumeci drew a revolver and shot the conductor three times, inflicting woulds from which Weber died shortly after. Defendant jumped from the car and fled. Some of the passengers on the car and a police officer pursued him and placed him under arrest. When questioned by the police officer the defendant made a statement concerning the shooting, which, being then and there reduced to writing, the defendant signed. In it he stated that both he and his brother-in-law, La Rocca, had paid the conductor fares for the party; that upon discovering this fact he had demanded return of the money, and was told that it would be necessary for him to go to the office and make his claim; that he insisted upon being paid then and there, and the conductor told him to get off the car, and upon his refusal Weber struck him in the face; that he (defendant) got excited and "lost his head," pulled the gun from his back pocket, and shot him (the conductor) three times; that, when he shot Weber, the conductor had his hand drawn back to strike him a second time.

[1, 2] At the trial defendant claimed that in shooting Weber he acted in self-defense. The jury rejected his plea and found him guilty of manslaughter. In view of the nature of the charge against defendant and the serious consequences attending his conviction, we have carefully read the testimony in the case. There is evidence in the record which, if believed by the jury, as it evidently was, amply supports the verdict. In fact, we are of the opinion that the defendant may well consider himself extremely lucky that the verdict did not pronounce him guilty of the more serious offense with which he was charged. It is unnecessary for us to review the testimony here, for its weight, the credibility of the witnesses testifying at the trial, and the necessary deductions to be drawn from the evidence were all matters addressed to the consideration of the jurors. The disputed questions as to whether or not his plea of self-defense was sound, or was corroborated, were likewise for the jury to determine. People v. Hecker, 109 Cal. 451, 458, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403.

Appellant's contention upon this appeal appears to be more directly addressed to the charge that the judge misdirected the jury. He first complains that the court identified and segregated the instructions offered by the defendant to such an extent and in such a way as to advise the jury to give less weight to them than to the instructions given by the court of his own volition. His complaint arises from the fact that, after reading the information and informing the jury as to the nature of the charge, and giving a number of instructions defining murder, and the necessary elements entering into that crime, the court said:

"At this time I will read to you the following offered instructions. You are to accept them as statements of law bearing upon the case, and as such they are entitled to your consideration."

The court then gave the instructions offered by the defendant with such modifications as were proper, ending with the statement:

"That concludes the reading of the instructions offered by the defendants."

The rest of the charge followed. There was no other segregation or reference to the defendant's proposed instructions.

[3] We are unable to agree with the appellant that this action on the part of the trial court was in any way prejudicial to his interests. The jurors were correctly instructed that they must accept the instructions "as statements of law bearing upon the case," and that as such they must consider them. As modified by the court, they appear to be correct statements of the law. Appellant's counsel in his brief says:

"The instructions proposed by the defendant are of equal dignity, and to him of vastly greater importance than those given by the court. They are entitled to more than consideration by the jury. They are the law of the particular case. The jury is absolutely bound by them."

It is equally true that the jury is bound to accept every instruction given by the court as the law of the case. We think the jury well understood the court's admonitions to give due consideration to the charge. If the defendant had desired an instruction to the effect that the jury were bound by the instructions of the court, and must accept them as the law in the case, or if he desired any other instruction of like import, it was his duty to prepare and submit it to the trial judge with the request that it be given.

Not only was that his rightful privilege, but in the instant case he was asked by the court at the conclusion of the charge if there were any other or further instructions that he desired to be given. No error appears to us from this incident of the trial and none will be presumed.

[4] Defendant offered as one of his instructions section 199 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows:

"The homicide appearing to be justifiable or excusable, the person indicted must, upon his trial, be fully acquitted and discharged."

Appellant complains that the court modified the instruction by leaving out the words "upon his trial." No harm was done by the modification. Under the circumstances, the defendant then being actually on trial before a jury sworn to try him, the sense and meaning of the section was not thereby materially changed.

[5, 6] The defendant offered a large number of correct instructions on the law, based on certain facts in evidence, concluding each with a statement to the effect that, if the jury found these facts, or if there was a reasonable doubt that such facts existed, it was then its duty to find the defendant not guilty. In a number of instances the court eliminated this admonition from the instruction. "These excisions," it is claimed by the appellant, had the effect of depriving the defendant of his "right to emphasize" a correctly stated proposition of law, and had the effect of "devitalizing and emasculating" the propositions of law presented in the instructions. He relies upon the decision in People v. Hecker, supra, in which case the same course was pursued by the trial court as in this. It was held in that case that to eliminate the admonition to "find the defendant not guilty," in case of a reasonable doubt, from one of the instructions was not error; yet the practice was criticized as being unwise. We do not feel that any stronger criticism need be made in the instant case; for, while the court did strike the admonition from several of the instructions, it was allowed to remain in a number of others. Instructions which are argumentative and in the nature of special pleas may correctly be refused. People v. Allen, 144 Cal. 298, 302, 77 Pac. 948; People v. Barney, 114 Cal. 554, 557, 47 Pac. 41.

There was no error in striking from the eighth instruction, requested by defendant, the concluding admonition that the jury should "accept his (defendant's) explanation"; for the court, in the instruction, properly told the jury that it was the right of the defendant to explain his conduct before and after the death of Weber, and, if his explanation created any reasonable doubt in their minds, it was their duty to resolve that reasonable doubt favorably to the defendant.

[7] The defendant requested the court to charge the jury as follows:

"You are instructed that defendant is not bound to prove to your satisfaction beyond all reasonable doubt that he acted in his own defense, nor is it the law that he must prove that he acted in his defense by a preponderance, or greater weight, or amount of the evidence. He is only bound to produce such evidence as will create in the minds of the jury a reasonable doubt of his guilt of the offense charged, and in the case at bar, if you find that the defendant, Luigi Musumeci, has raised or created in your minds a reasonable doubt as to his guilt of the offense charged, it is your duty to resolve such doubt in favor of the defendant and find him not guilty, even though you may not be entirely satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt or even satisfied by a preponderance of the evidence that he acted in his proper self-defense."

The court modified the instruction by striking out the portion italicized. It would have been proper to give the entire instruction, but we think it was sufficiently complete without the portion omitted to carry its full import to the jury, and therefore no injury was done to defendant's cause.

[8, 9] The eleventh and twelfth instructions offered by the defendant related, respectively, to the burden of proof and the presumption of innocence. The trial court did not read them in its charge, but noted on each that they were "given in substance." Appellant contends that this is not true, but we find he is mistaken. The court, of its own motion, however, charged the jury that on arraignment the defendant had pleaded not guilty, thus putting in issue every material allegation contained in the information, and then gave the following instructions:

"The determination of a jury in a criminal case involves the proof of two distinct propositions: First, that the crime charged was committed; and, second, that it was committed by the person accused thereof and on trial therefor. These two propositions, and every essential and material fact necessary to them, or either of them, must be established by the people to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. * * * In every criminal proceeding under our system, the defendant is presumed to be innocent until the contrary is proven, and in case of a reasonable doubt whether his guilt is satisfactorily shown he is entitled to an acquittal at your hands."

The court's reference to the presumption of innocence follows the plain letter of the statute. Pen. Code, § 1096. This instruction was followed by the simple and approved definition of the term "reasonable doubt." People v. Paulsell, 115 Cal. 6, 11, 46 Pac. 734. In other portions of the charge the jurors were instructed that they could return a verdict against the defendant only when they should be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that he was guilty under the information; that, if they had any reasonable doubt upon the question as to whether the defendant shot the decedent in self-defense, it would be their duty to find him not guilty; that, if they had any reasonable doubt upon the question of the defendant's flight, it was their duty to resolve that doubt in favor of the defendant; that, if they had any reasonable doubt as to the explanation given by the defendant as to the statements or conduct in connection with the killing of the deceased, it was their duty to resolve that doubt in favor of the defendant. One other instruction has already been quoted by us in full in another connection. Viewed as a whole, we think the charge sufficiently informed the jury on the law of the burden of proof and the presumption of innocence. It is not incumbent upon the trial court in such cases to include in its charge instructions which amount to a reiteration of the points already covered. The rule is well settled that instructions given in substance need not be repeated. People v. Elliott, 119 Cal. 593, 594, 51 Pac. 955.

"The trial judge should take care to give to the jury once and in clear language every principle of law applicable to the particular case. When he has done this, he is not required to repeat any of them, no matter how many separate instructions are asked which may include them. Such continual repetition tends to give undue emphasis to the particular point to which they may relate, and operates to confuse the jury in their consideration of the evidence." People v. Bickerstaff (Sup.) 190 Pac. 661.

Appellant requested the court to give many instructions bearing upon the law of self-defense. A number were given, some were refused, and others were modified. Further instructions bearing on the same subject were given by the court of his own volition. Appellant contends the court committed error in this regard. Reading these instructions as a whole, we think the law of self-defense was correctly stated and the subject sufficiently covered. People v. Hecker, supra, 109 Cal. 463, 464, 42 Pac. 307, 30 L. R. A. 403.

The judgment is affirmed.

ROSS v. GOINS et al. (Civ. 2228.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 16, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 14, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⟹180(3)—Tenant's complaint alleging unlawful removal by force held insufficient.

Tenant's complaint, alleging that landlords, through their agent, removed tenant from premises "by force and violence and against his will and without due process of law and more particularly as follows," and reciting as particulars that defendants entered the premises by force and violence, ransacked the house, removed tenant's personal property therefrom, destroyed portions of his property therein, and struck tenant, knocking him to the floor, knocking out several of his teeth and causing other injuries, held not to state a cause of action against the landlords, since the allegation as to removal is in itself incomplete, and since the acts recited in particularization constituted no part of the act of removal.

2. Action ⟹45(1)—Causes for unlawful removal of tenant, injuries to person and property, conversion of personal property, and trespass upon real property, held improperly united.

Tenant's complaint against landlords and their agent, charging that the landlords by the agent removed tenant from premises by force and violence without due process of law, removed tenant's personal property therefrom, and destroyed portions thereof and struck tenant, knocking him down and injuring him, held bad for misjoinder.

3. Landlord and tenant ⟹180(3)—Tenant's complaint against landlords charging criminal acts by agent without alleging landlord's authorization insufficient.

Tenant's complaint, alleging that landlords through their agent removed tenant from premises by force and violence, removed tenant's property from premises, destroyed portions thereof, and struck tenant, knocking him down and injuring him, without alleging that the landlords authorized, directed, or commanded such acts on the part of the agent, held insufficient to state a cause of action against the landlords in view of Civ. Code, §§ 2338, 2339; a general allegation of agency being insufficient to charge principal with liability for the agent's wanton and malicious acts.

4. Pleading ⟹218(3) — Inadvertent order overruling demurrer on certain grounds after having sustained it on other grounds properly set aside.

Where court, after sustaining demurrer as to certain grounds, some months later inadvertently entered an order purporting to overrule it on other grounds, the court had a right, on discovery that it had previously sustained demurrer to set aside the inadvertent order.

5. Pleading ⟹223—Demurrer sustained, if at all, in its entirety.

When a demurrer is sustained, it is sustained for all purposes and upon every issue and in its entirety as to the count toward which it is directed.

6. Pleading ⟹192(2)—Tenant's complaint against landlords and landlords' agent held demurrable for uncertainty and ambiguity.

Tenant's complaint against landlords and their agent, in which a cause of action for forcible removal without due process of law was improperly joined with other causes of action for destruction and conversion of tenant's property and for striking and injuring tenant, which causes of action were not separately stated and some of which were against the landlords and the agent and others only against the agent, held demurrable on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; George F. Buck, Judge.

Action by William Ross against John M. Goins, Amelia E. Podesta, Florence L. Podesta, and Adeline De Paoli. Judgment for the three last-named defendants on plaintiff's refusal to amend after demurrer to complaint was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter, of Stockton, for appellant.

George F. McNoble and W. G. Williams, both of Stockton, for respondents.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. A demurrer to the second amended complaint was sustained by the trial court and the plaintiff declined further to amend. He appeals from the judgment following such refusal. The interests of defendant John M. Goins are not involved in this appeal. The grounds of demurrer are various. It is claimed that the complaint fails to state a cause of action; that it is unintelligible, uncertain, and ambiguous; and that several causes of action have been improperly united. The portions of the complaint material to this inquiry read as follows:

"That on the said 2d day of February, 1918, plaintiff was rightfully in possession of said premises and occupying the same as the tenant thereof under the aforesaid owners and their said agent John M. Goins.

"That on and prior to the said 2d day of February, 1918, defendant John M. Goins was the duly authorized agent, servant, and employee of the above-named owners of said real property, for all purposes connected with the leasing and collecting of rents on the premises above described, and in securing tenants therefor and in discharging and ejecting tenants therefrom.

"That on the said 2d day of February, 1918, the said defendant owners by and through their said agent, servant, and employee, John M. Goins, undertook to remove and did remove the plaintiff herein from said building and premises by force and violence and against his will and without due process of law and more particularly as follows."

Then follows a long array of events, all of which relate back to said introductory words, "more particularly as follows," and none of which in any way or degree show or tend to show any removal or attempted removal of the plaintiff.

Said long array of events comprises an allegation that the defendants entered by force and violence and ransacked the house, removed plaintiff's personal property therefrom, destroyed portions of his machinery therein, broke open and destroyed a case of dyes, carried away three suits of clothing, knocked the plaintiff to the floor with great force and violence, sat upon his body, struck plaintiff in the face, knocked out several of his teeth, gagged him, and hurt and bruised him about the chest, right shoulder, left leg, and left foot, to his damage in the sum of $10,000.

[1] Many of these events, if standing alone and tendered as independent averments, would doubtless state causes of action, but when averred as a particularization of the act of removal of the plaintiff from the premises, they fail to have any meaning. Each one of them shows upon its face that it constitutes no part of the act of removal, yet it is only for the purpose of particularizing the alleged removal that they are offered.

Nor does the paragraph which alleges the removal state a cause of action. By its own terms it is incomplete, since it is limited and particularized by the closing clause thereof, which reads, "and more particularly as follows," but the parts that follow do not relate to the matter of removal. It does not therefore, in its present shape, state a cause of action. It would perhaps state a cause of action if we excised therefrom the particularization clause, but it is unnecessary to consider the point.

[2] If we disregard the language and purpose of the complaint in attempting to make this long array of events a part of the paragraph charging an unlawful removal of the plaintiff from the premises, and make an effort to consider them each as an independent averment, we encounter various difficulties. Considering them as applicable to all the defendants, we find that they are improperly joined in the same complaint with a cause of action for unlawful removal; that allegations charging injuries to person and property are improperly joined with a cause of action for conversion of personal property; and that all these are joined with a cause of action for trespass upon real property.

[3] There is no allegation that the unlawful removal is a part of the same general series of torts stated in the following paragraph. The allegations charging crimes are quite insufficient to show that the respondents authorized, directed or commanded the criminal acts. Fogel v. Schmalz, 92 Cal. 412, 28 Pac. 444; Mendelsohn v. Anaheim, etc., 40 Cal. 657. In the Mendelsohn Case the court said:

"It is well settled that though the principal is liable for the actual damage caused by the act of his agent done in the usual course of his employment, he is not responsible for wanton and malicious damage done by the agent without the consent, approval or subsequent ratification of the principal."

Sections 2338 and 2339 of the Civil Code are conclusive on this point. The allegation of the complaint as to the agency of Goins in the commission of the assault is:

"John M. Goins, as such agent, servant and employee of said owners and while acting in their behalf, then and there knocked the plaintiff," etc.

A general allegation of agency is wholly insufficient to charge a principal with liability for the agent's wanton and malicious acts, but it must be averred that the principal "authorized or ratified them." Section 2339, supra. The rule holding carriers liable for the torts of their conductors and brakemen in no way conflicts with this principle. A cause of action for assault is stated against defendant Goins and not against the respondents, and therefore this cause of action is improperly joined with causes of action against respondents.

[4] The trial court sustained the demurrer as to certain grounds, and some months later inadvertently entered an order purporting to overrule it on certain other grounds. On discovering this it set aside this inadvertent order, as it had a lawful right to do.

[5] When the court sustained the demurrer it was deemed to be sustained on any and every tenable ground, whether general or special. Under our practice a demurrer sustained is sustained for all purposes and upon every issue and in its entirety, so far as involves the count toward which it is directed. Sechrist v. Rialto, etc., 129 Cal. 640, 62 Pac. 261.

[6] The complaint does not state a cause of action against the respondents; the cause of action for removal is improperly joined with other causes of action; a number of causes of action are not separately stated; some are against all the defendants and some against only defendant Goins; and the demurrer was properly sustained on the ground of uncertainty and ambiguity.

The judgment is affirmed.

GRAHAM v. ALCHIAN. (Civ. 3499, S. F. 9478.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 4, 1921. Rehearing Denied March 5, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 5, 1921.)

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

Appeal and error ⊂⊃164—Plaintiff, enforcing judgment in his favor, cannot appeal from judgment.

A plaintiff who has obtained a judgment in his favor in an action to recover personal property, and has taken out a writ of execution and satisfied the judgment in the trial court, is not entitled to have his appeal from the judgment considered on its merits, and the appeal will be dismissed; plaintiff having taken the appeal because he was not awarded damages for detention, and trial court having found that there was no damage resulting from any act of the defendant that would not be recompensed by the money judgment given for the value of the property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by George G. Graham against A. H. Alchian. Judgment for only part of relief prayed for, and plaintiff appeals. Motion to dismiss appeal granted in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

See, also, Alchian v. MacDonald, 40 Cal. App. 505, 181 Pac. 77.

Geo. Graham and H. F. Neal, both of Fresno, for appellant.

C. K. Bonestell and Harry Sarkisan, both of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff, hereinafter called the appellant, commenced an action against the defendant, hereinafter called the respondent, to recover a certain automobile, or its value, alleged to be $700. Judgment went in favor of the appellant in the sum of $700 and interest at 7 per cent. from the date of his demand made on the respondent for possession. Because he was not awarded damages for detention, the appellant appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure from that part of the judgment that denied him such additional damages. Thereafter the respondent appeared in this court and moved to dismiss the appeal. In support of his motion the respondent showed this court that the judgment appealed from was entered April 14, 1920; that the appellant appealed April 15, 1920; that on September 13, 1920, the appellant took out a writ of execution, and on October 1, 1920, the appellant satisfied the judgment in the trial court.

The appeal from the judgment and the motion to dismiss have both been submitted, and both are before us for our consideration.

In view of the conclusions which we have reached concerning the merits of the motion, it will not be necessary for us to determine the merits of the appeal from the judgment.

If the defendant, the losing party in the trial court, had taken the appeal, and had involuntarily paid the judgment entered against him, it is settled law that such payment would not affect his right to have the appeal heard on its merits. Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 132 Pac. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232. But a party cannot accept the benefit or advantage given him by an order and then seek to have the order or judgment reviewed. County of San Bernardino v. County of Riverside, 135 Cal. 618, 67 Pac. 1047; Estate of Shaver, 131 Cal. 219, 63 Pac. 340; Patterson v. Keeney, 165 Cal. 465, 467, 132 Pac. 1043, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 232.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

We concur: LANGDON, P. J.; NOURSE, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 2, does not perhaps clearly show certain facts which make it obvious that the decision of such court dismissing the appeal is correct.

The trial court expressly found, in disposing of the issues made by the pleadings, that—

"In the month of June, 1918, the defendant sold the same [automobile], and converted the same and the proceeds thereof to his own use," and "that the plaintiff has been damaged by the taking and detention and conversion of the said automobile as herein found in the sum of $700, the value thereof, with legal interest from June 30, 1918, and no more."

This was the disposition by the trial court of all the claims of the plaintiff with relation to value and damages, including a conclusion that there was no damage resulting from any act of the defendant that would not be recompensed by a judgment for $700, with legal interest from June 30, 1918, to the day of the judgment. Judgment was given accordingly. As was said by the District Court of Appeal, the plaintiff could not accept the award so made him by the judgment and further prosecute his appeal.

The application for hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal is denied.

All concur, except SLOANE, J., absent.

PEOPLE v. JOHNSON. (Cr. 745.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸369(8)—Acts and conduct other than charged admissible to show propensity.

In a prosecution for rape, acts and conduct other than the one charged may be shown to develop defendant's disposition as to propensity involved.

2. Rape ⟸40(3)—Testimony of birth of child to prosecutrix admissible.

In a prosecution for rape, testimony as to the birth of a child to prosecutrix one month after the act charged was competent, where it was the consistent claim of prosecutrix that she had no relations with any man other than defendant.

3. Witnesses ⟸379(2)—Testimony as to contradictory statement admissible to impeach defendant's witness.

In a prosecution for rape, where prosecutrix testified that many of the offenses were committed in defendant's room, and a witness for defendant who had roomed for some time in an adjoining room with opportunity to observe conditions testified that he had never observed prosecutrix in a compromising position, testimony as to a conversation with such witness wherein the latter had stated he observed the girl in bed with defendant, etc., was admissible for purposes of impeachment.

4. Criminal law ⟸543(2)—Showing of diligence to obtain witness sufficient to permit reading of testimony on former trial.

In a prosecution for rape, showing by the district attorney of diligence to obtain the attendance of a medical witness held sufficient to permit the district attorney to read in evidence the testimony of such physician given at a former trial.

5. Criminal law ⟸406(1), 1169(12)—Rape ⟸46, 57(1)—Whether character, conduct, and statements of defendant admissible and incriminating a jury question; admission of evidence held harmless.

In a prosecution for rape, testimony of a medical witness on former trial, read in evidence on the present trial, that when defendant had visited the physician in company with his wife and had learned of the pregnant condition of prosecutrix, he had inquired what disposition might be made of the girl and of her child, and testimony in attempted explanation that once he had left the girl at home in company with a man, made it a question for the jury to say as to whether the words or conduct of defendant as heard and observed by the physician were incriminating; if they amounted to an admission or appeared sufficient to warrant belief that defendant was trying to cover up his own crime, they were competent, while, if the jury did not so view them, the proof was harmless to defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Fred Johnson was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons and Walter Osborn, both of Bakersfield, for appellant.

J. R. Dorsey, of Bakersfield, for the People.

JAMES, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison. He has taken this appeal from the judgment entered against him. Conviction was had after several mistrials. In the presentation of this appeal we have not been aided by briefs, although counsel for the appellant did by oral argument point to several matters in support of the claim that error had been committed in the lower court by reason of which defendant had been deprived of his right to a fair trial. The record is quite voluminous. We have, however, made a very close examination of it in order to determine whether the contentions of appellant are of sufficient merit to warrant a reversal.

[1] At the time the alleged offense was committed, the date being the 27th day of March, 1919, according to the charge contained in the information, the prosecutrix was a child of the age of 15 years. She was a daughter of a sister of the wife of the defendant. She went to live in the household of the defendant about the year 1916. This household at that time consisted of the defendant and his wife, and a minor child of the two latter. The family first lived at Sawtelle. Later, in the year 1918, they resided for a time in Tulare county (that being in July of the year referred to), and subsequently took up their residence in the oil fields in Kern county. It was while they were residing in the latter county that the act complained of was alleged to have been committed. So far as the particular act referred to in the information is concerned, there was no testimony concerning the happening other than that given by the child. This girl, the prosecutrix, was shown to have given birth to a child in April, 1919, approximately one month after the commission of the unlawful act charged in the information. The prosecuting attorney, commencing at a time prior to that when the defendant and his family removed to Tulare county, offered evidence which was received by the court showing a continuous course of lascivious conduct by the defendant toward the prosecutrix, and a series of illicit acts, the number or circumstances of which it is unnecessary to detail. These various acts and conduct were established by the testimony of the prosecutrix, which was, so far as we can judge from the printed page, given unhesitatingly and with considerable exactness of detail. This testimony was offered under the familiar rule which permits other acts and conduct than the one charged to be shown in a case of this nature, in order that the disposition of a defendant as to the propensity involved may be made apparent. That such testimony is highly dangerous and damaging to a defendant's case must be conceded, for the reason that a jury, in considering the tender age of such a prosecutrix, is prone, under the influence of prejudice, to allow the aggregate proof of acts other than the one charged to overcome any uncertainty that it may feel as to the sufficiency of the proof as to the particular act referred to in the information. Hence it has often been said in the decisions that trial courts cannot be too careful in cautioning juries against unwittingly allowing their personal bias and prejudice, which is naturally aroused against a defendant in the presence of such an accusation, to cause them to deviate from their sworn duty. That testimony of the kind and character to which we have referred is competent, relevant, and material for the limited purpose adverted to, has long been established. People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 621, 76 Pac. 500; People v. Slaughter, 33 Cal. App. 365, 165 Pac. 44; People v. Elgar, 36 Cal. App. 114, 171 Pac. 697; People v. Wademan, 38 Cal. App. 116, 175 Pac. 791.

[2] So also was the testimony as to the birth of the child competent to be introduced before the jury, where it was the consistent claim of the prosecutrix that she had had no relations with any other man. Her credibility was of course a matter which the jury had the right to determine, in view of all the circumstances of the case. There was, in addition to the evidence which is particularly referred to herein, testimony of the marked familiarity in the demeanor and conduct of appellant toward the prosecutrix, which was observable in the daily life of the household. It may be remarked further that the young girl seems to have been influenced throughout the course of the whole sordid relationship by a feeling of reciprocal regard for the man. A part of the evidence was, in substance, that during the residence of defendant and his family in Kern county the wife would arise early in the morning, in order to do the cooking for the family and several boarders, and that the husband would remain in bed, that the young girl frequently slept in the same bed with the husband and wife, and that after the wife had left the room in the morning, many of the acts referred to had been committed. This evidence, as we have before stated, came from the lips of the prosecutrix. The wife of the defendant denied many of the things which the young girl had testified about, and made statements which, if true, showed a condition of affairs where it would have been impossible for the things which the young girl charged to have actually occurred. This situation again presented a question for the jury upon which its decision is final as to the facts. One person, a witness Thompson, testifying for the defendant, testified that he had roomed for some time in an adjoining room to that occupied by the defendant, his wife, and the prosecutrix, that he had opportunity to observe the conditions referred to and to hear even small noises which might have proceeded from that room, and that he had never observed the young girl in the bed occupied by Johnson and his wife. By way of impeachment, and after laying a sufficient foundation, the district attorney produced a witness who testified to a conversation had with Thompson wherein Thompson had stated that he had observed the young girl in the bed with defendant and proceeded to give some additional details in connection therewith.

[3] We think, notwithstanding the contention of appellant to the contrary, that the testimony was properly admitted as impeaching evidence. The court was careful to caution the jury as to the purpose of the impeaching testimony and as to the limited use which they might make of it in the consideration of the case. Another point urged by appellant is that the court improperly allowed the district attorney to read in evidence the testimony of a physician given at a former trial. The objection urged to this testimony is twofold: First, that it was not sufficiently shown that the physician was beyond the reach of a subpœna; and secondly, that the evidence was, in part at least, incompetent and prejudicial.

[4] We are unable to conclude that the testimony was read without a sufficient showing as to the absence of the witness. On the contrary, we think the district attorney made a very complete showing upon which to base his offer. He showed that he had issued subpœnas to practically every sheriff in the state, many of which had been returned, and that on the day or the day preceding the trial a further search had been made in the immediate locality of the county seat of Kern county, and that this search was unavailing, and that the witness was not to be found. In addition to this, there was the testimony of one of the judges who had presided in a former trial of the case, and other witnesses, that the physician had at the prior trial stated it as being his intention to leave the state of California soon for the purpose of pursuing a course of study in an Eastern college. The particular portion of the testimony to which the further objection is urged that it was incompetent was that defendant had visited the physician in company with his wife, and after he had learned of the then pregnant condition of the prosecutrix had inquired of the physician what disposition might be made of the girl and also of the child to be born; also the further statement, in attempted explanation for the condition of the girl, that at one time he had left the girl at home in company with a man who was at that time stopping there, and that the act must have occurred at that time.

[5] It was for the jury to say as to whether the words or conduct of the defendant, as heard and observed by the physician, were incriminating. If they in fact amounted to an admission, or if they appeared sufficient to warrant the belief that the defendant was endeavoring only to cover up his own crime, they were competent. If the jury did not so view them, then proof of the same was without prejudice. There was some evidence to the point, and in fact it was admitted by the prosecutrix, that upon its being learned that she was in a pregnant condition the prosecutrix at first denied that Johnson was the cause of that condition. In explanation of those assertions, however, she told the jury that Johnson had advised her to make no admissions involving him in the matter, as it would make trouble for herself and he would have to go to jail. Following the making of this admission the defense sought to show that another man working about the oil wells had paid close attention to the child and had desired to marry her. This testimony was furnished by the immediate family of the defendant. It fell short, however, of showing that illicit relations had ever occurred between the child and the "other man." It is quite apparent that all of these matters involved in this feature of the defense presented questions as to which the decision of the jury was final. To be sure, the case was one which warranted and called for the closest scrutiny on the part of the jury in determining the credibility of the witnesses and particularly that of the prosecutrix. The case in its main features is not at all unlike that considered in People v. Wademan, supra. Many of the questions herein adverted to were there presented and determined adversely to the contention of that defendant. We have considered carefully the charge as given by the court to the jury, and find that it sufficiently guarded all of the defendant's rights. All of the particular questions touching the purposes for which the special evidence was introduced in support of the main charge were carefully covered by the instructions of the court. We find no error sufficient to justify the claim of the defendant that the judgment should be reversed, and that he should have a new trial.

The judgment is affirmed.

LOBREE v. L. E. WHITE LUMBER CO. et al. (Civ. 3706.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=117—Order refusing to settle bill of exceptions not appealable.

An order denying an application for settlement of a bill of exceptions is not appealable.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=956(2)—Exceptions, bill of ⊂=43(1)—Application for relief from default in presenting bill of exceptions committed to court's discretion.

An application under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, for relief from the applicant's default in presenting its bill of exceptions for settlement is committed to the discretion of the trial court, and its order denying the application can only be set aside on a showing of a clear abuse of such discretion.

3. Exceptions, bill of ⊂=43(2)—Appellant not entitled to relief from default in presenting for settlement.

Appellant held not entitled to relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, from its default in presenting its bill of exceptions for settlement because of the sickness and absence from the office of some of its attorneys and a part of their office force, on the showing made.

4. Exceptions, bill of ⊂=43(2)—Delay in presenting not excused by reliance on void extension order.

Delay in presenting a bill of exceptions for settlement cannot be excused by counsel's reliance on a void order of the court extending the time for preparing the bill beyond the latest date to which the court had power to extend it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Phil Lobree against the L. E. White Lumber Company and another. From an order denying an application for settlement of its bill of exceptions, the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, of San Francisco (R. G. Hudson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Robert Duncan, of Ukiah, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff and against the defendants in the superior court of Mendocino county on the 28th of October, 1918, and notice thereof was served on the same day. Thereafter from time to time the defendant L. E. White Lumber Company obtained from the judge of the superior court orders extending its time to serve its bill of exceptions. These extensions ran to the 20th day of December, 1918, which was several days beyond the time which the court had jurisdiction to grant under the provisions of section 1054, Code of Civil Procedure. On the said 20th day of December counsel for the lumber company requested an additional extension, but it does not appear that the request was either granted or refused. In any event, on the following day a proposed bill was served upon counsel for plaintiff. On January 28, 1919, counsel for plaintiff served upon the defendant lumber company his objections to the proposed bill of exceptions, based upon the failure of said defendant to serve the bill within the time prescribed by law. On the 7th day of February following the proposed bill and plaintiff's objections to the settlement thereof were presented to the judge of the trial court with an application that they be settled and allowed. In support of said application counsel for said defendant offered and filed an affidavit setting forth the circumstances under which the bill was prepared. It was therein alleged that the failure to make service within the time required was due to the fact that counsel for said defendant did not receive the reporter's transcript of the testimony taken at the trial until a few days before the bill was prepared and served, and to the further fact that some of the members of the staff of said counsel located in San Francisco were absent from their offices on account of illness. A counter affidavit was filed by counsel for plaintiff, and it was thereupon stipulated and agreed in open court that all objections to the effect that no notice had been given of an application to be relieved under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, from a default for failure to serve the bill within time were waived, and that such application might be submitted to the court at said time. After argument said application was ordered submitted by the court with leave to file affidavits and authorities. On the same day an affidavit was filed on behalf of counsel for plaintiff designated a "counter affidavit on application to settle bill of exceptions," in which it was recited on information and belief that the court reporter who took the testimony of the proceedings completed the transcript early in the month of November and notified counsel for said defendant that the same would be delivered to them when paid for, also that a similar notification was given to the associate counsel of said defendant having their offices in the city of Ukiah. On February 11th a counter affidavit was filed on behalf of said defendant, wherein it was stated that "affiant makes this affidavit in answer to the counter affidavit of Robert Duncan filed in opposition to the application of defendant L. E. White Lumber Company for a settlement of its said bill of exceptions."

The matter comes to this court upon a notice of appeal which reads:

"You and each of you will please take notice that defendant L. E. White Lumber Company hereby appeals * * * from the order of the above-entitled court denying the application of this defendant L. E. White Lumber Company for settlement of its bill of exceptions on appeal from the judgment. * * *"

A bill of exceptions in support of this notice of appeal was presented, allowed, and settled and is incorporated in the transcript. From this bill it appears that some time after the 11th of February, 1919, when the last affidavit was filed on behalf of appellant, the court made and entered an order denying the application of said defendant for settlement of its bill of exceptions and denying the application of said defendant to be relieved from its default under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure. The transcript does not contain a copy of the order stated to have been made by the court as required by section 951, Code of Civil Procedure, or a copy of the motion or application for relief under section 473. The notice of appeal specifically designates the order denying application for settlement and makes no mention of the order denying application for relief from default.

[1, 2] Preliminary objection is made to a consideration of the appeal on the ground that the order refusing to settle is not an appealable order. This objection is well taken. Hudson v. Hudson, 129 Cal. 141, 61 Pac. 773; Brode v. Goslin, 158 Cal. 699, 112 Pac. 280; Murhpy v. Stelling, 138 Cal. 641, 72 Pac. 176. Appellant concedes the soundness of this objection, but argues that the notice of appeal is open to the construction that it was intended to apply to the order denying relief under section 473, citing Off v. Crump, 40 Cal. App. 173, 180 Pac. 360. However, in view of our conclusion on the merits of the appeal, it is unnecessary to determine the effect of the notice. Assuming that the appeal is properly before us, the order must be affirmed upon the well-established rule that, it being a matter committed to the discretion of the trial court, it can be set aside only upon a showing of a clear abuse of that discretion. Howell v. Pedersen, 181 Pac. 674; Smith v. Riverside, etc., Co., 19 Cal. App. 165, 167, 124 Pac. 870.

[3, 4] That the trial court did not abuse the discretion thus committed to it is apparent from the following facts disclosed by the record. The court announced its decision from the bench October 2, 1918. A written notice of decision was served October 28, 1918. The appellant was represented by the law firm of Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, at San Francisco, and by Preston & Preston, at Ukiah, the place of trial. How many attorneys and how many other attachés were connected with the San Francisco office does not appear. The record does not show the date on which a transcript was ordered, but it does show that Metson, Drew & Mackenzie were advised on November 21, 1918, that the transcript was ready. The record shows that Mr. Drew was absent on account of sickness November 21, 1918, "and did not return until some days thereafter"; that during the month of December, 1918, one-half the force at San Francisco was absent sick, but how many were sick and how many were in attendance does not appear; that a member of the firm was absent until December 23, 1918, but when he absented himself does not appear. It appears that Mr. Hudson had charge of preparing the bill and that he was present at his desk all the time. It does not appear that that half of the office force which was present could not have done the work of preparing the bill. It does not appear why the reporter's letter stating that the transcript was ready was placed on Mr. Drew's desk or that there was no one present who had the right to reply to it or why Mr. Hudson could not have done so. Every member of the firm, it can properly be argued, had an abundance of time to prepare the bill. It does not appear why the firm of Preston & Preston did not prepare the bill other than that they acted in an advisory capacity and did not prepare any of the papers in the case. Furthermore, the record plainly discloses that some one connected with appellant's case procured orders from the trial judge extending its time to prepare the bill beyond December 7th, the last extension which the judge had power to grant. Reliance of counsel upon a void order of the court cannot excuse the delay. The case is within the rule of Williamson v. Cummings, etc., Co., 95 Cal. 652, 30 Pac. 762, and similar authorities.

The order is affirmed.

CUNNINGHAM v. INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OF YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASS'NS. (Civ. 3534.)

Bailment ⊂=12—Bailee held released by receipt check from liability for loss of suit case.

Where an enlisted man in the navy checked his suit case with the army and navy branch of the Y. M. C. A., the check given him providing that the article was left with the Association at the owner's risk, subject to storage rates and rules, and might be disposed of when storage was due six months, such enlisted man released the Association from all liability for loss of his suit case not caused by negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Frank E. Cunningham against the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations, a corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

T. G. Crothers, E. L. Chloupek, and C. A. S. Frost, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hugo K. Asher, of San Francisco (Philip S. Ehrlich, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment upon a verdict against it for $500 in an action in which the plaintiff sought to recover $931, the alleged value of a suit case and contents left with the defendant in storage. The testimony showed that on or about November 15, 1918 (when it is alleged the suit case was checked with the defendant), the plaintiff was an enlisted man in the United States navy. He claims to have checked his suit case with the army and navy branch of the Y. M. C. A., at 266 Embarcadero, San Francisco, and this claim is sustained by his own testimony and by a paper check produced by him at the trial, bearing a number and, among other things, the printed words:

"The article checked on this check is left with the Association at owner's risk, subject to storage rates and rules, and may be disposed of when storage is due six months."

When plaintiff presented his check to secure the return of his suit case it could not be found, and defendant refused to compensate plaintiff for the loss thereof. The suit case, according to the testimony, was an "accordeon pleated" or extension leather suit case, containing everything owned by the plaintiff and collected by him during several years of his foreign travels with the United States navy.

Defendant answered that it was a charitable corporation existing for the purpose of establishing and assisting Young Men's Christian Associations, and to promote the spiritual, intellectual, physical, and moral well-being of young men in accordance with the aims and methods of Young Men's Christian Associations and that it was not organized and did not exist for the purpose of profit; that it maintained in San Francisco a branch Young Men's Christian Association for enlisted men of the army and navy of the United States, generally known as the "Army and Navy Young Men's Christian Association"; that it employed various clerks and employees to manage and control said branch association; that defendant used due diligence in the selection of those said clerks and employees, to see that each of them was honest and competent to perform his respective duties; denied any knowledge of plaintiff's ever having had or checked the suit case and contents with defendant as alleged, and on that ground denied that plaintiff delivered said suit case and contents to defendant or left same with defendant. Defendant also alleged that if plaintiff checked for storage, delivered to, or left with defendant the articles mentioned, same were so left with defendant at the risk of plaintiff; also, that if deposited, as alleged by plaintiff, said chattels had been lost, destroyed, or stolen before demand, and without carelessness, negligence, or fault of defendant; also, that in the event said goods were checked with defendant, defendant used due care and diligence for the preservation thereof, and employed proper agents and employees to care for and preserve the same. Defendant also answered that, if it received said goods or chattels for storage, they were so received for the accommodation of plaintiff, not for hire or reward or profit to defendant, but as a part of defendant's charitable work.

At the close of the testimony, counsel requested the court to direct a verdict for the defendant upon the ground that the facts bring the case within the operation of the rule laid down in the case of Thomas v. German General Benevolent Society, 168 Cal. 188, 141 Pac. 1186, which is stated to be: Where one accepts the benefit of a public or a private charity, he exempts by implied contract the benefactor from liability for the negligence of its servants in administering the charity, if the benefactor has used due care in the selection of its servants. The motion was made upon the further ground that it appears without conflict that plaintiff received from the defendant, at the time of the alleged deposit of said suit case and contents, a tag bearing in plain writing the statement, "The article checked on this check is left with the Association at owner's risk * * *;" that he had plenty opportunity t:

take note of such statement, and it was his duty to do so, and he is presumed to have done so, no evidence to the contrary being offered or admissible; and that plaintiff is held, therefore, to have assented and agreed to the terms and conditions of said printed statement.

With reference to the first ground of this motion, appellant contends that the facts proven establish, as a matter of law, the claim that the defendant was a "charitable corporation," within the language of the decisions defining such corporations. In this we are inclined to agree with the appellant. Furthermore, plaintiff, in availing himself of the checking facilities of the defendant, placed himself in the status of "one who accepts the benefit of a charity," under the ruling in Burdell v. St. Luke's Hospital, 37 Cal. App. 312, 173 Pac. 1008. The only other question in connection with the rule of law relied upon in this ground of defendant's motion was whether or not the defendant had used due care in the selection of its servants employed in administering its charity. Defendant offered considerable evidence as to its method of checking suit cases and other articles, and of the precautions taken by it to avoid error. No evidence, however, was offered by either party upon the question of whether or not defendant had used due care or diligence in the selection of its servants, but the defendant relied upon the presumption of the Code of Civil Procedure that it is presumed to have taken ordinary care of its own concerns, and asked the court to give an instruction applying this presumption to the selection of defendant's servants. The instruction was refused. Defendant contends that, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, this presumption was sufficient to decide the question in favor of defendants. We need not decide this matter here. It becomes immaterial to a determination of this appeal, because, regardless of whether or not the defendant was exempted from liability by implied contract with the plaintiff, we think it was exempted from such liability by the express terms of the contract introduced in evidence by the plaintiff in support of his case, and to which he is presumed to have assented. This is the point raised in the trial court by defendant's second ground of his motion for a directed verdict.

A great number of contracts are made by the delivery by one of the contracting parties to the other of a document in a common form, stating the terms by which the person delivering it will enter into the proposed contract. If the form is accepted without objection by the person to whom it is tendered, this person is, as a general rule, bound by its contents, and his act amounts to an acceptance of the offer made to him, regardless of whether he reads the document, or otherwise informs himself of its contents. There is no testimony that plaintiff did not read this receipt and have actual knowledge of its contents. He testified that he "accepted the check and then went out of the building." If he did not read it, he was under the necessity of satisfactorily explaining his failure to do what the law required him to do. In order to avoid the effect of this express contract, it would be necessary for him to bring himself within one of the recognized exceptions to the well-established rule holding him bound by its terms. It was said in the case of Taussig v. Bode & Haslett, 134 Cal. 265, 266, 66 Pac. 259, 260 (54 L. R. A. 774, 86 Am. St. Rep. 250):

"We think it clear that the notice is a part of the contract. It was printed plainly on the face of the receipt. The whole paper is extremely brief. It was the duty of respondents to take note of its contents, if they had the opportunity, and their opportunity was ample. The presumption, therefore, is that they did read it. Against this presumption there is no evidence, and none, we think, would have been admissible, to show that the respondents had failed to do what their duty required them to do. Assuming, then, that they read the receipt, and, whether they did or not, that they are chargeable with knowledge of its contents, they had fair warning that any loss by leakage was at their risk, or in other words, that the appellant declined all responsibility for loss by leakage. Their acceptance of the receipt and storage of the goods with knowledge of this condition made it binding upon them as one of the terms of the contract. The cases cited by counsel in which it has been held that notices printed or stamped on bills of lading, but not signed by the consignors, do not exempt common carriers from their common-law liability are not in point. They rest upon the peculiar nature of the public duties of common carriers, and the public policy of preventing them from limiting their liability by mere notices not expressly assented to by the shippers. * * * The case of warehousemen is entirely different. * * * They are not bound to receive articles offered for storage, and may make such terms as they choose to impose as conditions of their contract."

Defendant's motion should have been granted, then, upon the ground that the plaintiff had, by express contract, released the defendant from all liability for the loss of his suit case. Whether as a matter of public policy the defendant would be permitted to expressly contract to be released from the consequences of its own negligence is not involved in the present case, because there is no evidence in the record of any negligence on the part of the defendant.

In view of the conclusion we have reached, it also becomes unnecessary for us to discuss appellant's contention that the judgment is excessive, for the reason that much of the contents of the suit case was such that a bailee could not be made responsible therefor without notice of the nature of the same.

The judgment is reversed.

L. W. BLINN LUMBER CO. v. AMERICAN CEMENT PRODUCTS CO. et al.

UNION HARDWARE & METAL CO. v. SAME.

(Civ. 3218.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 19, 1921.)

1. Mechanics' liens ⟹83—Sellers to materialmen not entitled to liens.

Persons who occupy the position of vendors of materials to a materialman, and who are only such vendors, are not entitled to liens for the materials sold and delivered.

2. Mechanics' liens ⟹132(1) — Materialman required to file claims within time prescribed.

In order for materialmen to enforce their rights of lien, it was necessary for them to file their claims within the time prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1187, as amended in 1911.

3. Mechanics' liens ⟹132(13) — Materialman who furnished materials to owner must file lien within 30 days.

Where the buildings for which plaintiff furnished materials were not constructed by or under any contract between the owner and a contractor, but constructively by the owner himself, regardless of the fact the owner did not file any notice of completion of the building, plaintiff materialman comes within the class of lien creditors who have available to them under the statute but a single course to pursue to preserve their remedy by lien, that is, to file their liens within 30 days after they have ceased to labor upon or furnished material for the work to be done.

4. Appeal and error ⟹173(16)—Incurable defects, as late filing of mechanics' lien claims, will be recognized on appeal, though objection not made below.

Where material and incurable defects exist in the cause of action, as that plaintiffs' lien claims were filed too late, and appear on the face of the record, courts of appeal will not generally refuse to recognize such ground of appeal, even if the objection was not made in the court below.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Actions by the L. W. Blinn Lumber Company, a corporation, against the American Cement Products Company, a corporation, and another, and by the Union Hardware & Metal Company, a corporation, against the American Cement Products Company, a corporation, and another. From judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

S. F. Macfarlane, Heney & Carr, and W. W. Butler, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. S. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. [1] This is an appeal by the defendants American Cement Products Company and Henry Braun from an adverse judgment in consolidated lien suits for materials furnished and used in the construction of certain additions to a building. Braun is the owner of the land upon which the building was placed. The American Cement Products Company, as lessee of the land, caused the work to be done. In the complaints, which are identical in form, it was alleged that the American Cement Products Company entered into a contract with the California-Arizona Construction Company, whereby the latter company was to "perform certain improvement work in the way of an addition to the frame and corrugated iron building located upon said property." But it was further alleged that no contract or bond relative to said work was ever filed or recorded. The court found that these allegations were true. It further appeared, and was so found by the court, that the only construction work agreed to be done, or which was done, by the construction company consisted in the laying of cement floors; that all of the construction work other than said floors was done by and under the direct supervision of the products company; that by reason of a course of commercial transactions, both present and prospective, between the products company and the construction company, both companies were interested in having said building additions made in order the better to develop these business enterprises; that under and by reason of these circumstances an agreement was made that the materials entering into the construction of these building additions would be furnished to the products company by the construction company and paid for in merchandise sold by the products company to the construction company; that pursuant to these arrangements the materials were ordered from the plaintiffs by the construction company and were by the plaintiffs delivered on the leased premises, where they were used in the construction of said building additions. The materials furnished by the plaintiffs consisted of lumber from the lumber company and iron and steel materials from the hardware and metal company. We need not detail more fully the facts proved by the evidence and found by the court. The defendants contended that upon the facts proved it was established that the construction company was the materialman who furnished to the owner the materials used in the building; that the plaintiffs were merchants who sold these materials to the materialman (the construction company); and that therefore the plaintiffs acquired no right of lien against the improved property on account of materials furnished by them. The plaintiffs, on the other hand, claimed that the circumstances, as shown by the evidence and stated in the findings, were such that it should be held that these materials were in reality furnished directly to the owner; that it was a part of the plan and intention of the agreement made between the products company and the construction company for the furnishing of said materials that the construction company should order the materials from the plaintiffs for delivery to the products company; that therefore, at least for the purpose of determining the right of lien of the plaintiffs as materialmen, the construction company should be regarded merely as an agent who, by authority of the products company, procured the materials to be furnished. Thus it is seen that the defendants relied upon the rule, which seems to be well established in this state, that persons who occupy the position of vendors of materials to a materialman, and who are only such vendors, are not entitled to liens for the materials sold and delivered. Roebling's Sons Co. v. Humboldt, etc., Co., 112 Cal. 288, 44 Pac. 568. Since the judgment must be reversed for another reason hereinafter stated, it becomes unnecessary to undertake a more complete study and analysis of the facts and the law which would be essential to a determination of the question whether or not the respondents occupy the actual position of materialmen toward appellants herein.

[2, 3] For the purpose of considering the next proposition, let it be assumed that respondents were materialmen within the meaning of the law governing liens of mechanics and materialmen. In order to enforce such right of lien, it was necessary to file their claims of lien within the time prescribed by section 1187, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1911. In each of the instances of lien claims shown by the record in this action, the claim of lien was filed in the recorder's office more than 30 days after the last date of delivery by the claimant of the materials covered by the claim. In Irwin v. Silva, 40 Cal. App. 135, 145, 180 Pac. 361, it was held by the Third District Court of Appeal that where the buildings for which the plaintiff furnished materials were not constructed by or under any contract between the owner and a contractor, but constructively by the owner himself (and regardless of the fact that the owner did not file any notice of completion of the building), the materialman "comes within that class of lien claimants who have available to them under the statute but a single course to pursue to preserve their remedy by lien, viz., to file their liens within 30 days after they have ceased to labor upon or furnish material for the work to be done." The reasons for this conclusion are very fully set forth in the cited case. In Ferger v. Gearhart, 186 Pac. 376, the First District Court of Appeal announced the same rule on the authority of Irwin v. Silva. In each of these cases applications for rehearing were made to the Supreme Court and were denied. We therefore consider this question settled, notwithstanding the earnest argument presented here, in which it is urged that those cases were erroneously decided.

[4] Counsel for respondent urges that appellants should not, on this appeal, be permitted to make the defense that the lien claims were filed too late, when the record shows that this defense was not made in the trial court. There are numerous cases in which it has been held that points not made in the trial of actions will not be reviewed on appeal. Far the greater number of these instances related to errors which might have been corrected at the time if they had been suggested before the trial court. Some cases go further and apply the rule to matters of objection, which, if made at the proper time, apparently would have been decisive of the controversy. It is in the interest of justice that numerous questions incidental to litigation should be definitely and finally decided as rapidly as possible during the progress of the action. There are many questions, such as those relating to procedure and the admission of evidence, which, when once passed without objection, should not be further reviewed. But where material and incurable defects exist in a cause of action, and appear on the face of the record, courts of appeal will not generally refuse to recognize such ground of appeal, even if the objection was not made in the court below. Thus, "it cannot be said that the right to complain of an error appearing on the record is lost by a failure to call specific attention to it in presenting a motion for a new trial." Mass. Bonding & Ins. Co. v. Los Angeles R. Corp. (Sup.) 190 Pac. 161. In the case at bar the dates when the last materials were furnished by the claimants, and the dates when the claims of lien were filed for record as well as the circumstance that the work was not being done by a contractor, all appear in the judgment roll. Under the decisions to which we have referred, it results that the findings do not sustain the judgment.

It is ordered that the judgment be, and the same is hereby, reversed.

PEOPLE v. LOPEZ. (Cr. 753.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 21, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸1153(2)—Competency of child as witness is within discretion of trial court reviewable only for abuse.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 2, making children under 10 years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions or of relating them truly incompetent as witnesses, the disability of a child 6 years old to testify is a question addressed to the discretion of the trial court, whose determination will be reviewed only for abuse of discretion, taking into consideration the fact that the court which had the witness before it can form a better idea of her competency than the appellate court can form from the record.

2. Criminal law ⟸1159(2) — Testimony of child given same weight on appeal as that of adult.

On appeal from a conviction of a crime, where the trial court in a proper exercise of its discretion permitted a 6 year old child to testify for the prosecution, the testimony of such child is to be considered like the testimony of an adult in determining whether the evidence was sufficient to justify the verdict.

3. Criminal law ⟸885—Recommendation to mercy shows jury was not actuated by passion or prejudice.

The fact that the jury recommended defendant to the mercy of the court shows that it was not, in rendering its verdict, actuated by passion or prejudice against defendant.

4. Criminal law ⟸942(1)—New evidence of offer of money to child witness held not to require new trial.

Newly discovered evidence that an uncle of the child who was the prosecuting witness against defendant had offered to give the child money if she spoke well does not show an attempt to corrupt the witness and does not establish abuse of the trial court's discretion in overruling the motion for new trial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Marin Lopez was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct with a child, and he appeals from the judgment and from the order denying his motion for new trial. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson, of San Diego, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was charged with committing the offense designated in section 288 of the Penal Code, and upon conviction thereof appealed from the judgment of imprisonment which followed.

The prosecuting witness was a female child six years of age and the stepdaughter of defendant, with whom and her mother she was accustomed to occupy the same bed. The act with which defendant is charged is alleged to have occurred about a month prior to the filing of the information. The verdict is based largely upon the child's testimony, given through an interpreter, to the reception of which evidence, on account of her tender years and lack of intelligence, counsel for defendant unsuccessfully urged objections.

[1] Subdivision 2 of section 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that "children under 10 years of age, who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly," cannot be witnesses. It thus appears that the disability is applicable alone to such children as appear incapable of receiving just impressions of facts, and, when objection is made to the competency of a child under 10 years of age to testify, it becomes a question addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and an appellate court will not interfere with its ruling unless there be a clear abuse of discretion apparent from the record. People v. Harden, 24 Cal. App. 523, 141 Pac. 1075, and cases therein cited. In People v. Craig, 111 Cal. 469, 44 Pac. 188, it is said:

> "The burden is upon the person who objects to the child being a witness to show that he is incapable, and the determination of the judge upon such objection, and an examination of the child, is not a matter of review, any more than is his ruling upon the capacity of an adult who may be offered as a witness."

The trial judge, having the witness before him, is better able to determine his capability or incapability than an appellate court, whose judgment must be based wholly upon the record, from an examination of which in the instant case we cannot say there was an abuse of discretion in permitting the child to appear as a witness against the defendant.

[2] It is next urged that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict. No purpose could be served by a detailed statement of the testimony relating to the commission of the acts with which defendant is charged. Suffice it to say that, if the jury, whose province it was to determine the weight of the child's testimony, believed her statements to be true, they could not have rendered a verdict other than that of guilty. Conceding that her testimony was subject to the criticism that discrepancies existed therein, and that it did not in every detail correspond with her statements made at the preliminary hearing of defendant, nevertheless, since the court instructed the jury that owing to the nature of the case they should examine it with caution, we cannot on review, by reason of her immature age, consider it otherwise than like testimony given by an adult; and therefore, as said in People v. Horn, 25 Cal. App. 587, 144 Pac. 643, "it was peculiarly a function of the jury to decide the question whether the inconsistencies developed in her testimony were sufficient to impeach the integrity of her declaration" that defendant committed the act of which he was accused. Moreover, some corroboration of her testimony may be attributed to the fact that some two weeks after the act complained of an examination of the child disclosed a condition indicating that she had been subjected to abuse.

[3] While the evidence is meager, it is nevertheless positive and direct as to the commission of the acts charged against defendant, and it is apparent from the fact that the jury recommended defendant to the mercy of the court that it was not, in rendering its verdict, actuated by passion or prejudice against defendant.

[4] Defendant also appeals from an order of court denying his motion for a new trial based upon the ground of newly discovered evidence, in support of which defendant presented an affidavit to the effect that prior to the trial the prosecuting witness stated to another child:

"Monday we are going to court, and Camacho is going to give me a dollar for me to speak well; he gave me already two bits."

Another affidavit consisted of purely hearsay matter which in no event would be admissible as evidence. Conceding that the uncle did state to the child that he would give her a dollar if she talked well, it cannot be said that it was intended or that she understood it to be with the view of influencing her testimony; indeed, the natural inference would be that it was intended to encourage her to talk intelligently and truthfully. There was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court in denying the motion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PHILLIPS et al. v. MORTENSEN et al.

(Civ. 3245.)

1. Boundaries ⊜37(5)—Evidence held to warrant conclusion that acts and omissions precluded plaintiffs from claiming line marked by fence and ditch was not true boundary.

In an action to quiet title to a strip of land 30 feet in width, having for its real object the determination of the boundary line between plaintiffs and defendants, evidence held to warrant the conclusion of the trial court that the acts and omissions of the parties and their predecessor had been such as to preclude plaintiffs from saying that the line marked by a fence and ditch was not the true boundary line.

2. Boundaries ⊜43—Judgment subject to vacation for uncertainty.

In an action to quiet title to a strip of land 30 feet in width, having for its real object determination of boundary line, judgment as entered held subject to vacation on account of uncertainty, being so vague in its definition of the line that it could serve no purpose except to lead to confusion and controversy.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by F. M. Phillips and another against Morten Mortensen and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, and cause remanded, with directions.

Julius Hansen, of Fresno, for appellants.
W. D. Crichton, of Fresno, for respondents.

BARDIN, Justice pro tem. This action, brought to quiet title to a strip of land 30 feet in width, has for its real object the determination of the boundary line between certain lands severally owned by the plaintiffs and an adjacent tract owned by the defendants. The lands referred to are all in the same quarter section in Fresno county. The appeal is from the judgment entered in favor of the defendants.

It is admitted that plaintiff Stratton owns the north half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter of the section, that Phillips owns the south half of the northeast quarter of the northwest quarter thereof, and that the defendants own the east half of the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter. The boundary line in controversy marks the east boundary of the Mortensen property and the west boundary of the lands of Stratton and Phillips, respectively. It is alleged in plaintiffs' complaint that a line precisely described therein by courses and distances is the true location of the disputed line, which line had been surveyed and marked on the ground by monuments about one year before the present action was begun. The defendants, on the other hand, claim that the true boundary line between the lands referred to is a line located 30 feet east of the one claimed as correct by the plaintiffs. Defendants' claim as to the true location of said boundary line is apparently founded upon two theories, namely: (1) That the boundary line claimed as the true one by defendants had been determined and located by an express agreement of coterminous owners, and (2) that the plaintiffs, by reason of having acquiesced through a long period of time in the acts of the defendants and their predecessors, were each estopped from denying that the east boundary of the defendants' land extended to the line claimed as the correct one by the defendants.

It is true that these claims of the defendants were not set out with commendable clearness or precision in their answer, but a fair interpretation thereof leads us to the conclusion that these were the grounds upon which the defendants rested their case.

The trial court found, in effect, that the true boundary line was the line claimed as such by the defendants, and that it had been located and marked upon the ground by agreement of former grantors and predecessors in title of the respective parties to the action more than 25 years before the filing of the complaint.

It is unnecessary to discuss whether the essentials required to fix and determine the boundary line, which it is claimed has been established by direct agreement, ever existed, for the reason that the record is barren of any evidence, direct or indirect, showing that such an agreement had ever been actually entered into. In fact when, or in what manner, the purported boundary line claimed as correct by the defendants came into existence does not appear from the record.

But the court found to the effect (and there was ample testimony adduced to sustain the finding) that for more than 25 years before the action was brought the defendants and their predecessors in title, under the belief that it was their property, had occupied, farmed, and planted and maintained vineyards upon the disputed strip of land, up to the line claimed as correct by the defendants and marked during said period by an irrigating ditch and fence, and with the acquiescence of the plaintiffs and their predecessors in interest.

The defendants acquired title to their lands by gift deed from their father about two years before the filing of the complaint. The elder Mortensen purchased the property in 1902. Relying upon the purported east boundary as marked by a ditch and fence as correct, and without any objection or hindrance, and at a considerable expense, he made excavations upon and leveled the strip of land in controversy, cultivated it continuously after acquiring title, and planted it to a vineyard now about ten years old. The predecessor in title of the older Mortensen had cultivated, or caused to be cultivated, the strip of land in controversy, under the supposition that it was a portion of the tract referred to as the Mortensen property, for several years before Mortensen acquired title. As early as 1887 a predecessor in title of the plaintiffs had considered the ditch and fence referred to as marking the west boundary of the plaintiff's lands. Succeeding grantees, other than the plaintiffs, likewise continuously acquiesced in the purported boundary line and in the adverse acts of the occupants of the Mortensen property, and when the plaintiffs both acquired title to their respective holdings in 1908 they, too, ostensibly accepted the disputed line as correct and continued to treat it as such for several years, acquiescing meanwhile, as their predecessors had done, in the hostile acts of the defendants and their predecessors, and permitting them, without objection, to continue the intensive development and improvement of the disputed strip of land.

About two years before the complaint in this action was filed the plaintiffs caused their land to be surveyed, with the result that since that time plaintiffs have claimed the boundary line to be as described in their complaint. Some indefinite and vague question, however, had arisen between Mortensen, Sr., and Phillips, two or three years—possibly more—before the survey was made, as to the correctness of the purported boundary line, but it was not until the survey was made that the present claims of the plaintiffs became tangible and certain. The uncertainty as to the boundary line in dispute seems to have arisen because of some irregularity or shortage in the original government survey of the section.

[1] We believe the facts to be such as to warrant and sustain the conclusion of the trial court that the acts and the omissions of the parties and their respective predecessors have been such as to preclude the plaintiffs from now saying that the line marked by the fence and ditch referred to was not the true boundary line. Columbet v. Pacheco, 48 Cal. 395; Burris v. Fitch, 76 Cal. 395, 18 Pac. 864; Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 619; 9 C. J. 238.

The court found that the true boundary line between the coterminus owners referred to was the line claimed as correct by the defendants in their answer, which line was marked by a fence and ditch 30 feet east of the line claimed by the plaintiffs. We are foreclosed from a discussion of the facts disclosed by the evidence touching this subject of the case by reason of the unintelligible conditions of the record. A blackboard diagram was used for illustrative purposes at the trial, which was repeatedly referred to by all the witnesses, but no copy of such diagram came up with the record. Counsel for both parties showed a singular lack of concern for the state of the record, and continually propounded questions and accepted answers without objection or protest that, with reference to the boundary line in dispute, had to do with "here," "there," "down this way," "over yonder," and other like indefinite words and phrases, which, while meaningless to us, were, nevertheless, probably clear to the trial court. The trial judge, with the diagram before him, was in a position to give the testimony of the witnesses a correct interpretation, and we must conclude that he did so, and that the evidence relative to the location of the ditch and fence was such as to properly support the finding of the court thereon. The duty of presenting an accurate and intelligent record on appeal of the evidence adduced at the trial, covering the points wherein it is claimed the findings are not sustained by the evidence, devolved upon the appellants. And since they have not presented such a record for our review, they must suffer any disadvantage now arising because of such failure.

Since it is nowhere claimed by the defendants that they have acquired title to the disputed strip of land by adverse possession, it is unnecessary to discuss that subject.

[2] The judgment as entered should, however, be vacated on account of uncertainty. It is so vague in its definition of the boundary line in controversy that it could serve no purpose so well as to lead to further dispute and controversy. For some reason, unknown to us, the precise description of the boundary line established by the findings was ignored in the judgment, and a line therein described which lacks the definiteness and certainty required of such a judgment. 9 C. J. 293. No land title man, or any one else, accustomed to consider matters of title, could properly accept the definition of the controverted line as sufficiently precise or certain, nor could a land surveyor, or an executive officer of the court charged with the duty of serving a writ of possession, locate the boundary line from or with the aid of anything contained in the judgment. The judgment as entered leaves the parties for all practical purposes, where they started from at the inception of the controversy. It recites, in effect, that the true dividing line between the lands of the coterminus owners is that located by the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs and defendants over 25 years before the filing of the complaint, and marked and located upon the ground by building a ditch and a fence thereon. But where the ditch or fence are now, or were, located, does not accurately appear from the judgment, nor can it be ascertained therefrom.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to frame and enter a new judgment, precisely describing by courses and distances the common boundary line between the lands of the parties to the action and as set out in the findings of the court.

LAMB v. OTTO. (Civ. 3592.)

1. Evidence ⊂⊃441(9) — In action for breach of warranty, parol testimony held inadmissible to vary written contract.

In an action for breach of warranty on sale of a secondhand automobile, where it was not claimed that the contract contained a latent ambiguity, it was error to resort to parol testimony to show accessories sold with the car, or to show express warranties of quality or character other than stated in the written contract.

2. Sales ⊂⊃266 — No implied warranty upon sale of secondhand automobile.

Under Civ. Code, § 1767, relating to implied warranties, there is no implied warranty upon the sale of a secondhand automobile.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Nora E. Lamb against F. W. Otto. Judgment of nonsuit, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George G. Graham, of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts & Ewing, J. R. Fitch, Ernest Walling, and Louis C. Levy, all of Fresno, for respondent.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendant to recover damages for an alleged breach of warranty. A trial was had in the lower court, and at the end of the plaintiff's case the defendant moved for a nonsuit. The motion was granted, judgment was entered for the defendant, and the plaintiff appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. At the time the motion was granted the trial court had received considerable parol evidence on the issue as to what warranties, if any, were made. Such evidence was introduced over the objection and exception of the respondent. If the oral evidence was admissible, the lower court erred in granting the nonsuit. If the evidence was inadmissible, the lower court erred in receiving the evidence, but cured the error by granting the nonsuit.

[1] In the first place, we will therefore examine into the question as to the admissibility of the evidence which was tendered and received. The appellant had bought a secondhand automobile from the respondent. The purchase was evidenced by a formal written transfer, which was signed by the buyer and by the seller. The subject of the sale is described as: "One Reo Automobile Motor No. ———. Touring body ——— with complete equipment. Serial No. 9935." The writing contains nothing as to condition. On the trial the appellant introduced oral testimony that the respondent had, just prior to the sale, represented that the sale was to include "one Reo automobile with complete equipment," and also two used casings for extras and three or four used tubes all in first-class A-1 condition. The respondent also introduced oral testimony that the property as delivered was not in first-class A-1 condition and that the extra tubes and casings were not delivered at all. At all times the respondent objected that the oral representations, as to the articles covered by the sale and as to the condition of the same, were incompetent, and that the whole subject was covered by the written contract.

The appellant contends that the evidence was properly received, and in support of her contention she cites Maxson v. Llewelyn, 122 Cal. 195, 54 Pac. 732, Muller v. Palmer, 144 Cal. 305, 77 Pac. 954, Hodgkins v. Dunham, 10 Cal. App. 690, 103 Pac. 351, Troy Laundry Machinery Co. v. Drivers' Independent Laundry Co., 14 Cal. App. 152, 111 Pac. 121, Jones v. Grieve, 15 Cal. App. 561, 115 Pac. 333, and Luitweiler Pumping Engine Co. v. Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 198, 116 Pac. 707, 712. All of those cases involved unilateral contracts such as a deed, a bill of sale, a guaranty, an order for merchandise, etc., or contracts resting in parol. She could have cited some cases of the same general nature, and which are still later. Myers v. Lowery, 189 Pac. 793, and Crouch v. Wilson (Sup.) 191 Pac. 916. The respondent contends that the evidence was improperly received, and the trial court did not err by ignoring the evidence and treating it as though it were not before the court. In this behalf the respondent cites cases which involved bilateral formal written contracts. Peterson v. Chaix, 5 Cal. App. 525, 90 Pac. 948; Tockstein v. Pac. Kissel Kar Branch, 33 Cal. App. 262, 164 Pac. 906; Munn v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., 36 Cal. App. 312, 171 Pac. 1082; Yuba Mfg. Co. v. Stone, 179 Pac. 418, and Case Threshing Mach. Co. v. Copren Bros., 187 Pac. 772. As it was not claimed that the written contract contained a latent ambiguity, it was error to resort to parol testimony for the purpose of showing that respondent sold appellant "2 casings and 3 or 4 tubes," although the same were not mentioned in the contract. Peterson v. Chaix, supra. For the same reason it was not competent to show, under the facts of this case, any express warranties as to the quality or character of the automobile other than as stated in the written contract. Munn v. Earle C. Anthony, Inc., supra. If it be said that the formal contract between the parties was silent as to quality, and therefore the evidence was admissible, the answer is that the same rule applies. Germain Co. v. Armsby Co., 153 Cal. 585, 96 Pac. 319; United Iron Works v. Outer Harbor Co., 168 Cal. 81, 85, 141 Pac. 917; Electric Storage Battery Co. v. W. C. F. & N. Ry. Co., 138 Iowa, 369, 116 N. W. 144, 19 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1183.

[2] The appellant cites section 1767 of the Civil Code, and contends that an implied warranty exists under the facts of this case. The undisputed facts show, among other things, that the seller was not the manufacturer of the machine in question; that he had for some time been using it; that it was a secondhand car; that it was present during nearly all of the negotiations; and that the seller stated to the buyer that she could have it examined by any mechanic, but that she did not do so. The record does not show that it was at any time claimed, or that it is now claimed, that the seller occupied any position of trust or confidence toward the buyer. In Kellogg Bridge Co. v. Hamilton, 110 U. S. 108, 116, 3 Sup. Ct. 537, 542 (28 L. Ed. 86), the court says:

"According to the principles of decided cases, and upon clear grounds of justice, the fundamental inquiry must always be whether, under the circumstances of the particular case, the buyer had the right to rely, and necessarily relied, on the judgment of the seller, and not upon his own. In ordinary sales the buyer has an opportunity of inspecting the article sold; and the seller not being the maker, and therefore having no special or technical knowledge of the mode in which it was made, the parties stand upon grounds of substantial equality. If there be, in fact, in the particular case, any inequality, it is such that the law cannot or ought not to attempt to provide against; consequently, the buyer in such cases—the seller giving no express warranty and making no representations tending to mislead—is holden to have purchased entirely on his own judgment."

To the same effect are Barnard v. Kellogg, 10 Wall. (77 U. S.) 383, 19 L. Ed. 987; Hurley-Mason Co. v. Stebbins, Walker & Spinning, 79 Wash. 366, 140 Pac. 381, L. R. A. 1915B, 1131, and notes, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 948; Byrne v. Jansen, 50 Cal. 624, 627; Moore v. McKinlay, 5 Cal. 471; Kenney v. Grogan, 17 Cal. App. 527, 532, 120 Pac. 433; Colchord Machinery Co. v. Loy-Wilson Foundry Co., 131 Mo. App. 540, 547, 110 S. W. 630. In the text, 35 Cyc. 408, it is stated:

"On a sale of machinery there is in general an implied warranty that the machine is reasonably adapted to the purpose for which it is purchased. No such warranty is implied, however, on the sale of a secondhand machine."

The same rule is stated and followed in Ramming v. Caldwell, 43 Ill. App. 175, 179; Perine Co. v. Buck, 90 Wash. 344, 156 Pac. 20, 22, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 341; Bayer v. Winton Motor Car Co., 194 Mich. 222, 160 N. W. 642, 644; Johnson v. Carden, 187 Ala. 142, 65 South. 813.

Excluding from our consideration the oral testimony that was introduced over the objection and exception of the respondent, there was no evidence of a breach of any express warranty, nor of the breach of any implied warranty. The trial court did not err, therefore, in granting the motion.

The judgment is affirmed.

WRIGHT v. ROBINSON et al. (Civ. 3754.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 19, 1921.)

1. Partnership ⊂⊃83—Firm member not entitled to compensation for services.

As a general rule one partner is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered by him to the partnership, in absence of an agreement to that effect (Civ. Code, § 2413).

2. Partnership ⊂⊃83—Evidence insufficient to show partner entitled to salary.

In a suit for an accounting between partners in a saloon, evidence held insufficient to show that a partner was entitled to an allowance by way of salary for services in the management and conduct of the business.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; J. W. Mahon, Judge.

Action by Mabel Wright, also known as Mrs. E. H. Wright, against Seymour H. Robinson and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John D. Willard, of San Francisco, for appellant.

William B. Beaizley, of Bakersfield, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment rendered on a partnership accounting.

The main question presented for consideration is the right of one partner to a salary for the management and conduct of the business. By its judgment the trial court awarded defendant Hulihan an allowance for such services, and it is the claim of the appellant that the evidence does not support the findings and judgment in this particular.

[1, 2] As a general rule one partner is not entitled to any compensation for services rendered by him to the partnership, in the absence of an agreement to that effect. Civ. Code, § 2413; Nevills v. Moore Mining Co., 135 Cal. 561, 67 Pac. 1054. Respondent concedes this to be the rule, but claims that there was an implied agreement that the salary here claimed and allowed should be paid. The evidence does not support this contention. It appears therefrom that the plaintiff and defendant Robinson were owners and partners in a certain saloon situated in this state at Taft, Kern county, and that they conducted the same as such partners from about April, 1911, to February 16, 1916, and during such time were equal owners and equally entitled to the profits thereof. Plaintiff, Wright, who resided in San Francisco, had contributed the entire capital, and Robinson managed the business. On the date last mentioned Robinson, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff, made an agreement in writing with defendant Sill by the terms of which he agreed to convey and deliver to the latter a one-half interest in the business and property. At this time the business was indebted in the sum of about $12,000, and Robinson claimed to be the sole owner thereof. Under the terms of the agreement Sill was to pay off the indebtedness. Sill had acquired this interest for defendant Hulihan, whom he forthwith put in possession under his agreement with Robinson. Hulihan was to have complete management and control of the business, and was to receive the interest acquired by Sill from Robinson when all money advanced and procured by Sill in liquidation of the debts of the business were repaid to him. By express agreement both Robinson and Hulihan were to receive salaries for their labor and services until such debts were paid, when the salaries were to cease, and thereafter the partners were to divide the profits between themselves share and share alike. The debts were paid, and Hulihan acquired the interest agreed upon. Mrs. Wright, who knew nothing of this transaction, went to Taft some time thereafter for the purpose of investigating her business, as she had not received any profits therefrom or heard from Robinson, her partner, for several months. She then learned for the first time of the actions of Robinson from Hulihan. After negotiations between the parties Mrs. Wright agreed that Hulihan should retain his one-half interest, and she further agreed with Robinson that they would own the remaining one-half in the business between them. The evidence discloses the fact that defendants Hulihan and Sill acted in entire good faith in the transaction and knew nothing about Mrs. Wright's interest in the business and property, as the same stood of record in Robinson's name alone. After the agreement between the parties to become partners, as above indicated, Hulihan continued to manage the business until July 1, 1918, when by operation of law it ceased to exist. At the time of the new arrangement and when plaintiff was recognized as a partner by Hulihan nothing was said between the parties as to the payment of a salary to any one, and there is no evidence from which the existence of any such agreement can be inferred; the agreement simply being that Mrs. Wright thereafter was to receive one-quarter of the profits of the business. This being so, the case falls within the rule that in the absence of an agreement a partner is not entitled to compensation for services rendered to the partnership. Defendant Hulihan, having custody of the partnership assets, is accountable to plaintiff for her full share in the same, freed from any deductions on account of his claims for services.

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

51 Cal. App. 600

ROOT v. KUHN. (Civ. 3498.)

1. Trusts ⟸86 — Presumption of resulting trust arose where plaintiff paid for lots and caused title to be conveyed to defendant.

Where plaintiff, out of her own funds, paid the entire purchase price of lots, and caused title to be conveyed to defendant, under Civ. Code, § 853, the property, at the instant the title passed, is presumed to have been impressed with a trust in favor of plaintiff, who, in the absence of other showing, would be entitled to a conveyance thereof in accordance with the prayer of her complaint; the presumption as to title being, however, disputable.

2. Trusts ⟸88—Parol evidence of verbal understanding inadmissible in suit to establish resulting trust.

In suit to establish a resulting trust in favor of plaintiff as to lots for which she paid, but caused to be conveyed to defendant, under Civ. Code, § 852, the court erred in permitting defendant, under her answer, to give oral testimony of a verbal understanding between the parties that the lots would be held by defendant for the use and benefit of both parties during their joint lives.

3. Trusts ⟸89(4)—Evidence insufficient to establish allegations of answer in suit to establish resulting trust.

In suit to establish a resulting trust in lots paid for by plaintiff but caused to be conveyed to defendant, evidence held insufficient to establish the allegations of defendant's answer that there was a verbal understanding between the parties that during their joint lives defendant was to hold the property for the use and benefit of both.

4. Trusts ⟸21(2)—Documents must show fact of trust and extent to which property held.

Though no particular formality is required in the creation of a trust, and all the conditions need not be expressed in a single paper, the documents must clearly show, not only the existence of the trust, but the extent to which the property is held in trust.

5. Trusts ⟸89(4)—Letters insufficient to support finding as to truth of allegations of answer in suit to establish resulting trust.

Certain letters written by plaintiff suing to establish a resulting trust over lots paid for by her but conveyed to defendant held insufficient to support the trial court's finding that the allegations of defendant's answer that the lots were to be held by her for the joint benefit of both parties during their joint lives were true.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Isabel H. Root against Belle H. Kuhn. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles (Hugh J. McClearn, of Duluth, Minn., of counsel), for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Upon the theory that certain lots of real estate, title to which had been vested in defendant, were the subject of a resulting trust in favor of plaintiff, she brought this action to compel a conveyance thereof. Judgment went for defendant, from which plaintiff has appealed.

Section 853, Civil Code, provides that—

"When a transfer of real property is made to one person, and the consideration therefor is paid by or for another, a trust is presumed to result in favor of the person by or for whom such payment is made."

[1] It is conceded that on May 14, 1909, plaintiff, out of her own funds, paid the entire purchase price of the lots and, by a simple grant deed, caused title to the same to be conveyed to defendant; and hence, under the provisions of the statute quoted, the property, at the instant the title passed, is presumed to have been impressed with a trust in favor of plaintiff, who, in the absence of other showing, would be entitled to a conveyance thereof in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. Hellman v. Messmer, 75 Cal. 166, 16 Pac. 766; 39 Cyc. 106. The presumption, however, is a disputable one, and, to overcome its effect, defendant in her answer alleged facts which, if properly established, would have created an express trust for the use and benefit of both parties. As alleged, these facts, in substance, are:

That it was at the time of the conveyance verbally understood between the parties that during the life of plaintiff the defendant was to hold the property for the use and benefit of plaintiff and defendant, so that either, if desired, could reside thereon, and that upon the death of plaintiff the title should vest absolute in defendant, if then living; otherwise, in her heirs; that it was further verbally understood that, while plaintiff was to provide all moneys required for the care of the property and payment of taxes, defendant was to look after and care for the same without charge for the services rendered, and that defendant did, in accordance with said understanding, take charge of the property, and did, without making any charge therefor and out of moneys obtained from the rental thereof, or supplied by plaintiff, care for the property and pay taxes and assessments levied thereon; "that from time to time subsequent to the said 14th day of May, 1909, the said plaintiff, both verbally and in writing, did reiterate the said agreement and did reiterate her statement that the said premises should be employed as a home for plaintiff and this defendant at such times when either plaintiff or this defendant desired to so occupy the same, either jointly or severally, and that the same should be and constitute the property of this defendant in fee simple absolute upon the demise of said plaintiff, * * * and continued to so do up to the filing of the complaint herein; that said plaintiff did likewise from time to time, both verbally and in writing, give instructions to this defendant to do with said premises as she thought best and to incur such charges and expenses against the same as she thought necessary or fit; that the said plaintiff did at all times state that her purpose and object in acquiring the said premises and in causing the title thereto to be vested in this defendant was for the benefit and protection of this defendant, saving and reserving to said plaintiff only the use of said premises during her natural life at such times as she intended to use the same."

[2] The judgment rests upon findings made in accordance with the allegations of the answer, in support of which defendant, over plaintiff's objection, was permitted to give oral testimony. In our opinion, the court erred in such ruling. The resulting trust in favor of plaintiff arose from the facts concededly established, in resistance of which defendant, by her answer, alleged an express trust based upon a "verbal understanding" and contrary to the provisions of section 852, Civil Code, which provides:

"No trust in relation to real property is valid unless created or declared: (1) By a written instrument, subscribed by the trustee, or by his agent thereto authorized by writing; (2) by the instrument under which the trustee claims the estate affected; or (3) by operation of law."

She sought by parol testimony to establish the existence of the same. Under the provisions of the law just quoted, the operation of the resulting trust could not be abridged or otherwise affected by parol testimony which tended to show the existence of an express trust the terms of which are wholly inconsistent with the former, and from which, if the alleged facts were properly established, it must follow that the property, subject to a restricted right of use during her lifetime, was intended to be a gift made by plaintiff to a stranger. Plass v. Plass, 122 Cal. 3, 54 Pac. 372. In Burling v. Newlands, 112 Cal. 496, 44 Pac. 816, it is said:

"The fact that a trust of lands is created must not only be manifested and proved by a writing properly executed, but it must also be manifested and proved by such a writing what the trust is." Pomeroy's Equity Jurisp. § 1009.

[3] We may say, however, that even if parol evidence was admissible, the testimony adduced falls far short of establishing the allegations of the answer. It appears therefrom that plaintiff and defendant were old friends, the former residing in Duluth, Minn., and the latter residing in Los Angeles county, where she owned some lots in Sierra Madre, adjoining which were located the lots in question. The only testimony touching the subject of the purchase, as disclosed by the record, is that of defendant, who, in response to the question as to what was said between her and plaintiff with reference to the purchase of the lots, stated:

"I don't remember any more than we both loved it there, and she wanted to come out here and live after she finished her business in the East; and I wanted she should come and live with us—I have always cared very much for her."

And to the question, "What was said, if anything, between you and Mrs. Root relative to the occupancy of the property, if she should buy it?" she answered, "I don't remember now." Further questions and answers were as follows:

"Q. Was anything said about who was to live on it? A. Well, we were—she was going to build a cottage and thought we might live together on it. We were always speaking of the beauties of the place, and how happy we would be when we had something we could keep.

"Q. Do you know any reason, other than you have stated, why the title was put in your name when the purchase was made? A. No, nothing further was said other than that we were to live on the place together.

"Q. What I want to get at there is, how did the subject of her buying these lots first arise—who suggested it? How did it first come up? A. She liked them, and she wanted to get them so as to live there."

It further appears that the parties were not related, and that plaintiff was under no obligations to defendant in a pecuniary way, and that during all of the time subsequent to the purchase of the property defendant had paid all assessments, taxes, and expenditures in the care and upkeep of the property. It is apparent, we think, from this testimony that, even though it were conceded to be competent for the purpose, it is wholly insufficient to establish the allegations of the answer which the court found to be true.

[4, 5] In addition to such parol testimony, there were received in evidence, over plaintiff's objection, several letters written by plaintiff to defendant, the first of which was under date of April 17, 1910, and the last under date of August 13, 1912. Conceding the insufficiency of the parol testimony to impress the land with a trust in favor of defendant, her counsel insists that the letters constitute written evidence thereof. While it is true that no particular formality is required in the creation of a trust, nor need all the conditions of the trust be expressed in a single paper (Tenney v. Simpson, 37 Kan. 579, 15 Pac. 512), nevertheless, the documents must clearly show, not only the existence of the trust, but also the extent to which the property is held in trust. As said by Mr. Pomeroy in his work on Equity Jurisprudence, § 1009:

"The declaration of trust, whether written or oral, must be reasonably certain in its material terms; and this requisite of certainty includes the subject-matter of property embraced within the trust, the beneficiaries or persons in whose behalf it is created, the nature and quantity of interest which they are to have, and the manner in which the trust is to be performed. If the language is so vague, general, or equivocal that any of these necessary elements of the trust is left in real uncertainty, then the trust must fail." Wittfield v. Forster, 124 Cal. 419, 57 Pac. 219.

Measured by the rule thus announced, the letters, written long after the conveyance of the property to defendant, and at which time the resulting trust arose, are wholly insufficient to support the finding of the court that the allegations of the answer are true. They were apparently written in reply to letters from defendant, in the absence of which their meaning is not clear. However, there is nothing in the letters to either indicate that an express trust was created, or, if created, that its purposes were within the provisions of section 857, Civil Code, which authorizes the creation of trusts for the purposes therein designated. All that can be gleaned from the letters is that plaintiff, on account of her friendship for defendant, who owned lots adjoining those in question, was desirous of handling the property in a manner which would not be detrimental to the latter, and that while the title was vested in defendant, plaintiff nevertheless recognized her obligation to pay all charges against the property and did so pay them. Referring to a street improvement bond existing against the property, plaintiff, in a letter dated December 5, 1910, said: "If anything should happen to me, you would have that added to the load you are carrying." In a letter following, she said: "Don't think I ever worried over the lots. I bought them more because you wanted them than anything else, and when I do build will still keep the property in your name, so when anything happens to me there will be no question as to who owns it." Another contains the statement: "I want you to handle the lots in any way that would help you." And under date of March 18, 1912, she, in reply to a letter from defendant wherein she refers to a prospective sale of Los Angeles property owned by the latter, asks: "If you sell, will that clean up all there is against the Los Angeles place?" And later, on August 13, 1912, she, in writing to defendant, said: "If you can sell the lots instead (of your own property), do so, and I will let you have the money." It is apparent from these letters that they were written in response to letters from defendant wherein she had disclosed her financial troubles to plaintiff, and, on account of her friendship, the latter in her replies manifested a desire to encourage and help her through her difficulties, even to the extent, as she states, of selling the lots and letting defendant have the proceeds. Whether considered singly or all together, the casual statements in relation to the property are wholly insufficient to support the findings to the effect that an express trust in the property was created for the benefit of defendant. The judgment is reversed.

FRASER'S MILLION DOLLAR PIER CO. v. OCEAN PARK PIER CO. et al.

1. Landlord and tenant ⊂=291(8)—Complaint held sufficient to allege that taxes were levied against leased premises.

Where leased premises were assessed for taxation in connection with other property of the lessor, a complaint in unlawful detainer, alleging that the taxes amounted to $2,892.22 for a particular year and that $970.50 was the proportional part of the taxes chargeable against the leased premises, sufficiently alleged that $970.50 of the taxes was levied against the leased premises.

2. Evidence ⊂=413—Testimony as to assessor's valuation of property assessed with other property not inadmissible as contradicting assessment roll.

Where premises on which a lessee was to pay the taxes was assessed with other property of the lessor, the testimony of the assessors as to the valuations placed by them on the leased property which valuations were included in the total valuations, was admissible over the objection that it varied or contradicted the assessment roll.

3. Landlord and tenant ⊂=149—Premises including pier presumed worth more in proportion to frontage than property extending only to high-tide line.

Where a lessor's ocean frontage not covered by a lease extended only to mean high-tide line, while leased property which included a pier extended several hundred feet into the ocean, in an action involving taxes to be paid by the parties, the leased property was of greater value in proportion to frontage than the other property.

4. Landlord and tenant ⊂=148(2)—Lease held to require payment of taxes on right of way by lessee.

Where a lease required the lessee to pay all taxes levied on the property and provided that the lessee should maintain a right of way at its own expense until a building was erected on the lessor's property not included in the lease after which the expense should be equitably divided, the burden was on the lessee to pay the taxes on the entire value of the right of way where no buildings had been constructed on the unleased property.

5. Appeal and error ⊂=1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence conclusive.

A finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive in the appellate court.

6. Landlord and tenant ⊂=149—Lessee's payment of part of taxes without objection held admission that an apportionment was fair.

Where leased premises on which the lessee was to pay taxes was assessed for taxation with other property of the lessor and it had been the custom for the lessor to make up a statement of the taxes chargeable to the lessee, and such a statement was rendered to the lessee in a particular year, the payment of the first installment of the tax without objection was an admission that the amount charged was fair and just.

7. Municipal corporations ⊂=23 — Navigable waters ⊂=37(4)—Rights of adjoining owners or municipalities in waters or jurisdiction thereunder governed by line drawn perpendicular to shore line.

The rights of adjoining owners of land bordering on navigable or tide waters, or the bounds of jurisdiction over such waters of adjoining municipalities, is not fixed by extending the boundary line into the waters in the direction of its last course, but by a line drawn perpendicular to the shore line, or, if the shore line is circular, perpendicular to a tangent drawn on the circle at the point of intersection.

8. Landlord and tenant ⊂=149—Acceptance of rent without insisting on payment of taxes held not to estop landlord.

Where a lease required the lessee to pay taxes and provided that if it failed to pay them the lessor might do so and that the lessee would repay the lessor on the first rental day thereafter, the acceptance by the lessor of rent on the day it was due without insisting on payment of taxes which had been paid by it did not postpone payment until the next rent day or waive the default in payment or estop the lessor from enforcing a forfeiture because of such default.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by the Fraser's Million Dollar Pier Company against the Ocean Park Pier Company and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Milton K. Young, Davis, Kemp & Post, and Kemp & Clewett, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Goudge, Robinson & Hughes, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action in unlawful detainer. The plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendants appeal.

The complaint alleged an unlawful holding over after a default upon a covenant by the lessee to pay the taxes assessed against the leased premises, followed by a notice to pay the same or quit within three days. The defendants failed to make payment within the three days and shortly afterward this action was brought.

The plaintiff was the owner of lots 176 and 177 of the Crescent Bay Tract in Santa Monica. These lots extended from a walk along the ocean front southwesterly to the line of ordinary high tide. Upon lot 176 it had erected a large pier extending some 250 feet along the water front and into the ocean beyond the line of ordinary high tide several hundred feet. The land end of this pier was situated on the upland about 50 feet from the line of ordinary high tide as it existed at the time of making the lease. The lease embraced a strip approximately 50 feet wide leading from the walk aforesaid to another strip extending across the said lot substantially parallel with the ocean front, both of which strips were to be used in common by the lessor and the lessee and the public as means of access to said pier. It also included the whole of said pier, all of which, except a small portion of the inner end thereof situated above high tide, was built upon piles driven into the ocean bed below high-water mark.

The lease was executed by the plaintiff to the Ocean Park Pier Company. It was for the term of 14 years, beginning February 1, 1914, with an option to extend the same, if desired, for the further period of 36 years. It contained a covenant that in addition to the rentals mentioned therein the lessee should "pay all taxes which may be levied upon said property during the term of this lease." It provided that the failure of the lessee to pay such taxes when they became due, or before they became delinquent, should terminate the lease; that if the lessee failed to pay such taxes the lessor at its option might pay the same; and that the taxes so paid by the lessor should be repaid to it by the lessee on the first rental day thereafter, together with interest. The rental day was the first day of each month during the term. It was provided also that if any default should be made in any of the covenants of the lease by the lessee the lease should cease and terminate and it should be lawful for the lessor to enter upon the demised premises and to remove all parties therefrom. The complaint set forth these portions of the lease, and further alleged that the taxes levied and assessed against the property of the plaintiff, including the leased premises, for the second half of the fiscal year 1917–18 amounted to $2,892.22, and that the proportional part thereof chargeable to the leased premises amounted to $970.50; that the latter sum was not paid by the lessee, and would have become delinquent on April 30, 1918; that upon April 29, 1918, plaintiff paid all the taxes assessed against its property aforesaid, including the aforesaid amount chargeable to the leased premises, and thereupon, on April 29, 1918, demanded the same from the lessee; that the first rental day following that day was May 1, 1918; that the defendants did not repay said amount on May 1, 1918, nor at all; that on May 9, 1918, demand in writing was made by plaintiff upon the defendants herein for the payment of said sum of $970.50, or that the defendants surrender possession of the premises within three days, and that the defendants refused to pay the same or to quit possession of the premises, and ever since have unlawfully held possession thereof. The defendants other than the Ocean Park Pier Company are sublessees of said company under the aforesaid lease.

[1] The defendants contend that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action because, as they say, while the lease provided that the defendant Ocean Park Pier Company should pay all taxes levied upon the leased premises during the term of the lease, there is no allegation that any tax was ever levied upon said leased premises. We think this claim is based upon an entirely too narrow view of the effect of the language of the complaint. It alleges that the second installment of the taxes levied against the property of the plaintiff was $2,892.22 for the year 1917–18, and that $970.50 was the proportional part of said taxes chargeable against the leased premises. As is customary, all the taxes were assessed to the plaintiff as the owner thereof in connection with its other property. Graciosa O. Co. v. Santa Barbara Co., 155 Cal. 143, 99 Pac. 483, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 211. The complaint therefore clearly alleges that the assessment against its entire property was $2,892.22, and that of this, $970.50 was levied against the leased premises. There is no merit in this contention.

[2] The next claim of the defendants is that the court erred in allowing testimony in the case which they assert was an attempt to vary the terms of the assessment roll showing the assessment of the taxes in question. It appeared from the assessment roll that the plaintiff was assessed with the whole of lots 176 and 177 in said addition, and that upon lot 176 the assessment included $103,770 as the value of the lot, and $43,600 as the value of the improvements thereon. The leased premises, as we have shown, included only parts of lot 176. In order to show the proportion of the taxes properly chargeable to the leased premises, the plaintiff placed upon the stand the deputy county assessor who had made the assessment upon the property for the year 1917, and the city assessor of Santa Monica who had made the assessment for city purposes upon said property for that year. These two witnesses were able to recall the fact that they had placed certain valuations upon the improvements which were leased to the defendant Ocean Park Pier Company, and that said sums were included in the total valuation shown upon the assessment roll, and they so testified. It is this testimony which the defendants claim was a variation by parol of the terms of the assessment roll. We do not think it was contradictory or in conflict with the assessment roll, nor that it in any way came within the rule which forbids the introduction of parol testimony to vary or explain a writing or record. The covenant upon which the defendants were bound was to pay the taxes levied upon the leased premises. It chanced that the lessor owned other property and that it was all assessed together, the leased property not being segregated so that the taxes levied thereon could be ascertained from the assessment roll. In order to carry out the terms of the lease it was therefore necessary to ascertain the proportion of the taxes properly chargeable upon the leased premises. To do this it was proper to find how much of the total assessed valuation of the property was given to the leased premises by the officials who made the valuations stated in the assessments. If the officials who made the assessment had not been at hand, the only way this could have been ascertained would be by calling other witnesses to testify to the respective values of the different parcels of the property included in the total, and assigning to the leased property its due proportion of the total, according to such valuations. This would be at best but an approximation of the actual taxes imposed upon the leased premises. But when the officers who made the assessment could testify as to the actual valuations they placed upon such property, which valuations became a part of the total valuation charged to the plaintiff, the calculation, instead of being an approximation, became exact. It did not in any respect change the assessment roll. It was merely a means, and the best and most appropriate means, of ascertaining the exact taxes levied against the leased property.

Defendants next contend that $970.50 is more than was due for the taxes assessed against the leased premises. This claim is based upon the testimony to the effect that in computing the proportional part of the taxes due from the lessee, the right of way extending through the lot to the pier was assumed to be 50 feet wide, whereas, according to the testimony of one of the witnesses for the plaintiff, it was only 47 feet wide at one end and 43 feet wide at the other. The map introduced in evidence showing the distances states that the right of way was 49.33 feet wide at one end and 47 feet wide at the other. They also claim that inasmuch as the right of way was to be used in common by the parties and by the public for access to and egress from the pier and other buildings on the lot, the lessee did not get absolute possession thereof and should not be charged with its entire value. The lease designated this right of way as a 50-foot entrance, and it provided that the lessee should maintain the same at its own expense until a building was erected upon those parts of the lessor's lots which were not included in the lease, after which the expense should be equitably divided between the two. It is claimed that the taxes would be a part of the expense of maintenance which should have been paid pro rata by each party.

[3-6] There are several answers to this objection. In the first place, the value of the land embraced in the lease was computed upon the front foot basis in apportioning the tax, The frontage of the lessee, as calculated, was 50 feet, being the assumed width of the right of way. The frontage of the lessor was 275.5 feet, being all of the remainder of the frontage of lot 176 and one foot which seems to have been situated in lot 177. The 275.5 feet of frontage charged to the lessor extended only to the mean high tide line, a distance of approximately 125 feet. The 50-foot strip extended to the mean high tide line and thence several hundred feet into the ocean, to the outer end of the pier. It was therefore presumably of greater value proportionally than the frontage of the lessor. Furthermore, we have been directed to no evidence indicating that at the time this assessment was made there were any buildings upon the portions of lot 176 not included in the lease, in which event, assuming that the expense of maintenance included taxes, the burden would be upon the lessee to pay such taxes upon the entire value of the right of way, under the terms of the lease. But there are other reasons which we think entirely satisfactory for upholding the finding of the trial court that $970.50 was a fair and just amount due from the defendants under the lease for the second half of the taxes of 1917. One is that the evidence was conflicting upon this subject, and, of course, a finding upon conflicting evidence is conclusive in the appellate court. Another reason is found in the following facts: From the beginning of the lease until and including the year 1917, it had been the custom of the lessor and lessee to settle the taxes in the following manner: As soon as the assessment roll was made out in the fall of each year the lessor would make up a statement of the amount of taxes properly chargeable to the lessee, and render such statement to the lessee showing the amount due for each installment of taxes. Thereupon, as the tax fell due, the lessee would pay the amount charged to it in said statement, and the matter would thus be settled. This occurred each year. In 1917 the statement was rendered by the lessor to the lessee in the fall as usual. It stated that the amount properly chargeable to the lessee for that year's taxes was $970.50 for the first installment and $970.50 for the second installment. It was in the nature of a stated account. No objection whatever was made thereto, and in pursuance thereof the lessee paid $970.50 for the first installment of the taxes of that year, which fell due in November. No objection to the amount was ever made, nor was any objection to the amount demanded for the second installment made at any time, until after the beginning of this action. Under these circumstances we think the rendition of the statement, the payment of the first installment in accordance therewith, and the failure to object to the amount thereof, must be taken as an admission by the lessee that the amount charged was fair and just, and, so considered, it is sufficient to support the finding to that effect.

It is next contended that the assessment was wholly void and consequently that no claim could be made against the lessee on account thereof. This claim is based on the theory that upon the trial it was discovered that if the line dividing the two cities was extended in the same direction into the ocean a very small portion of the pier situated at the extreme end thereof, far out into the ocean, would be on the Venice side of that line. Upon this it is claimed that this part of the leased premises was not within the limits of the city of Santa Monica. Upon this point the court found that a small portion of the southwesterly corner of the pier would be intersected by an extension of the boundary line between Santa Monica and Venice beyond the line of mean high tide, but that if that portion of the pier southwesterly of said boundary line so extended was taken into consideration by the respective assessors in making the assessments upon the property as being within the city of Santa Monica, the amount which the lessor asked the lessee to pay as the proportional amount of taxes due for the second half of 1917 was not affected thereby in a substantial extent.

[7] This point is to some extent covered by the fact that a statement was duly rendered to the lessee showing the amount and no objection was made thereto, but the same was acted upon by the lessee in the payment of the first installment of taxes. There is, however, another answer, more complete and satisfactory. It will be observed that the court did not find expressly that any part of the pier was situated within the limits of the city of Venice. This finding was that part of it was situated southwesterly of the boundary line between the two cities if the same were extended beyond the mean high tide line out into the ocean. The discovery that this was the fact arose from the introduction in evidence of a plat made by a surveyor showing the subdivision of the Crescent Bay tract in Santa Monica, bordering upon the ocean and extending southeasterly to the division line between the two cities. The direction of this division line indicated that it might intersect the pier at its outer end, and thereupon the court elicited testimony from the surveyor to the effect that this would be its effect, if extended. All the parties appear to have assumed that the division line which marked the jurisdiction of the respective cities over the water beyond high tide line would be the line of the boundary extended into the water. It appears that this line is not perpendicular to the shore line at that point, but strikes it at an angle, less than 90 degrees on the Venice side and more than 90 degrees on the Santa Monica side. Under the law applicable to such matters it is not true that the rights of adjoining owners of land bordering upon tide water, or upon a navigable lake or stream, in the land under the water upon which both tracts abut are to be ascertained by extending the line of the boundary between them in its original direction into the water, to the center thereof in the case of a stream, or indefinitely in the case of the ocean. On the contrary, the rule is that the area over which such rights as each proprietor may have in the land under the water upon which his tract abuts, and to the use of the water covering the same, is not fixed by extending his boundary line into the water in the direction of the last course ending at the shore line, but is fixed by a line drawn into the water perpendicular to the shore line; that is, to the general course of the shore line at that point. Unless extraordinary conditions occur, this is the rule to be applied in defining the respective rights of such owners to the space in front, under, upon, and in the water. If accretions occur in front of the land the boundary line between them as to such accretions is a line extending into the water perpendicular to the original shore line in its general course and not by the line of the boundary extended in its original direction. If this were not the case, it will be seen that where the boundary line strikes the shore line at an acute angle the rights of one proprietor would extend in front of the land of the other so as to practically cut him off from the use of the water. The authorities are all to the effect that this is not the case. 3 Farnum on Waters, pp. 2476, 2477; Menasha, etc., Co. v. Lawson, 70 Wis. 600, 36 N. W. 412; People v. Schermerhorn, 19 Barb. (N. Y.) 540. The same rule, of course, applies, in the absence of any statute to the contrary, to the bounds of municipal jurisdiction over waters of the ocean. From this principle it follows that the line dividing the jurisdiction of Santa Monica and Venice over the ocean in front of each city is not the extension of the line of the final course of the division line terminating at the mean high tide line, but is a line drawn from the intersection of that boundary with the shore line into the ocean in a direction perpendicular to the general course of the shore line at that place. If the short line is circular it will be perpendicular to a tangent drawn on the circle at the point of such intersection. It follows that no part of the pier is within the jurisdictional limits of the city of Venice and that the objection is without foundation in fact.

[8] The Ocean Park Pier Company, on May 1, 1918, after the demand had been made upon it for the payment of its share of the taxes, paid to the lessor the rent of the premises falling due on that day. It is claimed that the acceptance of the rent then paid was a waiver of the default in the payment of the taxes, and that it estops the plaintiff from claiming such default and from enforcing the forfeiture of the lease by reason of that breach of the covenant thereof. Appellant's brief states the point, but does not argue it, except to suggest that this acceptance of the rent without insisting on payment of the tax on that rent day, operated to postpone the time of payment of the taxes until the rent day in June. We can see no reason for the conclusion contended for. The terms of the lease are clear to the effect that in case the lessee fails to pay the taxes for any year or any installment thereof and the lessor thereupon pays them, the amount thereof chargeable to the lessee upon the leased premises must be paid to the lessor at the next rent day thereafter. The covenant to pay the taxes and the covenant to pay the rent are wholly separate and independent. The payment of one does not depend upon the payment of the other, nor does the acceptance of the rent operate as a waiver of the obligation to pay the taxes. The failure to pay the taxes was as much a breach of the lease as it would have been had there been also a failure to pay the rent and the acceptance of the rent in no wise satisfied the obligation to pay the taxes. There seems to be no foundation for any argument in favor of the asserted waiver and estoppel.

These comprise all the points made by the defendants in support of the appeal. Inasmuch as we find all of them to be without merit, it follows that the judgment must stand.

The judgment is affirmed.

PACIFIC SEWER PIPE CO. v. UNITED STATES FIDELITY & GUARANTY CO. (L. A. 6557.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜373(3)—One furnishing material to street contractor under Vrooman Act required to file claim within 30 days after acceptance by board of public works; "completed."

Under Vrooman Act, § 6½, providing that any materialman furnishing materials to be used in the performance of street work, whose claim has not been paid by the contractor, may, within 30 days from the time the improvement is "completed," file a verified statement with the superintendent of streets, etc., the word "completed" signifies the fulfillment of the contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and a materialman was entitled to file claim within 30 days after the improvement was accepted by resolution of the board of public works of Los Angeles, which board, under Los Angeles City Charter, §§ 52a, 144, is the superintendent of streets.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Complete—Completion.]

2. Municipal corporations ⊜373(3) — Statute fixes time after which materialmen's claims cannot be filed.

The 30-day period after completion of street work, fixed by Vrooman Act, § 6½, fixes a time after which materialmen's claims cannot be filed.

3. Appeal and error ⊜845(2)—Incorrect conclusions from conceded facts disregarded.

Incorrect conclusions of the trial court from conceded facts are to be disregarded.

4. Appeal and error ⊜1176(3)—Correct judgment ordered on reversal, where agreed statement discloses all essential facts.

Where a case is determined on an agreed statement of facts, which discloses every fact essential to a correct judgment, and the trial court draws an incorrect conclusion therefrom, the correct judgment will be ordered on a reversal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Pacific Sewer Pipe Company against the United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff.

Swanwick & Donnelly and Chas. E. Donnelly, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Lawler & Degnan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff herein is suing upon a contractor's bond for the purpose of recovering money for material furnished for use in certain street improvement work. The case was submitted upon stipulated facts which are as follows: Pursuant to the provisions of an act providing for work upon streets, etc., within municipalities, commonly known as the Vrooman Act (Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1714, Act 3930), the board of public works of the city of Los Angeles and the California-Arizona Construction Company entered into a contract for the performance by the latter of certain street work in the city of Los Angeles. The California-Arizona Construction Company, as principal, and defendant United States Fidelity & Guaranty Company, as surety, executed and delivered to said city the undertaking required by section 6½ of the Vrooman Act. The California-Arizona Construction Company entered upon the performance of the contract and some time in the month of December, 1916, plaintiff, Pacific Sewer Pipe

Company, furnished to the California-Arizona Construction Company, for use in said street improvement work, certain sewer pipe and sewer pipe fittings, of the value of $470.97, which sum has never been paid. The last actual work and labor required on said improvement was performed May 11, 1917, and thereafter, on May 19, 1917, the city engineer issued and filed with the board of public works of Los Angeles his certificate that the improvement was completed. On May 25, 1917, the board of public works adopted a resolution whereby the improvement in question was accepted as completed to the satisfaction of that board.

Section 6½ of the Vrooman Act provides:

"Any materialman * * * furnishing materials to be used in the performance of said work specified in said contract, * * * whose claim has not been paid by the said contractor, * * * to whom the said contract was awarded, may, within thirty days from the time said improvement is completed, file with the superintendent of streets a verified statement of his or its claim. * * *"

The filing of the claim in accordance with these conditions is a prerequisite to the commencement of an action on the bond. On June 23, 1917, plaintiff filed with the board of public works a verified statement of its claim for $470.97. It will be noted that this claim was filed more than 30 days after the performance of the last work required on said improvement, but that less than 30 days had elapsed between the adoption by the board of public works of the resolution accepting the work as completed and the filing of the plaintiff's claim. The trial court, after making findings in accordance with the stipulated facts, found that the work in question was completed on May 11, 1917, and rendered judgment in favor of defendant, upon the theory that more than 30 days had intervened between the completion of the work and the filing of plaintiff's claim. Plaintiff appeals from this judgment, claiming that the work was not completed until the passage of the resolution accepting the work, and therefore that its claim was filed within the 30-day period fixed by law.

"The verb 'to complete,' like many others, is used with some indefiniteness of signification; and the idea conveyed by it frequently depends upon the connection in which it is found, or the object to which it refers." Newell v. People, 7 N. Y. 9, 131.

We are of the opinion that the word "completed," as used in section 6½ of the Vrooman Act, permitting the filing of a claim "within thirty days from the time said improvement is completed," signifies the fulfillment of the contract to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, and therefore that plaintiff was entitled to file its claim within 30 days after the improvement was accepted by the resolution of the board of public works of Los Angeles, which board, by virtue of charter provisions, is the superintendent of streets of that city. Charter of City of Los Angeles, §§ 52a, 144.

[1] Section 6 of the aforesaid Vrooman Act requires that street improvement work provided for by the act be "done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets, * * * and all contracts made therefor must contain a provision to that effect." Whether the work has been performed to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets can only be determined by the acceptance of the same by the superintendent and, where the superintendent of streets is the board of public works, that act of acceptance ordinarily takes the form of a resolution of the board. This acceptance constitutes the determining factor as to completion. Until the superintendent of streets has determined that the work called for by the contract has been satisfactorily performed, there is an element of incompleteness and uncertainty as to whether or not more work remains to be done, for although the contractor may have deemed the improvement finished and ceased work thereon, the superintendent of streets may insist upon alterations or the performance of additional work. It is true that the acceptance of the work by the superintendant of streets in effect determines that the improvement was finished in so far as actual work was concerned, at a prior date, but that fact does not necessitate a retroactive effect as against materialmen and other claimants. Since the consummation of the work is a matter of conjecture until the actual acceptance thereof, only the approval of the authority whose acquiescence is required by statute can confer the stamp of finality.

[2] The 30-day period after completion fixes a time after which materialmen's claims cannot be filed. French v. Powell, 135 Cal. 636, 68 Pac. 92. Therefore that interpretation of "completion" is to be preferred which provides a definite means for ascertaining the precise period within which such action can be taken. The fact that the materialman may file his claim immediately after supplying the material does not impair his right to the entire period permitted by statute for the filing of such claim, and therefore presents no argument against the desirability of definiteness in the determination of the time from which the 30-day period begins to run. In referring to section 6½ of the Vrooman Act, in his work on California Street Law, p. 150, Page says:

"This section is not to be given the same strict construction which is applied to mechanic's lien statutes. It is a remedy regarded with favor by the courts and its provisions will be liberally construed."

The question now presented appears never to have been directly decided by this court, but statements made in passing upon other questions indicate that the court has inclined to the interpretation herein adopted. Thus in California Portland Cement Co. v. Boone, 181 Cal. 35, 183 Pac. 447, in construing provisions of the Improvement Act of 1911 (St. 1911, p. 730), requiring the filing of a notice within 30 days after completion, the court says:

"When was the work completed? The fact that the contractor requested that the work be accepted piecemeal as provided in section 30, and that the board of trustees granted the request, cannot change the plain provisions of the act that 'the work must, in all cases, be done under the direction and to the satisfaction of the superintendent of streets' (section 18), and that he alone, therefore, has power to accept the work as completed."

In Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 62 Pac. 500, work had been accepted by the superintendent of streets within the time provided by the contract for the completion of the work but the city council, upon appeal, set aside the acceptance, after the time provided for completion had elapsed. The court was called upon to determine whether the work was "completed" within the time limited by the contract and, in deciding that it had been so completed, stated:

"The contract provided, in accordance with the express requirements of the statute, that the contractor would do and perform the work 'under the direction and to the satisfaction of the street superintendent.' The provision therein fixing two hundred and fifty days as the time for the completion of the work must refer to the completion of the work according to the terms of the contract—that is, to the satisfaction of the street superintendent and under his direction." (Italics ours.)

[3, 4] The work in question was not "completed" so as to start the running of the 30-day period against materialmen and other claimants under section 6½ of the Vrooman Act until it was accepted as satisfactory by the superintendent of streets and it is conceded that plaintiff's claim was filed within 30 days after such acceptance. The trial court adopted and set forth in its findings the facts stipulated to by the parties, including the various dates upon which the different acts were performed, and these facts are sufficient to support a judgment in favor of plaintiff. The further findings of the trial court to the effect that the work was completed May 11, 1917, and that the claim was not filed within 30 days after the completion are incorrect conclusions from conceded facts and, consequently, are to be disregarded. Burnett v. Stearns, 33 Cal. 468; Carter v. Fox, 11 Cal. App. 67, 103 Pac. 910. Where a case is determined upon an agreed statement of facts which discloses every fact essential to a correct judgment, and the trial court draws an incorrect conclusion therefrom, the correct judgment will be ordered upon a reversal. Perkins v. Cowles, 157 Cal. 625, 634, 108 Pac. 711, 137 Am. St. Rep. 158.

The judgment in favor of defendant is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter a judgment in favor of plaintiff.

CREDITORS' ADJUSTMENT CO. v. NEWMAN. (S. F. 9566.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 4, 1921.)

1. Execution ⟸161—Court may recall improperly issued execution.

The court has a right to recall the execution if issuance was improperly or inadvertently made, or authority therefor revoked.

2. Execution ⟸163—Motion to quash execution issued more than five years after entry of judgment held to invoke court's discretion.

Motion to quash execution issued more than five years after entry of judgment on judgment creditor's ex parte motion under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, and order on which it was based, on the ground that the court had no jurisdiction to order issuance of writ, that order was inadvertently made, that levy worked a hardship on defendant, that it was inequitable because of laches, that there was no consideration for the judgment, that defendant was not legally or morally indebted in excess of specified amount, that execution was granted for an amount in excess of that called for by judgment, that the court had no authority to direct payment of interest, that no notice of hearing was given, that order was not issued upon motion or upon supplemental proceedings, and that the order was an abuse of discretion, held sufficient, when the grounds are taken as a whole, to justify exercise of discretion by the court in determining whether the judgment should be enforced after the lapse of five years.

3. Execution ⟸73, 163—Defenses or circumstances leading up to judgment not considered on question of whether execution should issue more than five years after judgment.

On application for writ of execution more than five years after entry of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, or in proceedings to vacate writ issued on such application, the court cannot properly consider defenses to original action or circumstances leading up to the judgment, but may consider matters rendering the enforcement of the judgment inequitable.

4. Execution ⟸73—Execution may be ordered five years after entry of judgment on ex parte motion.

Order for issuance of execution more than five years after entry of judgment under Code

Civ. Proc. § 685, may be made on an ex parte motion, but is subject to review on motion to vacate the order and to recall the execution.

5. Execution ⊂=163—Order quashing writ conclusive on subsequent motion on same grounds.

Order vacating an order for a writ of execution made more than five years after entry of judgment under Code Civ. Proc. § 685, held res judicata on subsequent motion to vacate an execution to enforce such judgment based upon the same grounds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by the Creditors' Adjustment Company against Mrs. F. C. Newman, otherwise known as Mrs. F. C. Haigh. Judgment for plaintiff, and from an order vacating an order for a writ of execution, and recalling the execution issued thereon and denying further process for the enforcement of the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The following is the opinion of Hart, J., in the District Court of Appeal, Third District, rendered July 17, 1920, with which Nicol, Presiding Justice pro tem., and Burnett, J., concurred:

This is an appeal by the plaintiff from an order setting aside and vacating an order directing the issuance of execution and recalling said execution and directing the return of any property seized under said execution.

The facts are: On the 17th day of April, 1906, the defendant, who was then engaged in the retail millinery business in the city of Santa Rosa, received a shipment of merchandise from Muller, Raas & Co., wholesale dealers in millinery goods, the same having been delivered to her at her place of business in packages. These goods, with others, were destroyed by fire in the early morning of April 18, 1906. The defendant having defaulted in the matter of paying for the goods shipped to her, the plaintiff, to which the wholesale firm above named assigned its account against the defendant for said goods, on the 7th day of May, 1907, brought an action against the latter in the superior court of Sonoma county for the sum of $580.60, the value of the goods referred to. The defendant did not contest said action, but allowed judgment to be taken against her for the sum sued for. Five years later the plaintiff brought another action based upon the judgment obtained in May, 1907, and, the defendant having defaulted therein and failed to appear or answer, judgment was rendered in said action against her on April 9, 1912. On October 10, 1918, six years and six months after the rendition of the last-mentioned judgment, the superior court of the said county of Sonoma, in pursuance of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, made an order for the issuance of an execution, for the purpose of satisfying said judgment. The execution was thereupon delivered into the hands of the sheriff of said county to be levied, and the same was by said officer levied upon property belonging to the defendant. On October 11, 1918, the defendant noticed a motion for an order setting aside the said order directing the issuance of the execution recalling the execution.

Among the grounds of the motion, as set forth in the notice, were these: That the order directing issuance of execution was "inadvertently made"; that the defendant "is not legally or morally indebted to said plaintiff in any sum in excess of $100"; that the sum as specified in said order and to satisfy which said execution was issued "is materially in excess of the amount declared to be due by said judgment"; "that no notice of the hearing of said application was ever given to the defendant"; "that it was an abuse of discretion of the court to issue said order." The said motion was supported by an affidavit of the defendant, in which, after setting forth the fact of the bringing of the two actions above referred to, and the fact that she did not contest the first action and defaulted in the second, as above stated, she alleged, stating the facts in substance: That she attempted through certain representatives of Muller, Raas & Co. to have her account with that firm adjusted, and that she was assured by said representatives that "the same would be equitably settled, and that said representatives informed her and she believes the fact to be that said Muller, Raas & Co. had said goods covered by policies of insurance and were paid by the insurers 90 cents on the dollar of the insured value thereof"; that her husband was at the time the said goods were bought and received at her place of business in Santa Rosa the real owner of said business and millinery store and the goods therein contained; that her said husband, subsequently to the receipt of said goods, died testate, and that she was thereafter duly appointed executrix of his last will; that the said sheriff, pursuant to said execution, had levied upon all the moneys of affiant held by her in a certain designated bank in Santa Rosa as said executrix; that the said Muller, Raas & Co. "have not sustained any loss by reason of their business dealings with this affiant and are not entitled to recover from her more than the sum of $100, which she has at all times been ready and willing, and is now ready and willing to pay in satisfaction of said demands."

Upon hearing the motion the court granted the same, an opinion giving the reasons and the ground upon which the motion was granted having been prepared and filed by the court on the 19th day of October, 1918, and the formal order having been filed on the 21st day of said month.

All the proceedings above referred to were had before Hon. Thos. C. Denny, a judge of the superior court in and for the said county of Sonoma. No appeal was taken from the order of October 21, 1918, vacating the order of October 10, 1918, directing execution to issue. On August 28, 1919, an application was made to the said superior court, in the department presided over by Hon. Emmet Seawell, for an order directing the issuance of an execution on the judgment in the action last tried—the action based upon the judgment in the first action—and upon hearing said application the court, acting through Judge Seawell, granted the same and so ordered execution to issue. Thereafter, and on the 29th day of August, 1919, the defendant served and filed a notice of motion to set aside and vacate the order made by Judge Seawell on August 28, 1919, directing execution to issue and to have said execution recalled. The grounds of the said motion as specified in the notice were in all particulars substantially the same as those upon which the motion for the vacation of the original order directing issuance of execution was made, there being set up therein, however, an additional ground in the nature of a plea by way of estoppel or the plea that the former order vacating the order directing the issuance of execution and recalling the execution issued thereunder was, in its effect upon the like order last made, res adjudicata. The motion was supported by the affidavit of the defendant, in which she set out briefly the facts relating to the proceedings culminating in the order setting aside the first order directing issuance of execution, etc., alleged that the order made by Judge Seawell was obtained in the absence of a showing before and to said judge that the execution of October, 1918, had theretofore been recalled, that the execution so ordered to issue by Judge Seawell was delivered to the sheriff of Sonoma county, who thereafter and thereunder seized certain personal property belonging to the defendant, and was about to sell and would sell the same and apply the same in satisfaction of the "pretended judgment now held by said plaintiff," set up, in effect, the plea of estoppel, as above explained, and then referred to and made as a part of her affidavit the affidavit filed in support of the motion to vacate the first order directing execution to issue and to have same recalled. Counter affidavits were made and filed by certain officers of the assignor of the plaintiff and used in opposition and resistance to the motion to vacate the order of August 28, 1919, in which it was stated that the statement in the defendant's affidavit that plaintiff's assignor received from policies of insurance covering the goods in question 90 per cent. of the amount of the judgment rendered against her in the action for the recovery of the value of said goods is and was wholly untrue, and that the full amount of said judgment is still unsatisfied and due the plaintiff.

The court found that "each and every of the matters and things stated in the notice of motion to vacate and set aside said order of August 28, 1919, and to recall the execution issued thereunder, are true, and each and every of the matters and things stated in defendant's affidavit are true," and thereupon ordered that the said order of August 28, 1919, be "forever vacated, annulled, and set aside," and that the execution be recalled and "is forever annulled, vacated, and set aside; and it is further ordered, etc., that the sheriff of said county do forthwith return and deliver to said defendant any and all property of every kind, character, and description seized by him or levied by him on the said writ of execution." The order further proceeds: "It is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that it is improper and inequitable to issue a writ of execution in said action or to compel the enforcement of or enforce said judgment in any manner or for any amount whatever; and it is hereby finally decreed that no writ of execution shall ever issue in said action to compel the enforcement or collection of said judgment; and it is further ordered that the order made herein October 19, 1918, directing the recall of and recalling a certain writ of execution issued upon said judgment is final and conclusive, and that no power exists in this Court to order any further writ of execution."

It is from the foregoing order that this appeal is prosecuted by the plaintiff.

The respondent contends that the order recalling the execution first directed to be issued and issued is res adjudicata, and therefore operates as an estoppel against the right of the plaintiff to a subsequent order directing the issuance of execution. In other words, the contention is that the order recalling the execution first issued is conclusive upon the question whether an execution should issue, and that, by reason of the said order, the "plaintiff is conclusively precluded from obtaining execution."

As above intimated, the authority for the issuance of an execution upon a judgment after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry is to be found in section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "In all cases, the judgment may be enforced or carried into execution after the lapse of five years from the date of its entry, by leave of the court, upon motion, or by judgment for that purpose, founded upon supplemental pleadings; but nothing in this section shall be construed to revive a judgment for the recovery of money which shall have been barred by limitation at the time of the passage of this act."

We think that it must be held that the order recalling the execution first issued is res adjudicata. There was, as we have seen, no appeal taken from said order, and it does not appear that any new right or matters or facts were brought out or introduced in the proceedings on the motion for the issuance of the writ heard and granted by Judge Seawell.

In Wheeler v. Eldred, 137 Cal. 37, 69 Pac. 619, an order was made denying a motion for an order, under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, directing the issuance of execution. Thereafter another motion was made for a like order, and, the same having been denied, an appeal from the order denying the motion was taken to the Supreme Court. Affirming the order, the Supreme Court said: "The matter involved here is res adjudicata, and the application is barred by the judgment of the court on a previous similar motion made by appellant on January 4, 1896. That motion was denied, and on an appeal by appellant from the order denying the motion to this court the said order was by this court on May 21, 1898, affirmed. Wheeler v. Eldred, 121 Cal. 28. In the present proceeding no facts or right not existing at the time of the former motion are alleged. On the former motion appellant contended that the court had no discretion in the matter, and that he had the absolute right to an order directing the issuance of the execution. It is also contended by appellant that because on the first motion appellant did not aver that the judgment remained unsatisfied in whole or in part, while he does so aver on the second motion, therefore the former judgment is not a bar; in other words, that the point involved was not adjudicated on the first motion because appellant did not then aver all that he should and could have averred. Under that view, after an adverse judgment, there would be no end to the number of suits which might be maintained on the cause of action already adjudicated. On the former motion the question to be adjudicated was whether appellant was entitled to an order for a writ of execution to issue; and that is the precise question involved in the case at bar. No facts not existing at the time of the former adjudication are averred. The contention of appellant is no stronger than would be the contention of a party that he ought to be allowed to maintain a second suit after judgment had been rendered against him in a former suit on the same cause of action, because on the trial of the first action he had not properly argued his case."

We think that the foregoing excerpt from the case named is decisive of the case at bar. If such motions could be made one after another, without averring or showing new matter or some different issue from that necessarily adjudicated in the proceeding on the first application for the order, there would be no end to such proceedings. So far as the adjudication in a proceeding arising under section 685 carries with it an estoppel, we can perceive no distinction between an order denying a motion for an order directing execution to be issued and an order annulling such an order already made and recalling the execution, as is the case here. It was within the jurisdiction and the discretion of the court to order the execution recalled, and, having exercised its discretion with respect to the first order directing execution to be issued by setting aside said order and recalling the execution issued thereunder, it must be presumed that the court exercised its discretion soundly or upon reasons legally sufficient to support its action.

The order is affirmed.

Henry G. W. Dinkelspiel, of San Francisco, and Casey & Lambert, Hiram E. Casey and L. R. Lambert, all of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

W. F. Cowan, of Santa Rosa, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This appeal is from an order vacating an order for a writ of execution under section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and recalling the execution issued thereon, and denying further process for the enforcement of the judgment.

The history of the litigation is unique and somewhat complicated. Originally, in 1907, the plaintiff, as assignee of a claim against defendant, obtained a judgment by default after personal service of summons in the superior court of Sonoma county for $580.60 and costs. Five years later, the judgment remaining unsatisfied, plaintiff brought action in the same court on the original judgment, in which defendant again defaulted, and a renewal of judgment was obtained for the original amount with accrued interest and costs. Nothing was collected on this judgment, and on October 10, 1918, after the lapse of over five years from date of entry of the last judgment, plaintiff obtained an ex parte order for the issuance of an execution pursuant to the provisions of section 685 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in department 1 of said superior court. Execution was issued and levied upon property of the defendant. Shortly thereafter the defendant, upon notice and affidavits, procured an order of court in department 2 thereof setting aside such former order, execution, and levy. Following this, in August, 1919, plaintiff made a second application in department 1 for issuance of another execution, which order was granted, and execution issued and levied on property of defendant. Defendant again applied in department 2 for an order vacating the order for execution, recalling the second writ and denying further relief under the judgment. This application was granted, and it is from this order that the appeal was taken.

[1] No appeal was taken by plaintiff from the order vacating the first writ of execution, and it is the contention of defendant that this order became final and res judicata in denial of plaintiff's right to enforce its judgment. If such was the result, it is conclusive of the issues on this appeal. The right of the court to recall the execution cannot be doubted if the issuance was improperly or inadvertently made or authority therefor revoked. Buell v. Buell, 92 Cal. 393, 28 Pac. 443; Dorland v. Hanson, 81 Cal. 203, 22 Pac. 552, 15 Am. St. Rep. 44; Francis v. Francis, 192 Mo. App. 710, 179 S. W. 975; Columbia B. L. & S. Ass'n v. Gregory, 129 Ky. 489, 112 S. W. 608.

It therefore becomes necessary to ascertain just what was involved in the first proceeding to quash the execution and the order on which it was based.

The grounds enumerated by defendant in support of this motion were: (1) That the court had no jurisdiction to make an order for issuance of the writ; (2) that the order was made inadavertently; (3) that the levy of the execution worked hardship on defendant; (4) that it was inequitable to permit enforcement because of laches of plaintiff; (5) that there was no consideration for the judgment; (6) that defendant is not legally or morally indebted to plaintiff in excess of the sum of $100; (7) that the amount for which execution is granted is materially in excess of the amount called for by the judgment; (8) that the court had no authority to direct the payment of interest; (9) that no notice of hearing of said application was given; (10) that said order was not issued upon motion or upon supplemental proceedings; (11) that the order was an abuse of discretion of the court.

[2] While some of the grounds given are not tenable as an objection to enforcing the judgment, and one of them contains an admission that some amount is due to plaintiff and unpaid, they are, taken as a whole, sufficient to justify that exercise of discretion which the court undoubtedly has under section 685 in determining whether the judgment may be enforced at all after the lapse of five years. Wheeler v. Eldred, 121 Cal. 28, 53 Pac. 431, 66 Am. St. Rep. 20.

[3] It is true that on an application for such a writ of execution or in proceedings to vacate it the court cannot properly consider defenses to the original action or circumstances leading up to the judgment (Weldon v. Rogers, 159 Cal. 700, 115 Pac. 464), but on this motion matters were presented to the court which, if true, might render an enforcement of the judgment inequitable. The court made two orders on this motion—the first apparently a signed statement reciting the conclusions of the court as to the facts presented and ordering that the motion to set aside the execution be granted; the second, the formal order of the court vacating both the order that execution issue and the execution itself. In the first order, if it may be termed such, the court recites, among other matters, that the order for execution was inadvertently made; "that the judgment was obtained for a bill of millinery, which millinery was destroyed by the fire of April 18, 1906, and that the plaintiff's assignors—plaintiff being merely a collection agency—recovered 90 per cent. of the judgment through insurance"; that "defendant offers to pay $100, which amount is more than the remaining 10 per cent. of the judgment"; that "it would be unconscionable that the plaintiff should have its bill paid twice." The question of laches in enforcing the judgment was also before the court.

[4] The original application for the issuance of execution was made without notice, and the order therefor was apparently made without a showing of meritorious grounds for enforcement of the judgment. It is true that no showing is required under the terms of the statute, and the court had authority to grant the writ on an ex parte motion (Harrier v. Bassford, 145 Cal. 529, 78 Pac. 1038; Doehla v. Phillips, 151 Cal. 488, 91 Pac. 330), but such order was subject to review on motion to vacate the order and recall the execution (Harrier v. Bassford and Doehla v. Phillips, supra).

Such motion to vacate the order and quash the execution was duly made by defendant, on notice to plaintiff and service of affidavits supporting the motion. Plaintiff did not appear to contest the motion or file counter-affidavits.

[5] The order of the court granting this motion was a judgment on the merits as to plaintiff's right to enforce its judgment under the provisions of section 685, as to all grounds presented, or defense thereto open to the plaintiff on such hearing.

The question of plaintiff's right to an execution was clearly before the court on its merits, and, conceding that the court may have committed error in the admission of certain evidence and in considering certain grounds of objection to the original order, which would have called for reversal on appeal, it had jurisdiction to act in the premises, and, the judgment having become final, without appeal or other direct attack, it is conclusive, whether the matter was rightly or wrongly decided, as to all matters presented or which should have been presented on the hearing. Keech v. Beatty, 127 Cal. 177, 59 Pac. 837; Lamb v. Wahlenmaier, 144 Cal. 91, 77 Pac. 765, 103 Am. St. Rep. 66; Curtis v. Upton, 175 Cal. 332, 165 Pac. 935.

The proceedings on the second order granting writ of execution, and order vacating the same, from which latter order this appeal is taken, present no matters supporting plaintiff's right to enforce this judgment which were not or which might not have been presented in the first proceeding. One of the grounds upon which the court vacated this second order for execution, and the writ issued thereon, was that the rights of the plaintiff were concluded by the former proceeding. We think such was the effect of the judgment then made.

The doctrine of res judicata as applied here is set forth, under very similar conditions, in Wheeler v. Eldred, 137 Cal. 37, 69 Pac. 619, where upon a second application for execution under section 685, Code of Civil Procedure, after affirmance on appeal of order denying a previous application, the court says:

"The matter involved here is res adjudicata, and the application is barred by the judgment of the court on a previous similar motion made by appellant on January 4, 1896. That motion was denied, and on an appeal by appellant from the order denying the motion to this court the said order was by this court, on May 21, 1898, affirmed. Wheeler v. Eldred, 121 Cal. 28. In the present proceeding no facts or right not existing at the time of the former motion are alleged. On the former motion appellant contended that the court had no discretion in the matter, and that he had the absolute right to an order directing the issuance of the execution. It is also contended by appellant that because on the first motion appellant did not aver that the judgment remained unsatisfied in whole or in part, while he does so aver on the second motion, therefore the former judgment is not a bar; in other words, that the point involved was not adjudicated on the first motion because appellant did not then aver all that he should and could have averred. Under that view, after an adverse judgment, there would be no end to the number of suits which might be maintained on the cause of action already adjudicated. On the former motion the question to be adjudicated was whether appellant was entitled to an order for a writ of execution to issue; and that is the precise question involved in the case at bar. No facts not existing at the time of the former adjudication are averred. The contention of appellant is no stronger than would be the contention of a party that he ought to be allowed to maintain a second suit after judgment had been rendered against him in a former suit on the same cause of action, because on the trial of the first action he had not properly argued his case."

In applying the doctrine laid down in the preceding citation it is not necessary to go to the extent suggested in that opinion of holding that the ruling on the first motion is an adjudication of all grounds of motion existing at the time such motion was made, since in this case no grounds are presented on the second motion which were not before the court on the first. We therefore merely hold in this instance that the first ruling was conclusive of the issues presented and necessarily involved therein.

A like conclusion was reached on the appeal before us by the appellate court of the Third appellate district, from which this case is before us for rehearing. We agree with the judgment there given.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

KAST v. CALIFORNIA CORPORATION. (S. F. 9270.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 1, 1921.)

1. Attachment ⟸192—Undertaking to release enforceable as common-law bond.

Undertaking given for the release of an attachment held purely a contract between the parties independent of any statute, whereby the surety, for a sufficient consideration—that is, the release of the attachment by the plaintiff—agreed to pay to plaintiff the amount of any judgment that might be recovered by him in the action, being enforceable as a common-law bond.

2. Attachment ⟸192—Statutes held without effect on common-law bond given to secure release.

Neither Code Civ. Proc. § 946, declaring that an appeal does not continue an attachment in force unless an undertaking be executed and filed on the part of the appellant, etc., nor section 553, providing if defendant recovers judgment against plaintiff, and no appeal is perfected and undertaking executed and filed as provided in section 946, all property attached remaining in the sheriff's hands must be delivered to defendant, etc., have any application to or effect upon an undertaking or common-law bond given to secure release of attachment.

3. Attachment ⟸337—No failure of consideration supporting undertaking to release surety.

Where consideration for the giving of bond to release an attachment was the immediate release of defendant's property from the valid attachments previously levied, and in return therefor the property was released by plaintiff, and restored to the dominion and control of defendant, such consideration was fully executed, and there was no failure of consideration to release the surety on such bond or undertaking.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by Marius J. Kast against the California Corporation, named Pacific Surety Company. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Henry Eickhoff, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cooley & Lachmund, of San Francisco, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. The facts in this matter were stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1, as follows:

"This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant in an action brought by the plaintiff to recover upon an undertaking issued by the defendant, as surety, for the purpose of securing the release from attachment of certain property attached in an action entitled Allen v. Chatfield.

"The appeal is on the judgment roll alone; it being agreed that the findings precisely present the facts involved. Allen, as plaintiff, commenced an action in the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, by filing a complaint against Chatfield, to recover the sum of $5,000 with interest and costs. At the time of issuing the summons, Allen procured certain property of Chatfield to be attached by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and by the sheriff of the county of Lake. Chatfield and Allen, by their attorneys, made and carried into effect a mutual agreement pursuant to which Chatfield procured from the Pacific Surety Company, the defendant and respondent in this action, the written undertaking sued on here. Allen, through his attorney, received and accepted the undertaking, and in consideration thereof released the attachment which had theretofore been levied.

"The bond issued by the surety company appears to be in the usual form. It was entitled in the court and cause, and, after reciting the commencement of the action and the issuance of the attachments, continues: 'And whereas the said defendant is desirous of having said property released from said attachment upon the acceptance by plaintiff of this undertaking, in lieu of the attachment effected as aforesaid: Now, therefore, the Pacific Surety Company, * * * in consideration of the release from said attachment of the property attached as above mentioned, does hereby undertake in the sum of six thousand (6,000) and no/100 dollars and promise that, in case the plaintiff recover judgment in the action, defendant will, on demand, pay to plaintiff the amount of whatever judgment may be recovered in said action, together with a percentage or interest and costs.'

"This undertaking, as before stated, was delivered to the attorney for the plaintiff, Allen. It operated to secure the release of the property attached. In arranging for the bond all the steps followed were taken independently of the sheriffs. The whole matter was arranged and carried into effect by and between the parties to the action, through their respective attorneys, without intervention or instrumentality of the court or either of the attaching officers. The undertaking was not given to, or approved by, either of the sheriffs, nor was it received by them, and it was not filed in the action. The sheriffs were not given any information or notice relative to the undertaking until after it had been arranged for and given by the surety company to the plaintiff. Under the personal direction of Allen's attorney, written instructions for the release of the property attached were then delivered to the attorney for Chatfield and were by him delivered to the sheriffs.

"Judgment was thereafter rendered and entered in the action in favor of the defendant Chatfield. * * * Allen at once perfected an appeal to the Supreme Court. He failed, however, to comply with the requirement of section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that an appeal does not continue in force an attachment unless an undertaking be executed and filed on the part of the appellant for that purpose.

"On the appeal Allen was granted a new trial (Allen v. Chatfield, 172 Cal. 60, 156 Pac. 47), and upon the retrial of the action in the lower court judgment was entered in his favor and against Chatfield in the sum of $7,300.50. By various assignments, the plaintiff in this action became the owner of this judgment. He made written demand upon Chatfield and the surety company for payment of the same, which not having been made, and no writ of execution having been issued in the action, he brought this suit against the surety company to recover upon the undertaking.

"The trial court decided that the attachment issued in the action of Allen v. Chatfield was discharged, and the undertaking was released by the judgment in favor of the defendant in that action, and the failure of the plaintiff, Allen, to execute and file the undertaking provided in section 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is the contention of the appellant that the bond in question was a common-law bond, executed directly to the plaintiff as a matter of first intention, and received by him in lieu of the property attached, and therefore not a statutory undertaking subject to the provisions of the Code. Respondent's position is that, regardless of the nature of the bond, whether 'statutory' or 'common-law,' it was an undertaking received in the action and as such released the attached property by operation of the Code sections."

[1] This is a correct summary of the facts and claims of the parties, except for the statement that the bond "appears to be in the usual form." The bond is not in all respects in the form of the statutory bond contemplated by section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, the only section which is claimed to be applicable here; it being obvious that the bond was not one given in pursuance of an order of court under sections 554 and 555, Code of Civil Procedure. Section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, contemplates only a bond given to a sheriff holding a writ of attachment (see Preston v. Hood, 64 Cal. 405, 407, 1 Pac. 487) to prevent a levy by him on property "within his county," or to procure a release of such property by him after levy, when tendered prior to his making a return on the writ (Hesser v. Rowley, 139 Cal. 410, 413, 73 Pac. 156). There is no such thing under section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, as a single bond or undertaking for the release of property situate in different counties, held under levy by different sheriffs, each acting under a writ directed to him alone. See Kanouse v. Brand, 11 Cal. App. 669, 106 Pac. 120. The bond on its face shows that such was the situation here. It further shows on its face that the attachment is to be released only "upon the acceptance by said plaintiff of this undertaking." The bond given to a sheriff under section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, requires no "acceptance" by the plaintiff. The sheriff must accept the same if it is in proper form and the sureties are sufficient, and refrain from making the levy if he has not already made it, or release the property from attachment if he has already made the levy. In the matter of such a bond the defendant is not dealing with the plaintiff at all, but with the officer holding the writ, and in the exercise of rights given him by the statute. The admitted facts, established by the findings, further show that the transaction was one solely between the parties to the action, altogether without reference to the respective sheriffs, and was one looking to the release by the plaintiff of his then existing attachment liens in consideration of the furnishing of security acceptable to him for the payment of whatever judgment might be recovered by him. According to the findings, the bond was procured by Chatfield and delivered by him to Allen "for the purpose of completing said agreement and arrangement between them." It was held in Passow, etc., v. United States, etc., 177 Cal. 40, 42, 170 Pac. 1124, that the mere fact that such a bond is delivered to a plaintiff instead of to the sheriff, and the property thereupon released from atttachment, would not prevent the bond being considered as one given in pursuance of section 540, Code of Civil Procedure, in view of the fact that such delivery may have been "for convenience only," and the property may have been "released by the sheriff in the usual way, as upon the giving of the undertaking provided in section 540," but, in the light of the facts we have stated and what is said in the opinion in the case last cited, it is clear that the undertaking here cannot be regarded as one authorized by or intended by the parties to be given in pursuance of that section. It is conceded that it was not given in pursuance of any other statutory provision relative to attachments. Under these circumstances it must be regarded, in view of the authorities, purely as a contract between the parties entirely independent of any statute, by which the surety, for a sufficient consideration, viz. the release of the attachment by the plaintiff, agreed to pay to the plaintiff the amount of any judgment that might be recovered by him in the action (see Passow, etc., v. United States, etc., Co., supra), and is enforceable as a common-law bond.

This being the situation Allen was entitled to recover upon this bond, unless his right of action thereon was destroyed by his failure, when Chatfield prevailed upon the first trial of the action and he appealed, to give an undertaking for the purpose of continuing the attachment in force pending the appeal. That it was so destroyed is the main contention of defendant. This contention is based on the provision of section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, which declares that "an appeal does not continue in force an attachment, unless an undertaking be executed and filed on the part of the appellant," etc., conditioned that "the appellant will pay all costs and damages which the respondent may sustain by reason of the attachment, in case the order of the court below be sustained," and on section 553, Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that, "if the defendant recovers judgment against the plaintiff, and no appeal is perfected and undertaking executed and filed as provided in section nine hundred and forty-six of this Code, any undertaking received in the action, all the proceeds of sales and money collected by the sheriff, and all the property attached remaining in the sheriff's hands, must be delivered to the defendant or his agent, the order of attachment be discharged, and the property released therefrom." Special reliance is placed upon the claim that the bond here was an "undertaking received in the action," and that by reason of the provision of section 553, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring that "any undertaking received in the action" must be delivered to the defendant under the circumstances therein stated, the undertaking given here was discharged. It is said that the trial court "found" that the bond "was received in said action," but this is not true, as there is no such finding of fact. The specific statement to that effect is contained in the trial court's conclusions of law, and properly so contained; the court having theretofore stated in its findings of fact all the specific facts upon which it based such conclusions of law. Assuming that the provision of section 553 referred to renders worthless "any undertaking received in the action" under the circumstances therein stated, the question whether the undertaking here was one "received in the action" within the meaning of the statute must be determined upon the specific facts found by the trial court.

[2] However liberally we construe the words "any undertaking received in the action," we are satisfied they must be confined to such undertakings as are intended to be given in pursuance of some statutory provision relative to attachments. We can see no good reason for the delivery to the defendant of any undertaking other than one given by the plaintiff as a condition precedent to the issuance of the writ of attachment, and the statute might well be construed as referring to this undertaking, but, however this may be, it certainly was not intended to prohibit the parties to an action from providing by contract between themselves for security for the payment of any judgment that might ultimately be given in an action, altogether regardless of the provisions of our laws relative to attachment. Such an intention to interfere with the right of private contract is not to be attributed to the Legislature in the absence of language clearly compelling it. To our minds the language used compels no such conclusion. The words "any undertaking received in the action" reasonably construed mean at most undertakings of the sort concerning which the Legislature was dealing in its provisions relative to attachment; in other words, undertakings for the giving of which it was making statutory provision. Those were the only undertakings that could be "received in the action," within the meaning of that phrase. It must be conceded, in view of our decisions, that various restrictions upon the right to maintain action upon bonds provided in the chapter of our Code of Civil Procedure relative to attachments have no application to bonds not purporting to be given pursuant to any provision of such statutes. See Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157; Kanouse v. Brand, 11 Cal. App. 669, 106 Pac. 120. See, also, Passow, etc., v. United States, etc., Co., 177 Cal. 31, 170 Pac. 1124. Such bonds, if based on a sufficient consideration, are valid common-law obligations for the payment of money in accordance with the conditions therein expressed, altogether without reference to and independent of the statutory provisions. Whether any liability exists thereon must be determined solely by reference to the provisions of the bond which constitutes the contract between the parties. We are satisfied that neither section 946, Code of Civil Procedure, nor section 553, Code of Civil Procedure, can fairly be held to have any application to or effect upon such a bond. So far as we can see, the expressions in various decisions and text-books relied on by learned counsel for respondent have reference solely to undertakings purporting to be given in pursuance of some statutory provision, and are not applicable under such facts as appear in this case.

[3] There was no failure of consideration.

The consideration for the giving of the bond was the immediate release of Chatfield's property from the valid attachments theretofore levied, and in return therefor the property was released by Allen and restored to the dominion and control of Chatfield. It is a case of a fully executed consideration, of which Chatfield had the full benefit.

In view of our conclusions upon the matters discussed, other points made by respondent are of no moment. Upon the facts found by the trial court plaintiff was entitled to judgment against defendant for the full amount of the bond, with interest thereon from the date of the demand, viz. April 19, 1918.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to the trial court to enter judgment upon the findings already made in favor of plaintiff and against defendant for the sum of $6,000, with interest at the legal rate thereon from April 19, 1918.

MILLER v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (RIDEOUT et al., Interveners). (L. A. 6517.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸272—Under charter empowering city to purchase property necessary to furnish light, etc., city could purchase electric energy for distribution.

Los Angeles Charter, art. 1, § 2, subd. 7, empowering the city to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, all property necessary or convenient to furnish the city and its inhabitants with light, heat, and power, even if such provision is to be strictly construed, authorizes the city to make a contract for the purchase of electric energy sufficient to supply its inhabitants, though such energy is not, strictly speaking, property, especially in view of article 18, § 192, subd. (g), authorizing the acquisition of all property necessary for the maintenance of electric light system, and section 2, subd. 50, giving the city the powers which a municipal corporation might exercise under the state Constitution.

2. Electricity ⟸11—City held authorized to contract for sale of surplus electricity to corporation for distribution outside city.

Under Los Angeles Charter, art. 1, § 2, subd. 7, 17, 50, authorizing the city to sell electric current and all products of any public utility operated by it, the provision of subdivision 41, that no electric power shall be sold to a corporation for resale or distribution without the assent of the voters, is only a limitation upon the power, not a denial thereof, so that the city may sell its surplus electric current to a corporation for distribution outside the city, if the contract has been approved by the voters.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸867(2)—Contract to purchase electric distributing system without assuming indebtedness need not be submitted to voters.

Under Los Angeles Charter, § 2, subd. 7, par. (d), empowering the city to purchase public utility property, and in another sentence providing that it may acquire the utility subject to any outstanding indebtedness, but no such contract shall be valid unless approved by the electors, the requirement for approval applies only in case the contract assumes an existing indebtedness, so that the provision will not conflict with Const. art. 11, § 6, forbidding incurring of an indebtedness without such approval, especially when other later provisions of the same paragraph expressly stated that they referred to both kinds of contracts.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Abner Miller against the City of Los Angeles and others, in which Mary Rideout and Mary H. Morgan intervened and joined with plaintiff in seeking to enjoin the performance of a contract. Judgment for the defendants, and the intervener Mary H. Morgan appeals. Affirmed.

Overton, Lyman & Plumb and Wm. B. Himrod, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Gilroy & Little and H. C. Beach, all of Los Angeles, for respondent Miller.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., of Los Angeles, W. B. Mathews, Ray C. Eberhard, and Lewis E. Whitehead, all of Los Angeles, for respondents City of Los Angeles and others.

Edgar G. Pratt, of Los Angeles (Henry M. Willis, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent Rideout.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for defendants in a taxpayers' action against the city of Los Angeles to enjoin the carrying out of a contract of date May 26, 1919, between the Southern California Edison Company, a corporation, on the one part, and the city of Los Angeles, on the other.

The contract is one whereby, first, the California Edison Company agrees to sell to the city of Los Angeles, and the city agrees to buy, the entire electric distributing system of the company within the corporate limits of the city at a price of $11,000,000; secondly, the contract contains a further provision that the city shall purchase from the company during a period of 30 years all electric energy necessary for distribution to its consumers on the municipal system in excess of that produced by the power generating plants owned and operated by the city; and, thirdly, the contract contains a provision that the company shall have the right for a period of 15 years to purchase from the city all surplus electric power produced at the city's generating plants and not necessary for distribution to the consumers on the city's distributing system, or for sale to the city of Pasadena for distribution and use within that city.

Other phrases of this contract were originally involved in the action, but the three propositions above referred to are all that remain in controversy on this appeal.

The moving parties to the action in the lower court were the plaintiff and two interveners, appearing separately as individual citizens and taxpayers, in opposition to the contract. Judgment was for the defendant as against plaintiff and both interveners. Only the intervener Mary H. Morgan has appealed, and her attack is upon the general provisions of the contract above stated and presents the following three grounds of opposition: First, that the city has no power to purchase electricity in bulk and resell and distribute the same to its inhabitants; second, that the city has no power to sell electricity to the Southern California Edison Company for resale and distribution by that company to consumers outside of the city of Los Angeles; third, the contract of purchase has never been approved by a majority of voters of the city of Los Angeles.

The provision of the contract against which the first objection is directed is contained in subdivision 7 thereof, as follows:

"Seventh. The company shall sell, furnish, and deliver to the city, and the city shall purchase and take from the company, * * * electric energy as follows, to wit:

"(a) All electric energy which the city shall require each year for and during the period of 10 years from and after the date of the transfer and delivery to the city of said properties of the company, * * * in order to supply consumers served by the city for use within the limits of the city, as aforesaid, in excess of the amount which the city shall generate at hydro-electric plants now or hereafter owned or controlled by it. * * *

"(b) All electric energy which the city shall require each year for and during a period of 20 years immediately succeeding the aforesaid 10-year period, in order to supply consumers served by it for use within the limits of the city, as aforesaid, in excess of the amount which the city shall generate at electric plants of any kind now or hereafter owned or controlled by it. * * *"

Appellant claims that while the city of Los Angeles, under certain provisions of its charter, has authority to acquire, by purchase or otherwise, the necessary plants, machinery, and equipment for manufacturing and distributing electric light and energy for the use of the municipality and its inhabitants, it is without power to purchase the manufactured article in quantity for such use and distribution.

It is contended by respondent that authority exists for such purchase of electric energy in bulk under subdivision 7, section 2, of article 1, of the Los Angeles city charter. That section provides that the city shall have the right and power—

"to acquire by purchase, condemnation, lease, gift, or otherwise, or to construct, extend, maintain, and operate, within or without the city limits, any and all plants and property necessary or convenient for furnishing the city and its inhabitants * * * with * * * light, heat, power, or any other public service."

Stripping this section of the charter of all expressions nonessential to the point in controversy, respondent would have it read thus:

The city shall have the right and power "to acquire by purchase * * * or otherwise * * * any and all property necessary or convenient to furnish the city and its inhabitants * * * with * * * light, heat, power."

In a broad analysis of the term it can hardly be disputed that electrical energy as manufactured and supplied for public and private use is property. Electricity is rather an intangible asset, and the word "property" is perhaps not the most apt word by which to describe the supply of electrical energy thus sought to be acquired for the use of the city. However, if it was a water supply to be delivered from without to the mains of the city's distributing system, it might appropriately be so described, and an electric current to be delivered at the main conduit of the city's electrical distributing system is not essentially different.

[1] Conceding the limitations of the powers of a municipality to such as are expressly granted or necessarily implied from powers expressly given, and that language purporting to define the powers of a municipality is to be strictly construed (Oro Elec. Corp. v. R. R. Commission, 169 Cal. 466, 147 Pac. 118; Hyatt v. Williams, 148 Cal. 585, 84 Pac. 41; Wichmann v. City of Placerville, 147 Cal. 162, 81 Pac. 537; 1 Dillon, Munic. Corp. [5th Ed.], par. 237), we have here an express authority granted under the city charter to acquire and distribute such property as is necessary or convenient for supplying the city and its inhabitants with light, heat, power, or any other public service, and, this general purpose being express and definite, the means for carrying it into effect is within the reasonable discretion of the city authorities.

Counsel for appellant contend that this authority is not general but special and limited; that it is confined by the use of the terms "plants and property" to an equipment for manufacturing its own supply of electrical energy; and they call attention to the more general provision as it existed under an earlier expression of this same section of the charter, where the city was in terms given power "to provide for supplying the city and its inhabitants with water, gas, and electricity, or any thereof." Under the amendment of 1913 this general clause was eliminated and the section re-enacted as hereinbefore quoted, thereby, as appellant claims, restricting the general power of the city. There are other sections of the charter, however, that seem to supply this general authority or at least to justify the broader interpretation of subdivision 7 of section 2 of article 1, claimed by the respondent. Subdivision (g) of section 192, article 18, after authorizing the board of public service commissioners to construct, operate, maintain, and extend electric plants, systems, and equipments, declares that said board shall have power "to acquire and take, by purchase, lease, condemnation, or otherwise, and in its own name to hold as special trustee for the city, any and all property situated within or without the limits of the city that may be necessary or convenient for such construction, operation, maintenance, or extension." Subdivision 50 of section 2 of the charter contains this general rider, apparently intended to cover all contingencies in the way of acquiring and operating municipal utilities:

"The city of Los Angeles shall have, and it is hereby given and it hereby reserves unto itself, and the people of the city hereby reserve unto it, and the people of the state of California hereby grant unto it, and said city may hereafter exercise, each and every of the powers which a municipal corporation might or could exercise under the Constitution of the state of California; and said city may hereafter acquire, own, hold, sell, deal in, manage, operate, or control any office, department, business, enterprise, utility, or property which might or could be acquired, owned, held, sold, dealt in, managed, operated, or controlled by any person, firm, or corporation whatsoever; provided, that under the authorization of this subdivision the city of Los Angeles shall not engage in any purely commercial or industrial enterprise not now engaged in by the city, except on the approval of a majority of the electors voting thereon at an election. By the insertion in this charter of the sentence next preceding the present sentence, the city of Los Angeles and the people thereof intend, and the people of the state of California, acting by and through the Legislature thereof in ratifying this charter, intend, that the said sentence shall be, and is hereby declared to be, an express grant of the powers referred to therein, without a more specific enumeration or designation."

The power here sought to be exercised is to purchase from sources without the city such amount of electrical energy to be supplied for distribution through its own distributing system as may be required to supplement the product of the city's own generating plants. We are of the opinion that such a contract as is here involved constitutes, under the terms of the charter, a purchase of property necessary or convenient for furnishing the city and its inhabitants with an authorized public service.

The convenience and economy of public service which is thus secured by a contract providing against any deficiency in the supply of electricity for public use would seem to be further served by an arrangement for the sale to a public service corporation outside the city of any surplus electrical energy the city may from time to time have on hand after supplying all its municipal demands and private or municipal customers. Such is the purpose of the provision of the contract between the city of Los Angeles and the Southern California Edison Company, against which appellant's second objection is directed.

It is declared by section 9 of the contract that, if at any time within 15 years after the contract goes into effect the city shall generate a surplus of electric energy in excess of the amount required to supply the city of Los Angeles and its consumers in such city and in the city of Pasadena, it may sell, during such period, such surplus to the Southern California Edison Company on terms to be fixed by the proper authorities. It is further provided by the contract that the agreement shall not become effective until the same is approved by the railroad commission of California, and until the provisions for sale of such surplus shall have been assented to by two-thirds of the qualified voters of said city voting on the proposition at a general or special election.

The contention of appellant is that the city of Los Angeles, under its charter, has no authority to dispose of its surplus electrical power for resale or distribution excepting to other municipal corporations.

[2] Subdivision 7 of section 2, article 1, of the charter, however, provides generally that the city shall have power "to sell the products or service" of any utilities described in that subdivision. Subdivision 17 of section 2 grants power "to sell gas, electric current, and all products of any public utility operated by the city." Subdivision 50 of section 2, hereinbefore quoted, declares that said "city may hereafter acquire, hold, sell * * * any business enterprise, utility, or property," and further sets forth that such provision "is an express grant of the powers referred to therein without a more specific enumeration or designation."

In the light of this general grant of power to sell we are of the opinion that the other charter provisions relied upon by appellant as a negation of such power are only a limitation to the extent that they impose certain conditions upon certain sales.

Subdivision 41 of section 2 declares that—

"No electric power now or hereafter owned or controlled by the city shall ever be sold, transferred, leased, or disposed of to any person or corporation for resale, rental, disposal, or distribution to consumers or other persons without the assent of two-thirds of the qualified voters of said city."

It is then provided by this section of the charter that the provision just quoted shall not apply to the ordinary sale of electric power to consumers in or out of the city for their own use, "or to other municipal corporations for municipal use or for resale and disposal by such municipal corporations to consumers within such municipality."

The reference, in the first sentence quoted, to disposal of electric power to "corporations for resale, rental, disposal, or distribution to consumers," cannot be construed to refer to municipal corporations, but is obviously a limitation of a general power to sell to private corporations, by requiring such sale to be first approved by a two-thirds vote of the people. Read in connection with the general power to sell utilities, products, or service, heretofore cited, we think this provision of subdivision 4 establishes authority under the charter to make the sale here contracted for; it appearing by the record that such proposition was submitted at an election held for that purpose and approved by two-thirds of the voters.

The validity of this election was upheld in a contest in the superior court of Los Angeles county, which judgment is now affirmed by the decision of this court. Rideout v. City of Los Angeles (L. A. 6500) decided March 31, 1921, 197 Pac. 74.

[3] The third contention of appellant is that the contract for the purchase of the distributing system of the Edison Company within the city of Los Angeles is void because it has never been submitted to or approved by a majority of the qualified electors of the city. Respondents deny that such a submission and approval is required by the charter. The decision on this point depends entirely upon the construction of paragraph (d) of subdivision 7 of section 2 of the charter. By this provision the city is empowered:

"To enter into a contract with the owner of any public utility held or operated under franchise rights acquired prior to the adoption of this charter by the terms of which contract the city may * * * agree to purchase all or any part of the property of such utility upon paying therefor a price to be paid in accordance with the terms of the contract."

Thus far this power of contract stands unrestricted. Immediately following the sentence just quoted, however, it is further declared:

"Such contract may provide that the city may acquire the utility subject to all or any portion of the outstanding indebtedness against the same, within the limitations above prescribed, but no such contract shall be valid until it is approved by a majority of the qualified electors of the city voting thereon at an election."

The question in dispute is as to whether this requirement, for submission to a vote of the electors, applies alone to "such contract" providing that the city shall purchase the utility "subject to its outstanding indebtedness," or whether it also governs the general power contained in the first sentence of paragraph (d) to contract and purchase at a fixed price.

Considering the fact that the requirement for an election is part of the same sentence with the authorization to enter into a contract of purchase subject to outstanding indebtedness, the logical and grammatical interpretation would be to apply the election requirement solely to this form of purchase. This construction is also supported by the fact that further modifying provisions of paragraph (d), which obviously relate to either form of contract, are set out in separate sentences, and contain words of inclusion showing their general application. These remaining provisions of paragraph (d) are as follows:

"The financial obligation assumed by the city under any such contract shall not be subject to the debt limitation [of the city] until the purchase is actually consummated, and then may be exempted by ordinance approved by a majority of the electors voting at an election, from such limitation, if the state railroad commission shall determine that the utility is self-sustaining."

"The provisions of the contract in this paragraph (d) mentioned need not include any, and the sale contract shall not be subject, as to the price to be paid thereunder, to any limitation prescribed in section 2 of this charter of which section this paragraph (d) is a part."

"Nothing in any such contract contained shall operate to extend the term of any franchise of any utility therein mentioned."

The reason for subjecting a contract which assumes an outstanding indebtedness to the approval of the voters is the fact that it might otherwise come in conflict with the provisions of section 6, article 11, of the Constitution, forbidding without such approval the incurring of an indebtedness exceeding the yearly income of the municipality.

In the second sentence of this paragraph above quoted the words "within the limitations above prescribed" refer back to a preceding paragraph (a), which limits the indebtedness of a utility that the city may take over to an amount not exceeding the purchase price to be paid by the city, and the subsequent references to exemption from limitation of indebtedness by approval of the voters upon determination of the railroad commission relate back to paragraph (c) of the section, which provides for such action whenever the public utility purchased shall be determined by the railroad commission to be self-sustaining and the exemption is approved by a majority vote of the electors.

The whole paragraph is sufficiently ambiguous and confusing, but it does not appeal to us as a reasonable construction that these words requiring ratification by an election should have been coupled with and limited to a separate sentence with an entirely separate and distinct form of contract of purchase, if it was intended thereby to govern the entire subject-matter of the subdivision.

Another circumstance is that the city of Los Angeles, under the powers enumerated in section 2 of the charter, is authorized to purchase lands, rights, and properties, to purchase, lease, condemn, or otherwise construct, own, maintain, and equip telephone systems, telegraph systems, street railways, steamboats, and other means of conveyance, improve, maintain, and control its water fronts and harbors, build wharves, acquire and operate warehouses, bunkers, wharves, and dry docks, and engage in numerous other enterprises which would involve great expenditures, without submitting the question of such expenditure to a vote of the electors.

There is no reason, in the nature of the transaction covered by this subsection of the charter, why the requirement for approval by the electors which, under the ordinary grammatical construction of the language used, would seem to be limited to such contracts as involve an assumption of outstanding indebtedness of the utility purchased, should be extended by implication to an ordinary purchase of a public utility on a cash basis and within the means of the city, more than to the numerous other contracts and purchases authorized without such restrictions.

The judgment is affirmed.

PULLMAN CO. v. RICHARDSON, State Treasurer.

HINES, Director General of Railroads, et al. v. SAME.

(S. F. 9080–9085, 9183.)

1. Commerce ⟸72—Taxes based on gross receipts of palace car company are "property taxes."

The taxes upon the property of a palace car company at the rate of 3 and 4 per cent. of the gross receipts from business transacted in the state of California, levied under Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended in 1910, and statutes passed pursuant thereto, are "property taxes," and not taxes on gross receipts derived from interstate taxes.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Property Tax.]

2. Taxation ⟸390(2)—Earnings derived from palace car company's property proper for consideration as basis on which to establish value of property.

As a basis on which to establish the value of a palace car company's property in California for purposes of taxation under Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended in 1910, and statutes passed pursuant thereto, it is proper to consider the earnings derived from its property tangible and intangible within the state, and proper to consider the proportion of its receipts derived from its interstate business earned within the state as an element of that business.

3. Commerce ⟸72—Constitutional system for apportionment of interstate earnings does not assert jurisdiction over earnings from interstate business.

System adopted by Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended in 1910, for the apportionment of interstate earnings of a palace car company for purposes of assessment of its property for taxation, does not assert jurisdiction over any earnings from interstate business not actually derived from the portion of such business conducted within the state, and does not draw from its earnings derived from capital or property situated elsewhere.

4. Commerce ⟸72—Reports of board of equalization held not to show tax on property of palace car company was on gross receipts derived in part from interstate commerce.

Reports of state board of equalization and assessment by them of palace car company's property pursuant to Const. art. 13, § 14, as amended in 1910, and statutes thereunder, held not to show that the tax levied on the company's property at the rate of 3 and 4 per cent. on the gross receipts from its business transacted in the state was a tax on gross receipts derived in part from interstate commerce, and not a property tax.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Actions by the Pullman Company, a corporation, and by Walker D. Hines, as Director General of Railroads, and the Pullman Company, against Friend W. Richardson, as treasurer of the State of California. From judgments for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Coogan, Burke Corbet, and Corbet & Selby, all of San Francisco (F. B. Daniels, and G. S. Fernald, both of Chicago, Ill., of counsel), for appellants.

U. S. Webb and Raymond Benjamin, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff brought seven separate suits for the purpose of recovering from the Treasurer of the State of California taxes paid by it under protest. The taxes were levied at the rate of either 3 or 4 per cent. upon the gross receipts from the business of the plaintiff transacted in the state of California. The rate is fixed and the tax authorized by section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution of California, amended in 1910, and statutes passed in pursuance thereof. Approximately 50 per cent. of the gross revenue of the plaintiff corporation in California consists of returns from the interstate business of the plaintiff corporation. The amount of the California revenue derived from interstate business is ascertained by apportioning to the business in the state of California the proportion of the fare derived from each item of the business of the plaintiff, into, out of, and through the state of California, which the mileage traveled by the passenger in California bears to the total mileage traveled by him upon his ticket, and by adding these several amounts to ascertain the total amount of gross receipts for the year for such business. These amounts were furnished to the state board of equalization, and are as follows:

Year	Intrastate Business	Interstate Business	Total Business	Rate	Total Tax	Amount Plaintiff Seeks to Recover
1912	$ 938,786.80	$ 966,516.17	$1,905,302.97	3%	$57,159.08	$28,995.48
1913	1,000,963.16	953,036.44	1,953,999.60	3%	58,619.98	28,591.09
1914	1,124,877.77	956,213.61	2,081,091.38	4%	83,243.66	38,248.55
1915	1,196,719.76	1,004,681.57	2,201,401.33	4%	88,056.06	40,187.26
1916	998,330.30	855,072.22	1,853,402.52	4%	73,209.40	33,811.67
1918	1,214,463.33	1,182,424,90	2,396,888.23	4%	94,677.08	46,705.78

In considering the effect of this method of apportionment of the passenger fares derived from interstate business, it should be observed in passing that, if the rates of the plaintiff corporation for long interstate hauls are less proportionately per mile than for shorter hauls in intrastate business, it follows that if two passengers proceed from San Francisco to the state line at Yuma, one going to New York or Boston by the way of New Orleans and the other stopping at the state line, the amount of fare apportioned to the state of California would be less in the case of the traveler who is going to Boston or New York than in the case of the one who stops at the state line. If the state is entitled to levy a tax in the manner adopted, this would seem to be the fairest method of apportioning the receipts of an interstate common carrier. If the same system was adopted in all the states traversed by the carrier, the sum of the amounts thus apportioned to the several states would be equal to the gross receipts of the carrier derived from such interstate commerce.

Appellant's contention is that a tax upon the gross receipts derived from interstate commerce is in violation of the federal Constitution giving Congress the power to regulate interstate commerce, and for that reason seeks to recover the proportion of the tax which is based upon the gross receipts derived from interstate commerce.

It is apparently conceded by the appellant that the gross receipts of a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce can be considered as a basis in a bona fide effort to determine the value of the carrier's property within the state, and that if the value so derived from the consideration of these gross receipts from interstate commerce and from intrastate commerce is the fair valuation of the property within the state subject to taxation that the tax is valid. If not so conceded, it is clear that such a tax is valid. Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 24 Sup. Ct. 107, 48 L. Ed. 229.

The section of the California Constitution authorizing and levying the tax declares that it is a property tax in lieu of all other taxes, state, county, and municipal, and if this declaration is a true statement of the fact, it is undoubtedly true that the method is unobjectionable. The Constitution, after enumerating the various companies which are required to pay the tax levied under its provision, requires that—

They "(a) * * * shall annually pay to the state a tax upon their franchises, roadways, roadbeds, rails, rolling stock, poles, wires, pipes, canals, conduits, rights of way, and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state, computed as follows: Said tax shall be equal to the percentages hereinafter fixed upon the gross receipts from operation of such companies and each thereof within this state. * * * Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated of such companies except as otherwise in this section provided. * * * All property enumerated in subdivision a [supra], b and d of this section shall be subject to taxation, in the manner provided by law, to pay the principal and interest of any bonded indebtedness created and outstanding by any city, city and county, county, town, township or district, before the adoption of this section. The taxes so paid for principal and interest on such bonded indebtedness shall be deducted from the total amount paid in taxes for state purposes. * * *"

[1] The question as to whether or not the taxes levied by section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution, are taxes upon property rather than upon receipts or income has several times been considered by this court, and in each instance it has been declared to be essentially a property tax.

The opinion in City & County of San Francisco v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 Pac. 971, gives a history of the enactment of section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution, to which we refer without repeating the same herein. With reference to the nature of the tax it was therein stated:

"The appellant's contention, briefly stated, is that the constitutional provision relieves the companies named from no burden except that of taxes upon the property theretofore enumerated, and that the charge imposed by the ordinance is a business or occupation tax, and not a tax upon property at all, and therefore not covered by the so-called exemption. The respondent, on the other hand, claims that under a fair reading of the constitutional amendment, the liability of a telephone company to pay a percentage of its gross receipts was designed to exclude the power of the state, or of any county or municipality, to exact from it any further revenue (except as stated in the proviso above quoted) whether by way of a direct tax upon its property or in the guise of a license fee upon its business. * * *

"The percentages enumerated in the amendment are declared to be 'in lieu of all other taxes,' etc., and such percentages were, doubtless, fixed at higher rates than would have been adopted in the absence of a restriction on other taxation. These considerations are of weight in determining the rule of interpretation by which the provision regarding freedom from other taxation is to be read. * * *

"For these reasons we agree with the conclusion of the learned trial judge that the taxes imposed by the amendment supersede, not only other taxes upon property, but also license fees like those exacted by the ordinance of the city and county. This result, it seems to us, not only accords with the language of the part of the amendment defining the tax, but is in harmony with the apparent purpose and scope of the new system of taxation created by the amendment."

In the opinion in the case of Lake Tahoe Ry., etc., Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 551, 143 Pac. 786, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1196, it is said:

"The fact that these manifest contingencies have not been provided for by law is additional evidence that the framers of the Constitution meant what they said, namely: That only property used exclusively, or only a severable part of property used exclusively in the operation of the business of the company, should be included in the list of property whose sole and only tax is covered by the gross revenue percentage, and that the earnings of other properties not so exclusively used in whole or in part are not an element in the admeasurement of this tax." (Italics ours.)

In the opinion in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Roberts, 168 Cal. 420, 143 Pac. 700, additional history of the constitutional amendment is set out on page 424 of 168 Cal. on page 701 of 143 Pac., to which we refer, and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject are thus summarized:

"Without pausing here to review the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon the question, but contenting ourselves with a subsequent reference to some of them, it may be said that the conclusions of the Supreme Court were that property used in the public service frequently acquired a value in the use, which value was something greater than the value of the property not engaged in such use; that by the systemization and unification of such properties in use they in the aggregate acquired a special value by virtue of this unity of use; that this special value was in the nature of property; that a fair tax upon gross earnings bore such a relation to the values of these properties under their unity of use as to justify such a tax upon revenue as being a legal and commutated or substituted tax for other taxes which were or might have been levied. Maine v. Grand Trunk Ry., 142 U. S. 217 (35 L. Ed. 994, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 121); Cleveland & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439 (38 L. Ed. 1041, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1122); Erie Ry. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 440 (39 L. Ed. 1046, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 900); Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194 (41 L. Ed. 683, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305); United States Express Co. v. Minnesota, 223 U. S. 335 (56 L. Ed. 459, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 211).

"So much for the justness and reasonableness and legality of the new method. * * *"

While we have not heretofore considered the proposition from the standpoint of its relation to interstate commerce, it is clear from the foregoing that this court has always considered the tax to be in fact what it purports to be, namely, a tax upon the property of the company as it is described in the Constitution and with more particularity in the assessment by the state board of equalization.

The validity of such a tax from the standpoint of the interstate commerce clause of the federal Constitution, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, received careful consideration from the commissioners, who were appointed to formulate and report upon the proposed system of taxation. Before the appointment of these commissioners, in pursuance of an act of the Legislature authorizing such a body to be formed, the Supreme Court of the United States in a number of cases had considered whether or not certain forms of state legislation authorizing the taxation of interstate commerce transportation companies was a valid exercise of the power of the state. The reports of the commission show that these cases were considered by them in formulating their plan of taxation and that an effort was made to conform to the then latest expression of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the subject. A quotation from Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 24 Sup. Ct. 107, 48 L. Ed. 229, supra, decided in 1903, will indicate the principle upon which the tax commission relied in the drafting of the constitutional amendment, which was afterwards submitted to the state Legislature and by the Legislature submitted to the people for adoption. The court was considering the validity of a statute of Michigan levying a specific tax upon the property and business of every railroad corporation operated in the state. That statute provided that—

"When the railroad lies partly within and partly without this state, prima facie, the gross income of said company from such road for the purposes of taxation shall be on the actual earnings of the road in Michigan, computed by adding to the income derived from the business transacted by said company entirely within this state, such proportion of the income of said company arising from the interstate business as the length of the road over which said interstate business is carried in this state bears to the entire length of the road over which said interstate business is carried."

The court in disposing of the contention that the statute was an invalid interference with interstate commerce said:

"We need say but a word in answer to the suggestion that the tax is an unconstitutional interference with interstate commerce. In form the tax is a tax on 'the property and business of such railroad corporation operated within the state,' computed upon certain percentages of gross income. The prima facie measure of the plaintiff's gross income is substantially that which was approved in Maine v. Grand Trunk Railway Co., 142 U. S. 217, 228. See also Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Taggart, 163 U. S. 1. Decree affirmed."

A decision (Galveston, Harrisburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 28 Sup. Ct. 638, 52 L. Ed. 1031) rendered later (1907) was also available before the Legislature or the people finally acted upon the proposed plan of taxation. In that case it was said:

"So it has been held that a tax on the property and business of a railroad operated within the state might be estimated prima facie by gross income, computed by adding to the income derived from business within the state the proportion of interstate business equal to the proportion between the road over which the business was carried within the state to the total length of the road over which it was carried. (Wisconsin and Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379.)"

Of course, the fact that the constitutional provision assailed by the appellant purports to levy a tax upon the property and to consider the gross receipts solely as a basis for the valuation thereof, is not necessarily determinative of the question, however persuasive and definite such a declaration may be.

The question as to whether or not a particular taxing law violates the federal Constitution depends upon the practical operation and the effect of the tax imposed and not upon the definitions or declarations of the state authorities. The rule is thus stated in the recent case of Shaffer v. Carter, 252 U. S. 37, 40 Sup. Ct. 221, 64 L. Ed. 445:

"For, where the question is whether a state taxing law contravenes rights secured by that instrument, the decision must depend not upon any mere question of form, construction, or definition, but upon the practical operation and effect of the tax imposed. (St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 362; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, 237; Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U. S. 292, 294; American Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, 250 U. S. 459, 463.) The practical burden of a tax imposed upon the net income derived by a nonresident from a business carried on within the state certainly is no greater than that of a tax upon the conduct of the business, and this the state has the lawful power to impose, as we have seen."

To the same effect is the case of American Mfg. Co. v. St. Louis, 250 U. S. 459, 39 Sup. Ct. 522, 63 L. Ed. 1084, where it is said:

"As a matter of construction, this, upon familiar principles, is conclusive upon us. But, as has been held very often, the question whether a state law or a tax imposed thereunder deprives a party of rights secured by the federal Constitution depends not upon the form of the act, nor upon how it is construed or characterized by the state court, but upon its practical operation and effect. (St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350-362; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S. 219, 237; Crew Levick Co. v. Pennsylvania, 245 U. S. 292, 294.)"

Before considering the effect of our new constitutional scheme of taxation upon interstate commerce, we cite some of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the subject, rendered since the system was adopted by this state. The decision of that court in Union Tank Line Co. v. Wright, 249 U. S. 275, 39 Sup. Ct. 276, 63 L. Ed. 602, dealt with a statute of Georgia wherein that state had provided for the levying of a tax upon the interstate commerce of the Union Tank Line Company, based upon the proportion that the miles in Georgia over which the cars of that company moved bore to the total miles so traversed in all the states. It is to be observed that the plan did not consider "cars mileage," or "ton mileage," or "receipts," or "revenue," either gross or net, for such haulage, as is pointed out in the opinion holding the tax invalid, from which we quote as follows:

"A state may not tax property belonging to a foreign corporation which has never come within its borders—to do so under any formula would violate the due process clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In so far, however, as movables are regularly and habitually used and employed therein, they may be taxed by the state according to their fair value along with other property subject to its jurisdiction, although devoted to interstate commerce. While the valuation must be just it need not be limited to mere worth of the articles considered separately but may include as well 'the intangible value due to what we have called the organic relation of the property in the state to the whole system.' How to appraise them fairly when the tangibles constitute part of a going concern operating in many states often presents grave difficulties; and absolute accuracy is generally impossible. We have accordingly sustained methods of appraisement producing results approximately correct—for example, the mileage basis in case of a telegraph company (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Massachusetts), and the average amount of property habitually brought in and carried out by a car company (American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Hall). But if the plan pursued is arbitrary and the consequent valuation grossly excessive it must be condemned because of conflict with the commerce clause or the Fourteenth Amendment or both. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Massachusetts, 125 U. S. 530; Marye v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 117; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 26; Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194; s. c., 166 U. S. 185; American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Hall, 174 U. S. 70; Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Lynch, 177 U. S. 149; Fargo v. Hart, 193 U. S. 490; Cudahy Packing Co. v. Minnesota, 246 U. S. 450, 453.)

"In the present case the comptroller general made no effort to assess according to real value or otherwise than upon the ratio which miles of railroad in Georgia over which the cars moved bore to total mileage so traversed in all states. Real values—the essential aim—of property within a state cannot be ascertained with even approximate accuracy by such process; the rule adopted has no necessary relation thereto. During a year two or three cars might pass over every mile of railroad in one state while hundreds constantly employed in another moved over lines of less total length. Fifty-seven was the average number of cars within Georgia during 1913 and each had a 'true' value of $830. Thus the total there subject to taxation amounted to $47,310—the challenged assessment specified $291,196. * * *

"Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, supra, relied on by defendant in error, contains the following passage which seems to uphold the Georgia rule: 'The mode which the state of Pennsylvania adopted, to ascertain the proportion of the company's property upon which it should be taxed in that state, was by taking as a basis of assessment such proportion of the capital stock of the company as the number of miles over which it ran cars within the state bore to the whole number of miles, in that and other states, over which its cars were run. This was a just and equitable method of assessment; and, if it were adopted by all the states through which these cars ran, the company would be assessed upon the whole value of its capital stock, and no more.' But the point therein spoken of was unnecessary to determination of the cause; and so far as the quoted passage sanctions the specified rule for ascertaining values as generally appropriate, just, unobjectionable and productive of conclusive results, it must be regarded as obiter dictum, and we cannot now approve or follow it." (Italics ours.)

It is worthy of note that three members of the Supreme Court considered that even this method of assessment was a valid exercise of the state taxing power as theretofore determined by the Supreme Court. The opinion of the minority is thus stated by Mr. Justice Pitney, Mr. Justice Brandeis and Mr. Justice Clarke concurring:

"The Supreme Court of Georgia sustained the tax on the authority of numerous decisions of this court, cited for the purpose. (143 Georgia, 765; 146 Georgia, 489.) This court reverses the judgment, and holds the taxing law unconstitutional, upon reasoning to which I am unable to yield assent.

"In my opinion the Georgia system of taxing movable property of this character when habitually employed in the state, and the decision of the state Supreme Court sustaining the particular taxes in question, are based upon a correct view of the powers of the state under the federal Constitution, and are in entire harmony with principles laid down in authoritative decisions of this court which have remained unchallenged for more than a quarter of a century. (Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Massachusetts, 125 U. S. 530, 552; Marye v. Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., 127 U. S. 117, 123; Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18, 22, 26, et seq.; Cleveland, etc., Ry. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 445; Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Taggart, 163 U. S. 1, 14; Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194, 221; s. c., 166 U. S. 185; American Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Hall, 174 U. S. 70, 75, et seq.; Union Refrigerator Transit Co. v. Lynch, 177 U. S. 149, 152; Cudahy Packing Co. v. Minnesota, 246 U. S. 450, 453.)"

The appellant relies very strongly upon a recent decision of that court, Galveston, Harrisburg, etc., Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 28 Sup. Ct. 638, 52 L. Ed. 1031, in which a tax of 1 per cent. of their gross receipts is levied upon all railroads operating in the state. The tax was held invalid. As we understand the main opinion in that case, the court concluded that the Texas statute taxed all revenue of such interstate commerce carrier actually received within the state without regard to the proportion earned in the state, although in some cases the larger part of their gross receipts is derived from the carriage of passengers and freight coming from, or destined to, other points without the state. The tax was regarded by the majority of that court as a tax upon the gross receipts derived from interstate commerce, and in addition to ad valorem taxes upon a valuation of their property "taken as a going concern." The minority of the court, Mr. Justice Harlan, Mr. Chief Justice Fuller, Mr. Justice White, and Mr. Justice McKenna, held that the tax should be sustained as an occupation tax, levied by the state law as interpreted by the Supreme Court of Texas as applicable only to the proportion of the interstate commerce gross receipts, apportioned to the mileage traveled thereby in Texas, in proportion to the total mileage traveled. The main opinion recognizes and is based upon the principles of such taxation theretofore established, and relied upon by the people of this state in adopting the new method of taxation, as will be apparent from the following quotation therefrom:

"It being once admitted, as of course it must be, that not every law that affects commerce among the states is a regulation of it in a constitutional sense, nice distinctions are to be expected. Regulation and commerce among the states both are practical rather than technical conceptions, and, naturally, their limits must be fixed by practical lines. As the property of companies engaged in such commerce may be taxed (Pullman's Palace Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18), and may be taxed at its value as it is, in its organic relations, and not merely as a congeries of unrelated items, taxes on such property have been sustained that took account of the augmentation of value from the commerce in which it was engaged (Adams Express Co. v. Ohio State Auditor, 165 U. S. 194; s. c. 166 U. S. 171; Fargo v. Hart, 193 U. S. 490, 499). So it has been held that a tax on the property and business of a railroad operated within the state might be estimated prima facie by gross income, computed by adding to the income derived from business within the state the proportion of interstate business equal to the proportion between the road over which the business was carried within the state to the total length of the road over which it was carried. (Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379.)

"Since the commercial value of property consists in the expectation of income from it, and since taxes ultimately, at least in the long run, come out of income, obviously taxes called taxes on property and those called taxes on income or receipts tend to run into each other somewhat as fair value and anticipated profits run into each other in the law of damages. The difficulty of distinguishing them became greater when it was decided, not without much debate and difference of opinion, that interstate carriers' property might be taxed as a going concern. In Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, supra, the measure of property by income purported only to be prima facie valid. But the extreme case came earlier. In Maine v. Grand Trunk Ry. Co., 142 U. S. 217, 'an annual excise tax for the privilege of exercising its franchise,' was levied upon every one operating a railroad in the state, fixed by percentages, varying up to a certain limit, upon the average gross receipts per mile multiplied by the number of miles within the state when the road extended outside. This seems at first sight like a reaction from the Philadelphia & Southern Mail Steamship Company case. But it may not have been. The estimated gross receipts per mile may be said to have been made a measure of the value of the property per mile. That the effort of the state was to reach that value and not to fasten on the receipts from transportation as such was shown by the fact that the scheme of the statute was to establish a system. The buildings of the railroad and its lands and fixtures outside of its right of way were to be taxed locally, as other property was taxed, and this excise with the local tax were to be in lieu of all taxes. The language shows that the local tax was not expected to include the additional value gained by the property being part of a going concern. That idea came in later. The excise was an attempt to reach that additional value. The two taxes together fairly may be called a commutation tax. (See Ficklen v. Taxing District of Shelby County, 145 U. S. 1, 23; Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S. 688, 697; McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 670, 671.)

" 'By whatever name the exaction may be called, if it amounts to no more than the ordinary tax upon property or a just equivalent therefor, ascertained by reference thereto, it is not open to attack as inconsistent with the Constitution.' (Postal Telegraph Cable Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S. 688, 697. See New York, Lake Erie & Western R. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 431, 438, 439.) The question is whether this is such a tax. It appears sufficiently, perhaps from what has been said, that we are to look for a practical rather than a logical or philosophical distinction. The state must be allowed to tax the property and to tax it at its actual value as a going concern. On the other hand the state cannot tax the interstate business. The two necessities hardly admit of an absolute logical reconciliation. Yet the distinction is not without sense. When a legislature is trying simply to value property, it is less likely to attempt to or effect injurious regulation than when it is aiming directly at the receipts from interstate commerce. A practical line can be drawn by taking the whole scheme of taxation into account. That must be done by this court as best it can. Neither the state courts nor the legislatures, by giving the tax a particular name or by the use of some form of words, can take away our duty to consider its nature and effect. If it bears upon commerce among the states so directly as to amount to a regulation in a relatively immediate way, it will not be saved by name or form. (Stockard v. Morgan, 185 U. S. 27, 37; Asbell v. Kansas, 209 U. S. 251, 254, 256.)"

That the Texas Case just quoted is not decisive of the case at bar is made apparent by a later decision of the Supreme Court of the United States much relied upon by respondent, wherein a law of Minnesota is sustained, requiring car loaning companies to pay a tax upon their gross earnings within the state, in lieu of other taxes on the property. The matter is discussed as follows in the opinion (Cudahy Packing Co. v. Minnesota, 246 U. S. 450–452, 38 Sup. Ct. 373, 374 [62 L. Ed. 827]):

"As construed and applied by the state court, the Minnesota law requires a freight line company, meaning a company furnishing or leasing cars to railroads for freight transportation, to report annually its gross earnings from the operation of its car line within the state and to pay, in lieu of other taxes on the property so employed, a tax fixed at a stated per cent. of such earnings. That court holds that this law is an exertion of the power of the state to tax the property within its limits from which the earnings are derived and is intended to embody a practical method of reaching and valuing that property, tangible, and intangible, for taxing purposes.

"In so far as the property constituting this car line is regularly or habitually used or employed in Minnesota it is within the taxing power of the state, although chiefly devoted or applied to interstate transportation. Pullman's Car Co. v. Pennsylvania, 141 U. S. 18; Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194; s. c. 166 U. S. 185; American Refrigerator Co. v. Hall, 174 U. S. 70; Union Refrigerator Co. v. Lynch, 177 U. S. 149. This is not questioned; but it is insisted that the tax imposed is not a property tax but one laid directly on the gross earnings. Of course, if it is laid on the earnings as such, they being derived largely from interstate commerce, it is an unconstitutional restraint or burden on such commerce and void. [Italics ours.] Fargo v. Michigan, 121 U. S. 230; Philadelphia & Southern Steamship Co. v. Pennsylvania, 122 U. S. 326; Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217. On the other hand, if what is done is to reach the property and not to tax the gross earnings, the latter being taken merely as an index or measure of the value of the former, it well may be that the objection urged against the tax is untenable; for, as this court has said, 'by whatever name the tax or taxes may be called that are fixed by reference to the value of the property, if they are not imposed because of its use in interstate or foreign commerce, and if they amount to no more than would be legitimate as an ordinary tax upon the property, valued with reference to the use in which it is employed, they are not open to attack' as restraining or burdening such commerce. St. Louis Southwestern Ry. Co. v. Arkansas, 235 U. S. 350, 367; Postal Telegraph Co. v. Adams, 155 U. S. 688; Wisconsin & Michigan Ry. Co. v. Powers, 191 U. S. 379, 387; Fargo v. Hart, 193 U. S. 490, 499; Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Ry. Co. v. Texas, supra.

"As before stated, the state court regards the tax as imposed in respect of the property rather than the earnings, and the same view seems to be taken by the Legislature, for the act of 1909 speaks of the tax as 'a tax upon its (the company's) property' and the Act of 1911 says 'the value of such property (that used within the state) for purposes of taxation is to be determined' by reference to the gross earnings from the mileage within the state. True, this local view is not conclusive on this court, but it cannot be rejected unless it can be said to be ill founded. * * *

"The other case [United States Express Co. v. Minnesota, 223 U. S. 335] involved a tax in Minnesota of a designated per cent. of the gross earnings of an express company from business done in that state, the business being partly local and partly interstate commerce. The statute declared that the tax was to be in lieu of other taxes on the company's property, and the state court held that it was not in reality a tax on the gross earnings, but was a tax on the property, the earnings being taken merely as a measure of the value of the property for taxing purposes. We accepted and gave effect to that holding, not as being conclusive on us, but on the grounds that the property from which the earnings were derived was not to be otherwise taxed, that the tax was part of a system intended to reach the full value of the company's property in the state as reflected by the gross earnings, and that the amount of the tax did not appear to be in excess of what would be legitimate as an ordinary tax on the property, valued with reference to its use as part of a going concern. The case dealing with the Oklahoma tax [Meyer v. Wells Fargo & Co., 223 U. S. 298] was distinguished by pointing out that that tax could not be regarded as a property tax, because it was to be in addition to another tax reaching the full value of the company's property in the state.

"The law imposing the present tax is closely patterned after the one exacting the tax upheld in United States Express Co. v. Minnesota, and contains the same declaration that the tax shall be in lieu of other taxes on the property. The statutes differ only in minor details and are both parts of a general system which the state applies to railroads, telephone lines and the like. So, unless this tax be otherwise distinguishable, it must, under the decision in that case, be regarded as a property tax and not as laid on the gross earnings."

The decision in this case is clear authority for the system of taxation incorporated in our Constitution, and "the local view" concerning the same embodied in that Constitution and the statutes and court decisions defining its purpose and scope.

In a still later case the system adopted by California was apparently applied by the state authorities of Nevada, and sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States. State v. Wells Fargo & Co., 38 Nev. 505, 540, 150 Pac. 836; Wells Fargo & Co. v. Nevada, 248 U. S. 165, 39 Sup. Ct. 62, 63 L. Ed. 190. The valuation of $850,000 was sustained as a reasonable valuation, regardless of the method used in ascertaining its value. A valuation of $300 per mile was placed upon the business of the express company. This involved a capitalization of $850,000, which was taken as the value for taxation. In connection with this valuation the Supreme Court of Nevada made the following statement:

"Whether the system of determining the valuation of appellant's property, applied by the state board of assessors, was correct or not, it does not appear that it operated to impose an excessive valuation. The fact that erroneous methods may in good faith have been used to determine valuations is immaterial, we think, if an excessive valuation did not result therefrom."

The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the decision of the Nevada court (Wells Fargo & Co. v. Nevada, 248 U. S. 165, 39 Sup. Ct. 62, 63 L. Ed. 190), stating:

"As construed by the state court, the statute under which the tax was imposed does not provide for a privilege or franchise tax, but only for an ad valorem property tax. Acting under the statute, a state board valued the company's personal property, tangible and intangible, used in its express business within the state, at $300 per mile of line; * * * the assessor of Humboldt county * * * inaccurately described the property as consisting of the right to carry on express business there.

"Looking only at that entry there is strong ground for saying that the tax was laid on the privilege or act of doing an express business which was principally interstate. On the other hand, the action of the state board, on which the assessment concededly was predicated, indicates that what was taxed was the company's property in Humboldt county. The difference is vital, for, consistently with the commerce clause of the federal Constitution, the state could not tax the privilege or act of engaging in interstate commerce but could tax the company's property within the state, although chiefly employed in such commerce. (Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194, 220; s. c. 166 U. S. 185, 218; Galveston, Harrisburg & San Antonio Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 217, 225–227; Cudahy Packing Co. v. Minnesota, 246 U. S. 450, 453.)

"The company insists that the state is concluded by the entry on the assessment roll. But the state court, as shown in its opinion, rejects that view and holds, in effect, that the entry must be construed in the light of the statute and the action of the state board, and that when this is done it is apparent that the tax was not laid on the privilege or act of engaging in interstate commerce, but on the company's property within the county. We perceive no ground for disturbing that ruling. In so far as it turns on the authority of the state board and the assessor under the statute and the relative effect to be given to their acts it is not reviewable here, and in so far as it relates to what really was the subject of the tax we think it was right. See Cudahy Packing Co. v. Minnesota, supra, p. 454. Evidently the company at one time took this view of the tax, for in an amendment to its answer we find an allegation that the state board 'valued the property used by this defendant at the rate or sum of $300 for every mile of railroad over which this defendant transacted business, and apportioned said assessment or tax to the various counties of the state in accordance with the number of miles of such railroads, so situated within said county, and that the tax herein sued for was not otherwise levied or assessed.' * * *

"It also is asserted that the state board in valuing the property acted on inaccurate data and applied erroneous standards which resulted in a valuation so excessive as to make the tax a burden on interstate commerce. It is true that some inaccurate data and some computations following erroneous standards were presented to the board by a state officer in support of a suggestion that the property be valued at $500 or more per mile of line. But the suggestion was not adopted, and it is not shown that the board's valuation was based on the data and computations so presented. Besides, if the valuation was excessive, the company was entitled in the present suit to show the true value and to have the tax reduced accordingly. (Rev. Laws 1912, § 3664.) An attempt at such a showing was made, but the state court concluded therefrom that a valuation of $300 per mile, as fixed by the board, was not excessive. It may be that the showing was not complete, but, even if so, it was the company's showing and was all that was before the court. After examining it we think it discloses no ground for condemning the tax as a burden on interstate commerce."

[2, 3] It follows from the foregoing decisions that it is proper to consider, as a basis on which to establish the value of plaintiff's property in this state, the earnings derived from its property, tangible and intangible, within the state; and that it is proper to consider the proportion of its receipts derived from its interstate business, earned within the state as an element of that basis. It is also clear that the system adopted by our state Constitution for such apportionment of interstate earnings is the fairest possible method of such apportionment, and that by such method the state does not assert jurisdiction over any earnings from the interstate business, not actually derived from that portion of such business actually conducted within the state, and does not draw to itself earnings derived from capital or property elsewhere situated. In short, that the method adopted for the ascertainment of local values is wholly unobjectionable.

[4] The appellant advances one other argument in support of its contention that the constitutional system of taxation is in reality a tax upon the gross revenues derived in part from interstate commerce and not a tax upon the appellant's property. The contention may best be stated in the words of the appellant:

"The facts regarding what was done refute completely the claim set up by the defendant in his answer and found by the court that the property was taxed at all. It was the gross receipts and gross receipts only."

The claim is that the reports of the state board of equalization and assessment by them of appellant's property make manifest that the tax in question is not a property tax. For the purpose of considering appellant's contention it will be necessary to consider the method of fixing the rate or percentage of gross receipts (3 per cent. and later 4 per cent.) used in determining the tax.

Before the new scheme was recommended hearings were had before this commission and all transportation companies, including plaintiff, doing business in this state, were given an opportunity to present their views and their data upon the subject. It is, perhaps, worthy of note that the report of the commission shows that the plaintiff then stated that it was unable to comply with the request of the commission for information as to the proportion of its interstate business conducted in California and contented itself with a protest against any form of taxation which operated to place a burden upon its interstate commerce.

The tax commission in its report of 1906 to the Legislature furnished the proper rate of taxation based on the gross receipts in order to properly tax the property of the various corporations involved in the amendment, as follows, to wit:

"In view of the strength of the popular feeling that taxes should be 'equal' and of the obvious and essential justice of such a demand, it is highly important to discover a practical method for determining whether the burden of a tax which it is proposed to impose upon the gross earnings of a given class of corporations is the equivalent or not of a tax which might be levied under an ad valorem plan. Such a method has been devised by this commission. By the application of this method we can ascertain what rate of tax on the gross earnings is the equivalent of a given tax rate on the property, and vice versa. This will make it possible to compare any proposed gross earnings tax with an assumed 'fair' rate on property.

"Briefly stated that method is: To determine what tax rate on gross earnings is the equivalent of a given rate on the property, for a given class of public-service corporations, (1) ascertain what percentage of the gross earnings is net, (2) ascertain what rate of interest would constitute a fair return to investors in the securities of the class of public-service corporations under consideration, then (3) divide the percentage of net earnings by the rate of interest and multiply the result by the given tax rate on property.† This method is not as rigid or as infallible as the mathematical statement of it might seem to imply. There is still room for difference of opinion. But it has been found of great practical value in testing the probable effect of different rates on any set of assumptions. * * *

"In order to compute what rate of taxation on gross earnings is the equivalent of a given rate of taxation on the property, we have simply to divide the percentage of net earnings by the assumed rate of capitalization and multiply the result by whatever tax rate on the property we wish to compare the gross earnings rate with. Thus, for example, if we wish to impose, in the form of a gross earnings tax, a burden which shall be the equivalent of a tax of 1½% on the property, then in the case of a railroad, taking the figures assessed above, we divide 36 by 6 or 8, whichever shall be determined upon as a fair rate at which to capitalize railroad earnings, and multiply the result by 1½, obtaining, at 6%, 9% as an equivalent rate on gross earnings, or at 8% as a basis of capitalization, 6¾%. If the tax rate on property or capital were fixed at 1%, the above rates would become 6% and 4½%."

The commission of 1906 also shows in its report the close approximation between the value of railroad property as theretofore assessed by the state board of equalization for taxation purposes, and the value to be ascertained by the proposed system. That portion of the report is as follows:

"The question of the equity of the gross earnings tax as between different roads can be tested somewhat roughly by comparing the taxes now paid on the ad valorem plan with the taxes that would be paid on the gross earnings plan. This is done in the following table for the more important railroad systems of the state. It is not argued that the present system is equitable as between the different roads, but it affords the easiest and most readily available basis of comparison:

	Tax on Property. Present System 1904.	Per Cent. of all Taxes on Railroads.	Tax on Gross Earnings at 4 Per Cent. Proposed System.	Per Cent. of all Taxes on Railroads.	Column 3 Reduced to Same Total as Column 1.

"In the case of the larger roads the change of system would not materially alter their proportion of the total taxes on railroads. But in the case of some of the smaller roads the changes would be quite important."

The similarity of values derived by the assessment of individual items of property, and by adding such items and thus ascertaining the total value, and the system inaugurated by the Constitution, can be determined by a comparison of the assessment of plaintiff's properties by the two methods for the same years. The use of the two methods of valuation resulted from the adoption of a constitutional amendment in 1910 requiring a tax to be levied upon all the property of the state for the Panama-Pacific Exposition.

While the discrepancies between these two valuations is pointed out by the plaintiff as an evidence of the inequality and excess of the percentage tax, the analysis of the figures by the Attorney General shows that the valuations of the plaintiff's property, ascertained by the two methods, were practically identical. In considering these figures, however, it is important to bear in mind that while the law directs that all property shall be assessed at its full cash value, as a matter of fact experience has shown that the assessed value is less than 50 per cent. of the actual value, or, to be more accurate, and use the figures of the state board of equalization in 1911, 1912, 1913, and 1914, the assessed value was 45.1 per cent. of the actual value; in 1915, 41.991 per cent.; 1916, 42.755 per cent.

If the state board of equalization had certified to the county assessors the true valuation of plaintiff's property instead of the percentage of its value based upon the system of assessment adopted by the county assessors, the plaintiff's property would have borne an excessive proportion of the tax. As stated by the Supreme Court of the United States in Sunday Lake Iron Co. v. Township of Wakefield, 247 U. S. 350, 38 Sup. Ct. 495, 62 L. Ed. 1154:

"It must be regarded as settled that intentional systematic undervaluation by state officials of other taxable property in the same class contravenes the constitutional right of one taxed upon the full value of his property."

This court has recognized such rule and has permitted a recovery of taxes levied upon such valuation. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. County of Los Angeles, 162 Cal. 164; Southern Pacific Land Co. v. County of San Diego, 191 Pac. 931.

In making the comparisons of values another fact must also be considered, namely, that the gross revenue method includes all operative property (Const. Cal. art. 13, § 14), while the property valuation, by the state board of equalization, for taxation purposes according to the former plan excludes certain operative properties, which are separately assessed by the various local assessors.

For the purpose of comparison we will use the figures furnished by the Attorney General in his brief for plaintiff's property:

Year.	Assessed Value.	Percentage of Actual Value.	Actual Value.	Value Ascertained from Percentage Gross Receipts.	Under-Valuation by Latter Method.
1911	$2,995,760	45.1	$6,642,438	$5,020,112	$1,620,000.00
1912	3,070,654	45.1	6,808,500	5,148,426.13	660,073.37
1913	3,270,246	45.1	7,251,000	7,238,579.13	12,421.13
1914	3,459,920	45.1	7,671,600	7,227,781.25	353,819.25
1915	2,913,253	42.	6,936,300	6,009,143.88	927,156.22
1916	3,548,032	42.75	8,300,000	6,792,000	1,508,000.00

To such item of undervaluation must be added the operative properties locally assessed. Expressed in terms of tax the comparison is compiled by the Attorney General from the reports of the state board of equalization, and is shown in the next table:

"Assessment by State Board of Equalization.

"Assessment of Pullman Company's cars and franchises by state board of equalization and estimated amount of tax thereon if levied at average tax rate, compared with taxes paid on basis of gross receipts. These figures do not include assessment of valuable operative property assessed by local assessors.

The foregoing tables will make it clear that the plaintiff has not been unfairly treated by the state, although it is well to note that the plaintiff in its complaints herein does not raise the issue of overvaluation and makes no allegation of excessive tax as compared with the value of property taxed. The valuations presented in plaintiff's argument were all derived from the work of the officers of the state, and the figures are only relevant as showing that the state system of taxation was based in fact, as well as in name, upon the value of plaintiff's property in the state, and as further illustrating that interstate commerce carriers have not been made to bear an undue proportion of the burden of taxation.

In view of our conclusion on this branch of the case, it will be unnecessary to consider or determine the extent to which the taxing power of the state may be exercised in the event that the burden upon the property of interstate commerce carriers is out of all reasonable proportion to that imposed upon the property of others within the state.

We cannot see that the validity of that portion of the act (Stats. 1911, pp. 530, 548, § 24), declaring a forfeiture of the right of a foreign corporation to do business in the state if taxes are not paid, is involved in this action to recover taxes already paid.

Judgment affirmed.

BERGES v. GUTHRIE. (Civ. 3497.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸705(11)—Plaintiff's violation of speed ordinance bars recovery only if it contributed to collision.

The violation of an ordinance, limiting the speed at which an automobile may be driven on the city streets, is negligence per se, but it bars recovery for injuries to the automobile so driven only in case the speed contributed to the accident which caused the injury.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸705(11)—Plaintiff's violation of speed ordinance held to have contributed to accident.

Where it appeared that plaintiff drove his automobile across a street intersection when his view to the left was obstructed by a passing street car and automobile, at a speed exceeding that permitted by a city ordinance when the view was obstructed, and that he collided with defendant's automobile, which came suddenly from behind the meeting automobile, and which would have crossed the intersection ahead of plaintiff if the latter had been going at a lawful speed, plaintiff's violation of the speed ordinance contributed to the accident, and he cannot recover therefor.

3. Appeal and error ⟸193(4)—General allegation of contributory negligence sufficient, if not demurred to.

An allegation in the answer and cross-complaint that plaintiff was careless and negligent, and that his injuries were proximately caused by said carelessness and negligence, is sufficient on appeal, where there was no demurrer, either general or special.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by E. R. Berges against George Guthrie, for damages for injuries caused by an automobile collision. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles W. Haswell, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Hankins & Hankins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $583. The action was to recover for the amount of damage caused to plaintiff's automobile by reason of a collision between it and the defendant's automobile. The cause was submitted to the court sitting without a jury.

On May 29, 1918, plaintiff was operating his automobile in a northerly direction on the east side of Potrero avenue in the city and county of San Francisco. According to plaintiff's testimony, at the time he reached the intersection of Twenty-Third street and Potrero avenue he saw a street car on Potrero avenue, about at the middle of the intersection of the two streets, and an automobile closely following the street car, traveling southerly. Plaintiff testified that defendant's automobile came from behind the street car and the automobile following it; that the defendant's car came from Twenty-Third street where it intersects the west line of Potrero avenue, and attempted to cross into Twenty-Third street where it intersects the east line of said street. (Twenty-Third street intersects Potrero avenue on its east side at a point south of the point where it intersects said Potrero avenue on its west side. In other words, Twenty-Third street does not run directly through Potrero avenue at right angles, but breaks off, and in order to continue in Twenty-Third street after crossing Potrero avenue going east one must go a few feet south. This configuration of the streets is a necessary element in the situation presented in this case.) The cars of plaintiff and defendant were proceeding at about the same rate of speed, which was variously estimated by witnesses—but, let us say, was approximately 20 miles an hour. When defendant's car loomed into plaintiff's view, it was but a few feet away from plaintiff, and, according to his testimony, "coming right at him." Both drivers then attempted to avoid a collision, the defendant by whirling his car around facing north, and driving it upon the sidewalk on Potrero avenue and against a wall inclosing the city and county hospital, and the plaintiff by swinging to his right and onto the sidewalk on the northerly line of Twenty-Third street, dashing his car into a fire hydrant and against the wall of said city and county hospital. Plaintiff testified that the defendant's car struck his left rear fender before the cars reached the sidewalk. Both cars were damaged somewhat by the impact of the two cars, but, mainly by crashing into the wall.

[1] The appellant's main contention upon this appeal is that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, as a matter of law, by reason of the fact that the evidence shows him to have been going at the rate of 20 miles an hour. It is contended such speed of 20 miles an hour was a violation of the provisions of the state motor vehicle act and of ordinance No. 1857 of the city and county of San Francisco under the circumstances of this case, and that such violation of law made plaintiff negligent per se. It is well settled that the violation of an ordinance is conclusive evidence of negligence in this state. Scragg v. Sallee, 24 Cal. App. 144, 140 Pac. 706. But it is equally well settled that the principle has this limitation:

"The act or omission must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages can be founded upon it." Williams v. Southern Pac. Co., 173 Cal. at page 540, 160 Pac. at page 666.

See, also, Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. at page 565, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; McKune v. Santa Clara M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. at page 486, 42 Pac. 980; Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. at page 81, 103 Pac. 944; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663.

[2] Plaintiff himself testified that his car was going at the rate of approximately 20 miles an hour as he approached and crossed the street where the collision took place. The state motor vehicle law provides that no person shall drive or operate a motor vehicle at a speed greater than 15 miles an hour in approaching or traversing an intersecting highway, when the operator's view of the road or railway traffic is obstructed. Section 37 of Ordinance 1857 of the city and county of San Francisco provides that no person shall operate or drive a motor or other vehicle on any public highway at a greater rate of speed than 10 miles an hour, where the operator's or chauffeur's view of the road traffic is obstructed either upon approaching an intersecting way or in traversing a crossing or intersection of ways.

Plaintiff testified that at the time he reached the intersection of the streets, he saw a street car on Potrero avenue, about the middle of the intersection of the two streets, and an automobile closely following the street car, both traveling southerly. Defendant's automobile came from behind these two vehicles, and from the left of the plaintiff, and could not be seen by plaintiff until it emerged from behind the street car, directly in the path of plaintiff. It is beyond dispute, therefore, that a street car blocked plaintiff's view, and that he was required to lessen his speed because his view of the road traffic was obstructed. This he did not do, according to his own admissions, and his failure in this regard constituted negligence on his part as a matter of law.

The further question as to whether such negligence, under the circumstances here presented, would bar a recovery, is answered, we think, by the case of Cook v. Miller, 175 Cal. 497, 166 Pac. 316. That case presented a situation where the defendant "cut across a corner" in violation of an ordinance, and the plaintiff also violated an ordinance by swerving to the right to pass a wagon, instead of to the left. The court said:

"If he had not passed to the right of the wagon he would not have struck the automobile. So, also, if the defendant had turned the corner by going to the right of the intersection, his automobile would not have been struck by the motorcycle. The disobedience of the ordinance by both of them brought on this accident. It was the result of their concurrent negligence, the negligence of each was a proximate cause, and each contributed to the injury."

In the present case, if the defendant had not recklessly emerged from behind the street car without waiting to see whether an automobile was approaching from his right, which would have the right of way, he would not have struck the plaintiff. On the other hand, if the plaintiff had slackened his speed upon approaching the crossing, where his view of the road traffic was obstructed by the street car and automobile following it, defendant would have cleared the street before plaintiff reached the point of collision, or plaintiff would have had time and space to turn safely to his right into Twenty-Third street, and thus have avoided the accident when he saw the danger impending. It appears, therefore, that the situation here is closely analogous to the facts in the case of Cook v. Miller, supra, and that the disobedience of the ordinance by both plaintiff and defendant brought about the accident; the negligence of each being a proximate cause. Under such circumstances the plaintiff should not recover.

[3] Respondent points out that the defendant in his answer merely pleads contributory negligence in general terms, alleging:

"That plaintiff was guilty of carelessness and negligence in and about the matters set forth in said complaint, and that any injuries or damages sustained by plaintiff at said time and place, if any, were proximately caused by said carelessness and negligence, and that said carelessness and negligence proximately contributed thereto."

Defendant also alleged "that said accident happened solely through the carelessness and negligence of said plaintiff," and that the automobile of the plaintiff "was so negligently and carelessly run and operated by said plaintiff as to force the said automobile of said defendant upon and over the sidewalk at or near the intersection of said Potrero avenue and said Twenty-Third street." There was no demurrer, either general or special, to this answer and cross-complaint, and plaintiff cannot, under such circumstances, upon appeal, complain that the specific acts constituting the negligence were not set forth.

The judgment is reversed.

JOHNSON et al. v. CRABBE. (Civ. 3704.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1921.)

Judgment ⊂=445—Facts relied on for annulment of judgment held res judicata between parties.

Where the facts set up in suit to annul a judgment previously entered against plaintiffs in an action in which defendant was plaintiff were decided adversely to plaintiffs in an action in the superior court, from which no appeal was taken, and which had become final before entry of judgment in the present action, the questions raised in the present action are res judicata between the parties, and the facts cannot be inquired into anew.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Jennie B. Johnson and others against John H. Crabbe. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for appellants.

John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the plaintiffs from a judgment against them in an action brought by them to annul a judgment previously entered against them in an action in which the defendant herein was plaintiff and the plaintiffs herein were defendants. The complaint alleged that on March 6, 1916, John H. Crabbe, defendant herein, commenced an action for $208 against Johnson and O'Connell in the justices' court. The details of the proceedings had in said justices' court are then alleged, and the fact of the entry of a default judgment in said action against said Johnson and O'Connell on April 6, 1916, and the issuance and levy of an execution thereunder. It is also alleged that said Johnson and O'Connell filed an undertaking on appeal, staying execution on said judgment; that upon appeal to the superior court said judgment of the justices' court was affirmed. The complaint is voluminous, and contains much argumentative matter upon the effect of the various rulings and orders made by the justices' court and by the superior court, the general purport of the argument being that the judgment of the justice's court was void for irregularities, and that the action of the superior court in affirming said judgment was also void, because it affirmed a void judgment. The prayer is "that said judgment of the superior court, and also said judgment of the justices' court be canceled and annulled, and that the defendant, his agents, servants, and assigns be restrained and enjoined from commencing or prosecuting any action or proceedings whatever for the enforcement or collection of said judgment or said undertaking on appeal staying said execution."

The second count alleges that the undertaking staying execution on appeal which plaintiffs caused to be filed in the justices' court was procured by the representations of Crabbe that he had recovered a judgment against said Johnson and O'Connell and had levied execution thereunder upon the bank accounts of said Johnson and O'Connell; that the said conduct of said Crabbe was menace and duress towards the plaintiffs, and the representation and allegation that he had a good and valid judgment and execution against plaintiffs were false and fraudulent in that he had no judgment, the said judgment being a void judgment, etc. It is then alleged that said Crabbe is prosecuting an action in the justices' court on said undertaking. It is prayed that said undertaking be set aside and canceled, and Crabbe restrained and enjoined from proceeding with any action on said undertaking.

The defendant Crabbe denied all the material allegations of the complaint, and, as one of his affirmative defenses, alleged that at the time of the filing of the complaint herein there was pending in the superior court, department No. 2 thereof, an action numbered 79792, wherein the parties plaintiff and party defendant were the same parties, respectively, as the parties plaintiff and party defendant in the present action; that the cause of action involved in said action No. 79792 was identical with and the same as the cause of action attempted to be alleged in the present action; and, that in said action 79792, so involving the same questions of law and fact between the same parties plaintiff and defendant, judgment in favor of defendant was duly given, made, and entered, and that such judgment is an adjudication of the rights of the respective parties in the present action, and the questions involved in the present action are, therefore, res adjudicata as between the parties plaintiff and defendant herein.

The record in said action No. 79792 was admitted into evidence in the present action, and while it is not included in the transcript on appeal, and is not before this court, the trial court found with reference thereto that—

"Complaint therein (action No. 79792) was filed on February 7, 1917, in said superior court, and that thereafter, and on, to wit, the 9th day of March, 1917, a general demurrer of said John H. Crabbe interposed to said complaint was sustained, and the plaintiffs were allowed time to amend; that the plaintiffs did not file the amended complaint within the time allowed by law and the order of the court, or at any other time, or otherwise, or at all; and, that thereafter, and on, to wit, the 27th day of April, 1917, judgment for costs was rendered in favor of the defendant, to wit, John H. Crabbe, in said action No. 79792; and that the said judgment was fully paid and discharged on the 16th day of June, 1917; that no appeal has been taken from said judgment, and that said judgment in said action No. 79792, has become, and is now, final. And the court further finds that the parties plaintiff, and the party defendant in said action No. 79792 in the above-entitled court were, and are, the same parties plaintiff and defendant, respectively, as in this action, to wit No. 82038, in the above-entitled court, and that the relief sought in said action No. 79792 was the same as, and identical with, the relief sought in this action, to wit No. 82038 in the above-entitled court, and that the pretended cause of action in each case is the same."

Under this state of facts, most of the matters argued by the appellants in their brief have no bearing whatever upon the question presented to this court upon this appeal. We are not concerned with the errors, if any, committed in the justices' court; that judgment has been affirmed by the superior court. The involved facts set up in the present case, and urged as grounds for the annullment of the judgments of the justices' and superior courts, were decided adversely to appellants in an action in the superior court, from which no appeal has ever been taken, and which had become final before the entry of judgment in the present action. Clearly, under the above-quoted finding of the trial court, the questions involved in the present action were res adjudicata between the parties, and the facts could not be inquired into anew.

The judgment is affirmed.

HICKEY v. ALGIE. (Civ. 3678.)

1. Judgment ⟹497(2)—Recital of appearance raises presumption thereof, though proof in judgment roll is incomplete.

In a suit to quiet title as against the lien of a judgment, where the judgment recited that the defendant appeared generally and failed to demur or answer, it will be presumed that there was a general appearance, though the proof of that fact in the judgment roll is incomplete; there being nothing to contradict such recital.

2. Appeal and error ⟹179(1)—In suit to quiet title, question of homestead not considered when pleadings and findings silent on the subject.

In a suit to quiet title as against the lien of a judgment, plaintiff's claim of homestead will not be passed on where the pleadings and findings are silent on the subject of homestead, and it appears only incidentally that there was a homestead claim in the former action in which the judgment was recovered.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1071(6)—Refusal to find on particular question not reversible error, when conclusion and judgment not affected.

In a suit to quiet title as against the lien of a judgment, the court's refusal to make any finding as to the ownership of one of the lots, apparently for want of necessary parties, was not reversible error, where the conclusion and judgment in favor of defendant would have been the same, though court had found plaintiff to be the owner of such lot.

4. Quieting title ⟹7(4)—Relief not granted as against judgment without showing of defense, or that judgment was not just.

Equity will not quiet plaintiff's title as against the lien of a judgment for irregularity or defect in the service of process, in the absence of any averment or proof that plaintiff had any defense on the merits, or that the judgment was not in fact just, especially where limitations have run against the note on which the judgment was recovered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Suit to quiet title by Cora M. Hickey against Matthew Algie. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. Crawford, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

E. A. Lane, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this suit to quiet title to four lots of land in a designated tract in the city of Inglewood. The defendant had judgment, and plaintiff has appealed. The particular object of the suit is to remove a cloud of an alleged "pretended judgment" against the appellant, obtained by the respondent in a previous action in the same court entitled Algie v. Buck (the former name of the present plaintiff), and which judgment was docketed in the superior court of Los Angeles county, wherein the real estate is located.

It is alleged in the complaint:

"That said pretended judgment was obtained by a representation made to the court that the defendant therein had appeared in the action, when in fact the defendant therein had not appeared, nor had an attorney appeared for her, nor had she been served with the summons therein, and the said judgment was obtained without any knowledge thereof on the part of the plaintiff herein."

The trial court found that defendant, plaintiff and appellant here, did, as a matter of fact, appear generally in the former action, and that by reason of said judgment this respondent has a lien upon three of the plaintiff's lots. Appellant contends that this finding is not supported by the evidence, and has appealed from the judgment.

It is the claim of the appellant that there is nothing in the record of the former case from which it can be said that the court had jurisdiction of her person in that action, thereby enabling it to render judgment against her. There is no merit in the contention. The evidence is brought here in a bill of exceptions which includes, among other matters, the papers constituting the judgment roll in the action of Algie v. Buck. At the time of the filing of the complaint and issuance of summons in that action an attachment was issued and levied upon real property which Cora M. Buck, defendant in the action, claimed as a homestead. She duly gave and served notice by her attorney that she would, at a time designated, move the superior court for an order setting aside the levy of the writ of attachment and dissolving the same, upon the ground that the levy was made on exempt property. At the hearing of the motion she appeared in court by her attorney, and in support of her contentions offered in evidence a declaration of homestead. The court held the declaration insufficient, and denied the motion. On the order of the attorney for plaintiff in the action, and upon his filing an affidavit of appellant's "general appearance," her default was entered. The manner of her appearance was alleged to be her giving and serving upon the attorney for the plaintiff notice of her motion for the setting aside of the levy and her appearance in court in support of the motion. The court subsequently rendered judgment against her, which was duly entered. There also appears to have been attached to the complaint in the action a memorandum by the clerk, reciting that the defendant had been regularly served with process, and had failed to appear, and that her default, therefore, had been entered. The summons does not appear to have been included in the judgment roll.

What constitutes an appearance in an action in this state was very recently considered by the Supreme Court in Davenport v. Superior Court of Imperial County, 191 Pac. 911, in which the court said:

"An act of a defendant by which he intentionally submits himself to the jurisdiction of the court in that action for the purpose of obtaining any ruling or order of the court going to the merits of the case, as, for example, a motion to strike out part of the complaint, or the making of stipulations, as in the cases above mentioned, which may reasonably be construed to imply that the court has, in that action, acquired jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, will be equivalent to an appearance, although not strictly in accordance with the terms of section 1014." Code Civ. Proc.

[1] But, whether or not the facts thus far established in this case constituted an appearance by this appellant, as defendant in the former action, of such general character as to warrant the entry of her default therein, becomes a wholly immaterial question in the face of a recital in the judgment which followed, to the effect that—

The defendant "appeared generally, and having failed to demur or answer to plaintiff's complaint, the legal time for answering having expired, and no answer or demurrer having been filed, the default of the defendant was duly entered according to law."

There is absolutely nothing in the record, either in the judgment roll of the former action or in the other evidence contained in the present bill of exceptions, to contradict this recital. Appellant merely relies upon her contention that the affidavit of her appearance in connection with the motion to set aside the attachment is not sufficient evidence to warrant the court in now saying that she appeared generally in the other action. But a general appearance in an action can be made in any number of ways. Davenport v. Superior Court, supra. How it was made in the instant case, and what proof was made of the fact, assuming for the purpose of argument only that the facts appearing were not sufficient, does not appear and is immaterial. It has long been the rule in this state that in such cases, if the proof of service of process or of an appearance in an action is on its face incomplete, yet the court in its judgment states that service was complete or the appearance sufficient, "it will be presumed that other proof than that contained in the judgment roll was made, for not to so presume would be to deny to the record that absolute verity which must be accorded to it." Hahn v. Kelly, 34 Cal. 391, 408, 419, 420, 94 Am. Dec. 742, the leading case on the subject in this jurisdiction.

After the judgment was docketed the plaintiff in the former action took certain steps looking to an appraisement of the property of the appellant, claimed by her as a homestead. She appeared in open court by the attorney who had previously represented her in the attachment proceedings, and resisted the application for the appointment of appraisers, which was denied. Subsequently, she made and pressed a motion to vacate and set aside the sale of lot 10, one of the lots in question here, which had been sold under execution, upon the ground that the property was a portion of her homestead. The court granted this motion. The respondent here claims that by taking these steps appellant subjected herself to the jurisdiction of the court as effectually as if she had previously appeared, and that these steps after judgment constituted a general appearance on her part in the action, citing Security, etc., Co. v. Boston, etc., Co., 126 Cal. 418, 58 Pac. 941, 59 Pac. 296. We are not inclined to agree with respondent in this regard, but in view of what we have already said, that question is also immaterial.

[2] Part of appellant's argument in this court is predicated upon a claim now advanced that the property affected by the lien of the judgment in the former action is a homestead. The pleadings are silent upon that matter; there is no finding upon the subject of the homestead, and that there was a homestead claimed by appellant appears only incidentally in the bill of exceptions. It was only made an issue in the former action in connection with the attachment and the execution sale. If there be any merit in appellant's contention that, "even if valid, the judgment was not a lien on the premises" because entered after the recordation of the homestead, we are unable to pass upon the question, for the declaration of homestead is not before us.

[3] The parties stipulated as to the title of three of the lots owned by appellant, but refused to stipulate as to lot 10, which was the portion of the property sold on execution following judgment in the former action, which sale was subsequently set aside. Following the stipulation the court found the plaintiff to be the owner of three lots and as to said lot 10 expressly refused to make a finding, apparently being of the opinion (we can only judge from the context of the record) that the necessary parties were not before it for a complete adjudication on that point. We are of the opinion that the court's failure to find upon this issue, although it was made by the pleadings, does not amount to reversible error, for, as the record determines, as between appellant and respondent, respondent was entitled to the lien of his prior judgment. The conclusion and judgment of the lower court would have been the same even though it had found plaintiff to be the owner of said lot 10.

[4] The decision of this case is justified by the findings of the trial court. For another reason appellant should not be allowed to recover in this action. She brings this suit in equity to remove the cloud of a judgment rendered against her in an action brought to recover upon a promissory note, and the statute of limitations appears to have run against the original obligation. Equity will not set aside a judgment merely upon the ground of some irregularity or defect of service of process upon the defendant unless there is presented some ground for equitable relief. Plaintiff's complaint negatives her right to recover. She has pleaded the existence of the judgment, but there is a complete absence of averment or of proof that plaintiff had any defense on the merits to the action brought by respondent, or that the judgment was not in fact just. Without regard to other points made, this alone is a complete obstacle to the granting of equitable relief. Matson v. John Batto & Sons, 173 Cal. 800, 801, 161 Pac. 1144; Bell v. Thompson, 147 Cal. 689, 693, 82 Pac. 327; Parsons v. Weis, 144 Cal. 410, 416, 77 Pac. 1007.

JONES v. BAXTER et al. (Civ. 3644.)

1. Appeal and error ⟹110 — Order denying new trial not appealable.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 956 and 963, as amended in 1915, an order denying a motion for a new trial is reviewable on appeal from the judgment, but no appeal from the order is authorized.

2. Mortgages ⟹186(5)—Evidence held to support finding against claim that purchase-money mortgage was taken with notice of intervening rights.

Where, after the execution of a deed from plaintiff to B. but before the execution on the same day of a mortgage from B. to plaintiff for a part of the purchase price, B. conveyed an undivided two-thirds interest to defendant, evidence held to support a finding against the claim that plaintiff took the mortgage with knowledge that it covered only B.'s one-third interest.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

The weight of the evidence is for the consideration and determination of the trial court, and where the evidence is highly conflicting an appellate court will not disturb the findings.

4. Mortgages ⟹490—Mortgagee compelled to sue on insurance policy entitled to deduct attorney's fee before crediting proceeds.

Where an insurance policy made the loss payable to a mortgagee and the mortgagee was compelled to sue to recover the loss, he was entitled to deduct the reasonable and necessary amount paid an attorney in addition to the costs recovered before crediting the proceeds on the mortgage.

5. Mortgages ⟹581(5)—Allowance of attorney's fee without evidence of reasonableness not error.

In an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage providing for the payment of a reasonable counsel fee, it was not error for the court to allow $75 for such fee without evidence to show what would be a reasonable amount to allow.

6. Pleading ⟸218(3) — Notice of overruling of demurrer need not be served on party represented by counsel.

Though Code Civ. Proc. §§ 476 and 1010, contemplate the service of notice on adverse parties of the overruling of a demurrer, such service is not necessary where the party is represented by counsel present in court when the order is made.

7. Attorney and client ⟸70—Appearance for party presumed authorized.

Though one defendant appeared in the action in proper person, where, on the hearing on demurrer, an attorney appeared for both defendants, it must be presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that his appearance was authorized, as every intendment is to be indulged in support of the judgment and an attorney is an officer of the court and occupies a position of trust and confidence respecting the administration of justice, and it must be presumed that he will not violate his obligation by making an unauthorized appearance.

Appeal from Superior Court, Humboldt County; Denver Sevier, Judge.

Action by Isham R. Jones against Edward A. Baxter and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, the defendants John F. Dufur and another appeal. Judgment affirmed, and appeal from order dismissed.

Henry L. Ford, of Eureka, for appellants John F. Dufur.

Geo. W. Hunter, of Eureka, for respondent.

BARDIN, Presiding Justice pro tem. [1] This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage given by Edward A. Baxter upon real property in Humboldt county to secure the payment of a promissory note in the sum of $700. The defendants John F. Dufur and his wife, A. D. Dufur, appeal from the judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, Jones, and also include in their notice of appeal a purported appeal from the order denying their motion for a new trial. While it is proper on an appeal from the judgment for us to review such an order, yet an appeal therefrom is now unauthorized and should be dismissed. Sections 956, 963, Code Civ. Proc.; Roberts v. Colyear, 179 Cal. 669, 180 Pac. 937.

The trial court determined that there was due, owing, and unpaid to the plaintiff upon said promissory note and for money expended under the terms of the mortgage the sum of $397.47, and also the further sum of $108.85 for attorney fees and costs incurred in the action, aggregating in all $506.32, for which defendant Baxter was personally liable, and declared that such sum was secured to be paid by the mortgage referred to. The usual decree directing the sale of the mortgaged premises to satisfy such indebtedness, attorney fees, and costs followed.

[2] The principal point relied upon for a reversal of the judgment is founded upon the claim of appellants that at the time the mortgage was given to Jones, the mortgagor Baxter owned but an undivided one-third interest in the mortgaged property, and that at that time A. D. Dufur owned the remaining two-thirds interest, and that Jones accepted the mortgage with full knowledge of that fact. The trial court found against this claim, and it is now urged that such finding is without proper support in the evidence. We have carefully examined the record and find that there was ample testimony adduced at the hearing to support the finding complained of. The evidence shows that Jones, while the owner of the premises described in the mortgage, entered into a verbal agreement for the sale thereof to Baxter and John F. Dufur, who was acting as the agent of his wife, A. D. Dufur, whereby it was agreed that Jones would sell the premises, together with certain live stock thereon, for the sum of $2,000. Jones, Baxter, and John F. Dufur all met in the latter's office on September 29, 1914, to consummate the oral agreement of sale, and Dufur, who was an attorney at law, thereupon prepared a deed for the signatures of Jones and his wife, whereby the premises were to be conveyed to Baxter. Jones signed the same and departed, leaving it with Dufur, but it was not signed by Mrs. Jones until a later hour on the same day at a neighboring bank. After Jones had signed the deed referred to, Baxter executed and delivered to John F. Dufur, in his capacity as agent for his wife, a deed conveying to Mrs. Dufur an undivided two-thirds interest in and to the real property in controversy. After the partial execution of the deed from Jones to Baxter, Baxter and Dufur went to the bank referred to where Mrs. Jones added her signature to the deed, and Dufur, in behalf of Mrs. Dufur, thereupon paid to Jones $1,300 of the purchase price of the premises; the balance of the purchase price being paid by the execution of the note and mortgage in suit. The two deeds were afterwards placed of record at the request of Dufur, but by some arrangement not made clear, the mortgage was caused to be recorded at the request of a local bank immediately following the recordation of the deed from Jones to Baxter, and prior to that of the deed from Baxter to Mrs. Dufur.

The respondent testified to the effect that he had conveyed the real property referred to to Baxter and had taken the mortgage back simultaneously and as a single transaction; that he was not a party to the transaction between Baxter and Dufur, and knew nothing of that; and that he had never heard of the appellants' claim that his mortgage was intended to cover only a one-third interest in the mortgaged premises until a short time before the trial, and that the mortgage was intended to cover the full title to the land, and not an undivided interest therein.

The testimony of Jones was strongly corroborated by Baxter and by certain indirect evidence not necessary to here discuss. We attach no importance to the order in which the two deeds and the mortgage were recorded, for the question of what interest in the lands was really intended to be mortgaged must be answered by a determination of the nature of the transaction at the time the deed from Jones to Baxter passed and the mortgage given.

[3] It is true that some testimony highly contradictory to plaintiff's theory of the case was given at the trial; but as has so often been said before, the weight of the evidence is for the consideration and determination of the trial court, and where there is such a conflict in the evidence as is here disclosed, an appellate court will not disturb the findings.

[4] Certain buildings situate upon the mortgaged premises were destroyed by fire, while the mortgage was in effect, which were covered by a policy of fire insurance containing the usual provision that such a loss should be payable to the mortgagee. The mortgage provided that the mortgagee might insure such buildings if the mortgagor failed so to do, with loss, if any, payable to the mortgagee. The insurance company refused to pay the amount of the loss, and it became necessary for Jones to institute an action upon the policy to recover the loss thus sustained. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff in the sum of $704.41 and of which amount $18.75 was for costs of suit. In crediting the mortgagor on account of the receipt of such moneys, the plaintiff deducted not only the said sum of $18.75 recovered as costs, but also the further sum of $100 paid as attorney's fee in the action against the fire insurance company. The court found that this fee was both reasonable and necessary and was paid for the benefit of A. D. Dufur. As relating to this last finding, it may be stated parenthetically that Mrs. Dufur had meanwhile succeeded to the full title to the premises described in the mortgage. We agree with the trial court that the deductions made from the insurance moneys on account of the expenses referred to were proper.

[5] The allowance of an attorney's fee in the sum of $75 for services in the present action is attacked. The mortgage provided for the payment of "a reasonable counsel fee" in the event of foreclosure, and the court allowed plaintiff the sum of $75 as and for such a fee. The point is urged that the court made such an allowance arbitrarily and without recourse to any evidence being adduced to show what would be a reasonable amount to allow for such purpose. The point is not well taken. Woodward v. Brown, 119 Cal. 283, 309, 51 Pac. 2, 542, 63 Am. St. Rep. 108; Hotaling v. Montieth, 128 Cal. 556, 61 Pac. 95; Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 175 Cal. 652, 166 Pac. 1006.

One point remains to be considered, and that is the contention of appellant John F. Dufur that as to him the judgment should be reversed for the reason that the default taken against him for not answering the complaint was without warrant or authority of law. Dufur appeared in the action in proper person and filed a demurrer. Henry L. Ford appeared for Mrs. Dufur, by filing a demurrer in her behalf. It is recited in a minute order, contained in the judgment roll, that at the time fixed for hearing argument on the demurrers of John F. Dufur and A. D. Dufur to plaintiff's complaint, Henry L. Ford, as attorney for said defendants, appeared in court, and made argument on said demurrers, whereupon the demurrers were overruled and 20 days granted and allowed to answer the complaint. The defendant John F. Dufur was not served with notice of the said ruling on his demurrer, and having failed to answer the complaint within the time allowed, his default was entered by the clerk. No motion to vacate and set aside such default was ever made nor was it ever suggested, and it is not now claimed that Mr. Ford was not authorized to appear for Mr. Dufur, although Mr. Dufur was present at the trial and participated therein as a witness. It is recited in the judgment that the default of said Dufur was duly and regularly entered.

[6] While it is true that the Code (sections 476, 1010, Code Civ. Proc.) contemplates service of a written notice on an adverse party, of the action of the court in overruling a demurrer and allowing time to answer, yet where a party is represented by counsel in court present at the time such order is made, the necessity of the service of such a notice is dispensed with. Wall v. Heald, 95 Cal. 364, 30 Pac. 551.

[7] We must presume, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that Mr. Ford's appearance for Mr. Dufur was an authorized appearance. Not only does this follow by reason of the familiar rule that every intendment is to be indulged in to support the judgment (Von Schmidt v. Von Schmidt, 104 Cal. 547, 38 Pac. 361), but also for the further reason that it must be presumed, until the contrary is made to appear, that an attorney appearing in court for a party to an action or other proceeding is authorized so to do. An attorney is an officer of the court and occupies, with relation to the administration of justice, a position of trust and confidence, and it must be presumed, until the contrary is made to appear, that he will not violate his obligation and make an unauthorized appearance for any person whom he purports to represent.

Perceiving no error, the judgment is affirmed. The appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is dismissed.

ARNAZ v. FORBES. (Civ. 2963.)

1. Trial ⊜388(1) — In action tried without jury, court should find on material issues.

In an action tried without a jury, the law imposes on the trial judge the duty to make findings on all material issues upon which evidence has been introduced.

2. Trial ⊜397(4) — Finding on contributory negligence not necessary, where evidence does not support plea.

Where the evidence heard does not support plea of contributory negligence, a finding on that issue is unnecessary.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5)—Evidence held insufficient to show pedestrian's negligence when run down by automobile.

In an action by a pedestrian run down by a motorcar while he was waiting for a street car to round a curve in front of him, evidence held insufficient to show pedestrian's contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by Louis A. Arnaz against H. W. Forbes. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lynn Helm, of Los Angeles, for appellant.
Edward F. Wehrle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought to recover damages alleged to have been suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the negligent acts of the defendant in the handling and driving of an automobile. The case was tried before the court without a jury, and judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff. From that judgment defendant appeals. Defendant in his answer pleaded that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence which was the proximate cause of his injuries. The court failed to make a finding upon this plea, and that omission constitutes the sole claim for a reversal.

[1, 2] The law imposes upon a trial judge the duty to make findings upon all material issues as to which evidence has been introduced. On the other hand, it is well settled that, where the evidence heard does not support the plea of contributory negligence, a finding upon the issue is not necessary to be made. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. 504; Maloof v. Maloof, 175 Cal. 571, 166 Pac. 330. The latter case is cited upon the general proposition just announced, without our agreement with the statement made in that decision, to the effect that the omission of the court to find upon an issue made by the pleading falls within the errors described in section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution.

[3] Examining the evidence to which our attention is directed, we are not able to conclude that this evidence justified a finding in favor of the defendant on his claim that contributory negligence of the plaintiff had been shown. All of the evidence to which we are pointed is that given in substantiation of the situation as described by the plaintiff when the accident occurred. Briefly stated, the evidence was that the plaintiff at a street intersection left the east sidewalk to cross to the westerly corner of the street at the customary place. He traversed a distance of 28½ feet, which composed pavement designed for vehicles to travel upon, and came to the easterly rail of a double street car track laid in the street, where he stopped. The track at this point curved to make the turn from the street, across which plaintiff had moved, into the intersecting street. A car was approaching from the intersecting street at the corner, and it was for the purpose of allowing this car to pass that plaintiff stopped. He testified that at the time he stepped from the curb to advance to the place where he was standing when struck, he had observed the automobile which struck him approaching from the south at a distance, as shown by other testimony, of about 340 feet. He testified that he stood still at the point indicated for several minutes to allow the approaching car to start and round the curve in front of him; that, standing in his place, he suddenly saw the automobile almost upon him; that he tried to escape from the dangerous position by grabbing the "bumper" and jumping to one side. By this collision he suffered bodily injuries. The automobile of the defendant had ample room to pass the plaintiff, as the distance from where he stood to the east sidewalk which he left was, as before stated, 28½ feet. Plaintiff, according to his testimony, which seems to be without dispute, had remained in a stationary position, where he could be plainly seen under ordinary circumstances for several minutes. That plaintiff had a right to be in the position where he was, and that defendant in the careful management of his machine could and should have avoided contact with the plaintiff, seems very clear to us. There was other testimony ample to the point that the defendant was negligent. The motorman of the car which plaintiff was waiting to allow to pass, testified that the automobile came up at a speed of not less than 20 miles per hour, and almost collided with the car, which was traveling upon the side of the street opposite to that upon which the defendant should have been traveling, had he conformed to the requirement of the law. We conclude that under the evidence a finding that plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence would not be supported.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte MARTIN. (Cr. 976.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 9, 1921.)

1. Habeas corpus ⟹3—Prior prosecution and excessive bail held not ground for issuance of writ.

That petitioner is being again prosecuted for an offense for which he was once in jeopardy, or is being held to answer on excessive bail, constitute no grounds for issuance of writ of habeas corpus, where it does not appear that he has made timely or any application for a reduction of the amount of the bail, and since he may upon the trial of his case plead the prior conviction and establish the identity of the cases by evidence.

2. Criminal law ⟹295—Burden of proving former jeopardy on defendant.

The burden is on defendant, claiming that he is being again prosecuted for an offense for which he was once in jeopardy and was convicted, to show such conviction and establish the identity of the cases by evidence.

In the matter of the application of John Martin for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco to secure release from custody. Writ denied.

Raine Ewell, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application in behalf of John Martin for writ of habeas corpus. On reading the petition for the writ in the first instance the court was of the opinion that an order for the writ should not issue for the reason that it did not sufficiently appear from the facts stated that the petitioner was entitled to the relief sought. Permission was granted to file an amended petition on filing and reading of which the court is of the opinion that the application should be denied.

Two points are presented for our consideration:

[1, 2] If it be true, as alleged, that petitioner is being again prosecuted for an offense for which he was once in jeopardy, he may upon the trial of his case plead such conviction and establish the identity of the cases by evidence; the burden being on him. People v. Faust, 113 Cal. 172, 176, 45 Pac. 261.

Petitioner also contends that he is being held to answer in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco on excessive bail. If this be true, it does not appear that he has made timely or any application to the court below for a reduction of the amount. Until he has done so and been denied any relief, we do not feel in a position to entertain an application for a writ of habeas corpus on that ground.

The writ is denied.

2. Bills and notes ⟹525—Evidence held insufficient to support finding plaintiff transferee did not take notes in good faith.

In an action on notes given by the maker in connection with a sales-stimulating contest organized by the payee company, evidence held insufficient to support finding that plaintiff transferee of the notes did not receive them in good faith from the payee company, though he had dealt with it before, buying in all some $200,000 worth of paper, and bringing suit to collect some of such notes.

3. Appeal and error ⟹846(6)—Finding outside issue ignored on appeal.

4. Bills and notes ⟹343—Transferee held liable both on the doctrine of estoppel and principle that failure of consideration no defense in suit by assignee.

Where defendant gave his notes in connection with a sales-stimulating contest organized by the payee company, though all the notes were payable before expiration of time for completion of the payee company's contract, both on the doctrine of estoppel and on the principle that a failure of consideration in whole or in part after a bona fide assignment of a promissory note is no defense to a suit by the assignee against the maker, notwithstanding the assignee's full knowledge of the original consideration for which the note was given, defendant maker was liable to a transferee of the notes.

5. Bills and notes ⟸328—Law of state where payable governs.

Promissory notes payable in Iowa are to be interpreted under the law of that state as to rights of bona fide holder.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by W. I. Pratt against Adolph Dittmer. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Judgment reversed, and trial court directed to enter judgment in conformity with the opinion.

Hartwick & Drumm, of Orange, for appellant.

Wm. M. Brown, of Los Angeles, and D. G. Wettlin, of Orange, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The material facts of this case are as follows: On the 19th day of May, 1915, Adolph Dittmer, a resident of Orange, Cal., entered into an agreement with the Brenard Manufacturing Company of Iowa City, Iowa, whereby the company agreed to conduct a voting contest for Dittmer. It was stipulated that the Brenard Manufacturing Company would furnish him with a certain piano and other articles, which it did, and would direct the management of the voting contest, and in that connection it was stipulated as follows:

"The Brenard Mfg. Co. agrees to send their organizer to us within the first six weeks from the starting of the campaign, for constructive campaign work and for the completion of clubs. Organizer to remain for such a period as Brenard Mfg. Co. may deem necessary."

And again:

"My last twelve months sales were $13,500 and upon this figure my next twelve months sales to be $16,000 and that if 3&6/100 per cent. of my gross sales does not amount to four hundred ninety dollars (490.00) for the next twelve months you will pay me the deficiency in cash, and immediately upon approval of this order send your bond for $490.00 to cover this agreement with me."

Dittmer, in consideration of securing the personal property ordered in the contract and the performance by the manufacturing company of its covenants contained therein, executed six promissory notes, which were attached to the contract. The notes were payable two, three, four, five, six and seven months after date respectively. Except as to date they are identical. The first one reads as follows:

"P. O. Orange, State Calif. 5/19/1915. For value received I promise to pay to the order of the Brenard Manufacturing Company, eighty dollars, at Iowa City, Iowa, payable as below, two months after date. Amount $80.00 2 ct. U. S. Rev. Stamp duly cancelled. Signed by Adolph Dittmer."

At the end of the contract in question, the following provision appears:

"These notes to be detached by the Brenard Mfg. Co."

It is also stipulated in the contract upon the part of Dittmer as follows:

"I agree to furnish you within ten days approximately one hundred fifty names and addresses of persons whom I believe will make good club leaders and members," etc.

His testimony shows that he sent the names at the end of 10 days. The contract was signed by the defendant, Dittmer, in Orange, Cal., and also by the Brenard Manufacturing Company through its duly authorized agent, B. F. Bates. The contract, with the notes attached, was sent to the Brenard Manufacturing Company at Iowa City, Iowa, and thereafter the notes were detached from the contract by Loveland, one of the partners of the Brenard Manufacturing Company. Subsequently to being so detached, and before any breach of the contract, on the 31st day of May, 1915, they were sold and assigned to the plaintiff in this action, W. I. Pratt.

The court found:

"That plaintiff at the time of said transfer of said alleged notes knew all about the conditions upon which the said Brenard Manufacturing Company did business with defendant, and plaintiff knew that said alleged notes were a part only of the entire agreement made between defendant and Brenard Mfg. Co."

Also finding number 6 is as follows:

"That said plaintiff did not take said alleged notes in good faith and for value, but that said alleged notes were transferred by said Brenard Manufacturing Company, and received by plaintiff for the purpose of preventing defendant from receiving the benefit of any defense said defendant might have against said alleged notes"

—and, further, that the Brenard Manufacturing Company did not comply with the terms of the contract in the matter of giving personal supervision to the contest. Defendant, Dittmer, failed to pay the promissory notes, and Pratt brought this action upon them without reference to the contract, but we find it attached to the answer.

The trial court found that the agreement and the notes constituted a single contract, and that the defendant had been injured in the sum of $280 by reason of the Brenard Manufacturing Company having failed to perform its part of the contract, and gave judgment for the plaintiff for the remaining $200 with interest due on the notes. From this judgment the plaintiff appeals.

[1-3] It is claimed by the appellant that the findings above recited are not supported by the evidence, but on account of the view which we take of the law applicable to the case it will be unnecessary to pass upon that issue except as to finding 6. This finding may be divided into two parts: First, that the plaintiff did not take the notes "in good faith and for value," which, it is readily seen, involves two propositions, one negativing plaintiff's good faith and the other his having parted with a valuable consideration for the notes. The finding of want of consideration has no support in the evidence. The direct and uncontradicted testimony of Pratt was that he paid the Brenard Manufacturing Company $1,600 for these notes, and section 3104 of the Civil Code directs the presumption that a valuable consideration was paid. The nearest approach to evidence supporting a finding that plaintiff did not receive the notes in good faith is found in the testimony of the plaintiff himself to the effect that he had dealt with the Brenard Manufacturing Company upon many other occasions and bought in all $200,000 worth of their notes; had brought suit to collect some of them; was well acquainted with the members of the copartnership and their general manner of doing business. Construing this most strongly against the plaintiff and in support of the finding in question, these facts do not constitute bad faith. There is nothing to indicate that the other notes bought by the plaintiff from the manufacturing company were in the same form as the ones here in litigation or connected with contracts similar to the one with which we have to deal; and nothing to indicate absence of good faith on the part of the company in connection with this transaction (Citizens' Trust & Savings Bank v. Stackhouse, 91 S. C. 455, 74 S. E. 977, 40 L. R. A. [N. S.] 454); and further, in so far as good faith is concerned, its existence, not having been challenged by the answer, is not an issue in this case. The second part of finding 6, "That said alleged notes were transferred by said Brenard Manufacturing Company, and received by plaintiff for the purpose of preventing defendant from receiving the benefit of any defense said defendant might have against said alleged note," is not within any issue tendered by the pleadings, and must be disregarded.

The answer contains no allegation that the Brenard Manufacturing Company secured the execution of the notes by fraud or misrepresentation, but only that of partial failure of consideration. Respondent cites Hoffman v. Liebfarth, 51 Iowa, 711, 2 N. W. 518; Commercial Bank v. Paddock, 90 Iowa, 63, 57 N. W. 687, and Merchants' National Bank v. Grigsley, 170 Iowa, 675, 149 N. W. 626. These are cases in which an issue of fraud was presented by the pleadings, and in the last the court merely held that the question of fraud and entire want of consideration was one for the jury. Also, in Burns v. Bauer, 37 Cal. App. 251, 174 Pac. 346, the court found that the note sued upon had been secured from the maker by fraud and misrepresentation. In the case at bar, the defense is partial failure of consideration. Splivallo v. Patten, 38 Cal. 139, 99 Am. Dec. 358, and Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 314, 132 Pac. 256, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861, are in point and must control the decision of the case at bar. The former was a case where the sole question involved was the right of an assignee of a promissory note to recover against a maker where the original consideration for the note was an executory contract.

After the assignment of the note to Splivallo, the consideration failed. The court held that such failure of consideration after the assignment was not a defense, notwithstanding the assignee, at the time of the assignment, had full knowledge of the original consideration for which the note was given. This decision is quoted by our Supreme Court in the case of Flood v. Petry, 165 Cal. 314, 132 Pac. 256, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 861, with approval. The bank pledgee received the note with full knowledge that it was part of a nonnegotiable building contract, but before the note matured, yet, with the further knowledge that at the time the note was pledged no portion of the work to be done by the contractor had been done. The court held that the delivery of the note by the maker under these circumstances "precludes the maker of the instrument, upon the simplest principles of estoppel, from asserting that its only consideration was the completion of the building.

[4] In the case at bar the facts constituting the estoppel are that the contract upon which the defendant relies and of which the note was originally a part expressly provided, "These notes to be detached by the Brenard Mfg. Company"; that the first note was payable before the Brenard Manufacturing Company could by any fair construction of the contract be required to begin to perform any part thereof, and all of the notes were payable long before the expiration of time for the completion or carrying out of the contract on the part of the company, the life of the contract being 12 months and the sixth note being payable 7 months from the execution of the contract. We conclude, therefore, that both upon the doctrine of estoppel as applied in the case of Flood v. Petry and the principle "that a failure of consideration in whole or in part after a bona fide assignment of a promissory note is no defense to a suit by the assignee against the maker, notwithstanding the former's full knowledge of the original consideration for which the note was given," a rule clearly recognized in Splivallo v. Patten, and approved by Flood v. Petry, the facts found to be true by the court do not constitute a defense.

[5] The notes were payable in Iowa, and are to be interpreted therefore under the law of that state. However, no Iowa case is cited, nor, we apprehend, exists in conflict with the doctrine expressed in this opinion. The language of the Supreme Court of Iowa, in the case of McNight v. Parsons, 136 Iowa, 392, 113 N. W. 858, 22 L. R. A. (N. S.) 718, 125 Am. St. Rep. 265, 15 Ann. Cas. 665, would indicate its agreement with the prevailing rule, for it says:

"The courts quite universally hold that knowledge that a note was given in consideration of the executory agreement or contract of the payee which has not been performed will not deprive the indorsee of the character of a bona fide holder, unless he also has notice of the breach of that agreement or contract."

The judgment is reversed, and the trial court directed to enter judgment in conformity with this opinion.

PATTON v. WOODWARD CO. (Civ. 3719.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1921.)

Master and servant ⟸332(2)—Evidence to connect automobile dealer with operation of car negligently driven held to justify nonsuit.

In an action against a corporation selling automobiles, for injuries to a bicyclist struck by an automobile driven by the company's employee demonstrating the car, which had been left with the company to be sold, held that defendant was entitled to a nonsuit on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to connect defendant either with the ownership or operation of the automobile, the only evidence offered clearly showing that its employee at the time of the accident was working on his own time and beyond the scope of his employment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; D. A. Cashin, Judge.

Action by George M. Patton against the Woodward Company, a corporation. From judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for appellant.

Everts & Ewing and J. R. Fitch, all of Fresno, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendant following the granting of defendant's motion for nonsuit in an action for personal injuries. The motion for nonsuit was granted upon the grounds that there was no evidence introduced connecting the defendant with the ownership of the automobile or with its operation at the time of the accident, and that there was no evidence introduced which showed that the person operating the automobile was at the time of the accident either in the employ of the defendant or acting within the scope of his employment. The complaint alleged that the defendant, a corporation, while engaged in the business of demonstrating and selling automobiles, operated an automobile along Inyo street in the city of Fresno in a westerly direction, while plaintiff was operating a bicycle along the same street in an easterly direction and approaching the intersection thereof with I street; that as plaintiff approached the intersection of said streets the defendant corporation negligently caused said automobile to be driven along said Inyo street and into I street at such an angle across the intersection of said streets that it passed to the left of the center thereof; that by reason of the collision so caused plaintiff was thrown to the pavement and injured.

The evidence disclosed by the bill of exceptions is that one Pearson, an employee of the defendant corporation, was operating the car in question after business hours and after defendant's place of business had been closed for the day; that the car belonged to another employee of defendant by the name of Collins, and had been taken by him in trade for another machine; that it had been left at defendant's place of business for the purpose of being sold, but that the arrangements for selling it had been made between Pearson and Collins, the owner, without any negotiations with or instructions to or from the defendant corporation; that without any instructions from the defendant corporation Pearson took the car for the purpose of demonstrating it after he had completed his work for the day, and sold it on that day, payment being made directly to Collins. No commission was paid to the defendant corporation on account of the sale of the car, and Pearson himself received no commission therefor. The automobile had been stored by Collins in the offices of the corporation for a period of about one week prior to the accident, and on some occasions was run out to the street in front of the offices or on a nearby lot for the purpose of display with cars of the company which were thus exhibited for sale. At the time of the accident the car carried a dealer's license issued to and belonging to the corporation, which Pearson testified he had taken without permission. The foregoing facts appear from the testimony of Pearson, who was called for the plaintiff. Another witness, Collins, also called for the plaintiff, corroborated this testimony in the main, though his testimony relating to his authorization of Pearson to sell the car was indefinite. Collins further testified that with reference to the sale of the automobile he made no contract with the corporation.

This was all the evidence offered by plaintiff on this phase of the case. In appellant's brief it is argued that the testimony of these two witnesses is conflicting, and that the trial court should have disregarded the conflict and resolved all inferences and presumptions in favor of the plaintiff. But the record discloses no conflict. The argument in the brief is based upon a misquotation of the evidence of Collins as disclosed by the bill of exceptions as follows:

"I was the owner of the Ford Automobile which had caused the accident. I had left it with the defendant to be sold."

The testimony of this witness appearing in the bill of exceptions is:

"I was the owner of this Ford automobile which caused the accident. I had never turned the automobile over to the Woodward Company. I had left it there to be sold. Q. But not to be sold by the Woodward Company, was it? A. Well, it was with the other used cars. I never talked to either of the Woodwards about selling the car for me to my knowledge. I might possibly have talked to Mr. Pearson about it."

This testimony is in complete harmony with that of the witness Pearson, who testified that his fellow employee Collins had merely brought his car to his place of employment; that it had not been turned over to the corporation for the purpose of sale, but that Collins had authorized him to act as his own agent in the sale of the car.

There was no evidence connecting defendant either with the ownership or operation of the automobile, and the only evidence offered clearly showed that Pearson, at the time of the accident, was working upon his own time, and beyond the scope of his employment with defendant.

The motion for a nonsuit was properly granted, and the judgment is affirmed.

CLAPP'S PARKING STATION et al. v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3397.)

1. Master and servant ⊜375(2)—Injury while going to or from work not in course of employment within Compensation Act.

An employee merely going to or from the place of his work is not engaged in performing any service growing out of and incidental to his employment, relative to right to award for his injury at such time.

2. Master and servant ⊜417(3)—Compensation award without proof of injury in employment void.

Workmen's Compensation Act, § 6, subsec. "a," creating a liability against an employer only for an injury arising out of and in the course of the employment, an award without proof of such condition precedent is void, and, being attacked by certiorari under section 67, must be annulled as in excess of jurisdiction.

3. Master and servant ⊜417(7)—Commission's findings not conclusive unless supported by evidence.

Though Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67, subsec. "c," declares conclusion of commission on questions of fact to be conclusive and final, this is only where there is conflict of evidence or opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn; and, the award being based wholly on circumstantial evidence, the court may determine whether there are the necessary reasonable inferences deducible from the evidence to sustain the findings; conjecture or guesswork will not suffice.

4. Master and servant ⊜405(4)—Finding of injury in employment based on "conjecture" as distinguished from "inference" held unsupported.

Commission's conclusion that employee's injury arose out of and in the course of his employment held not supported by evidence, there being no reasonable "inference," which rests on premises of fact, to this effect, but mere "conjecture" and surmise, which have no such basis.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Conjecture; First and Second Series, Inference.]

5. Master and servant ⊜417(9)—Cause remanded on commission's statement of new evidence.

Award of commission being annulled for insufficiency of evidence, the cause will under the authority of Workmen's Compensation Act, § 67, subsec. "c," be remanded for further proceedings, it being made to appear that additional evidence can be produced, and this on the statement of the commission as to the evidence that can be produced, without supporting affidavits; the claimant being too poor to engage counsel.

Award of death benefit was made by the Industrial Accident Commission and others to Silas M. Friend's widow, and Frederick A. Clapp, doing business as Clapp's Parking Station, employer, brings certiorari. Award annulled and cause remanded.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for petitioners.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is a proceeding in certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission allowing a death benefit to the widow of Silas M. Friend, deceased.

The petitioner for the writ, Frederick A. Clapp, doing business in the city of Los Angeles under the name of "Clapp's Parking Station," employed Friend as a carpenter to do various kinds of work about his automobile parking ground. For several days prior to the accident, Friend had been engaged in constructing a fence for Clapp around the latter's parking ground. On July 3, 1919, at about 11 o'clock a. m., Friend left his work of fence building, and shortly thereafter, while crossing Los Angeles street, was run down by an automobile and received injuries that were the proximate cause of his death.

It is contended by petitioner that there was no evidence before the Commission sufficient to justify its finding that the injuries that resulted in Friend's death arose out of and in the course of his employment. This contention, we think, must be sustained.

[1] It seems that the award was based upon the theory that, at the time of the accident, Friend was on an errand for his employer, that is, that he was on his way to or was returning from the lumber yard of the Whiting-Mead Wrecking Company, whither, it is claimed, he had been sent by Clapp to purchase lumber to be used in the construction of the fence. There is no direct evidence that Friend was performing any such errand for his employer at the time of the accident; the claim is that there is circumstantial evidence to sustain the theory that Friend was on such errand when the accident happened. We think that the circumstances are wholly insufficient to justify any reasonable inference that Friend was engaged in any such errand. If he was not, then indubitably the widow is not entitled to a death benefit, for it is well settled that an employee going to or from the place where his work is to be performed is not engaged in performing any service growing out of and incidental to his employment. Ocean Acc., etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 173 Cal. 313, 159 Pac. 1041, L. R. A. 1917B. 336; Fidelity & Casualty Co. v. Industrial Acc. Comn., 192 Pac. 166.

If we resolve all conflicts in the evidence in favor of the widow and construe the evidence most favorably to her, we shall have presented the following circumstances: Some time prior to the accident, Clapp had given Friend $5, and told him that if he needed any additional lumber for the construction of the fence to go and get it—to get it from the lumber yard of the Whiting-Mead Wrecking Company. Clapp's parking ground is on the westerly side of Los Angeles street, between Seventh and Eighth streets. The lumber yard of the Whiting-Mead Wrecking Company is between Seventh and Eighth streets on San Pedro street—a street four blocks east of Los Angeles street. After the accident, five dollars and a few cents were found in one of the pockets of the clothing that had been worn by Friend. According to the uncontradicted testimony of the manager of the Whiting-Mead Wrecking Company, that company, as its books show, did not sell any lumber to Friend on July 3, though it had sold lumber to Clapp on the 1st of July. The construction of the fence was left entirely to Friend, who came and went as and when he saw fit. He was paid by the hour. During the period he worked for Clapp, i. e., from June 23 to July 3, he would sometimes leave his work for half a day at a time.

According to the uncontradicted evidence of the eyewitnesses of the accident, Friend, at about 11 o'clock a. m. on July 3, 1919, while crossing Los Angeles street about 50 feet north of Eighth street, going in a westerly direction, that is, in a direction away from the lumber yard and toward the parking ground where the fence was in the course of construction, stepped from behind a truck into the path of an automobile proceeding southerly on Los Angeles street, was struck by the front left fender and received the injuries from which he subsequently died. At the time of the accident, Friend was not wearing a coat.

[2, 3] The Workmen's Compensation Act creates a liability against an employer only for an injury "arising out of and in the course of the employment." Stats. 1917, p. 834, § 6, subsec. "a". The fact that the injury arose out of and in the course of the employment is a condition precedent to the power of the Commission to award compensation to the injured employee or a death benefit to his dependents. An award made without proof of this essential fact is void; and, if attacked by certiorari, as provided in section 67 of the law, it must be annulled as an act in excess of the Commission's jurisdiction. The statute, it is true, expressly declares that the conclusions of the Commission on questions of fact are "conclusive and final and shall not be subject to review" (section 67 of the act, subsec. "c."). But this means no more than that the Commission is the final arbiter where there is a conflict in the evidence or where opposing inferences may reasonably be drawn. It is always within the province of the court, in reviewing an award based wholly on circumstantial evidence, to determine whether there are inferences reasonably deducible from the evidence to sustain the Commission's findings. The findings, in such case, must be based on reasonable inferences; conjecture or guesswork will not suffice.

[4] In Kerr v. Ayre S. S. Co., [1915] A. C. 217, 233, Lord Shaw draws the distinction between conjecture and inference in these words:

"The distinction is as broad as philosophy itself. It is that an inference rests upon premises of fact and a conjecture does not."

The conclusion that Friend's injuries arose out of and in the course of his employment must find its support in the finding that he was injured while performing an errand for his employer, i. e., while going to or returning from the lumber yard to purchase lumber for the fence. But that finding rests upon no premises of fact. The uncontradicted evidence of the manager of the Whiting-Mead Wrecking Company shows that Friend had not purchased any lumber at the lumber yard on the day of the accident. It necessarily follows, therefore, that he was not returning from the purchase of lumber when he sustained his fatal injuries. The fact that, according to the uncontradicted evidence, Friend, when struck down, was crossing from the east to the west side of Los Angeles street, that is, while going in a direction away from the lumber yard, shows that he was not on his way to purchase lumber. From this it necessarily follows that the finding that he was injured while on an errand to purchase lumber is based on mere conjecture and surmise. There is no premise of fact upon which to base any inference that he was on any such errand.

It is argued that the hour, 11 o'clock a. m. was not the usual lunch hour, and that therefore Friend had not been to his lunch. It also is said that the fact that he did not have on his coat shows that he had not been to lunch. This is non sequitur. Clapp testified that he was eating his lunch when the accident happened. If Clapp was so engaged at that hour, why not Friend? It is not unreasonable to assume that one who goes to his work early in the morning, particularly one who, like Friend, has no regular and stated working hours, should eat his lunch an hour earlier than the noon hour. Nor is the fact that he did not have on his coat a pregnant circumstance. The accident happened at a time of the year when, as a rule, the forenoons are quite warm. At that season men whose vocation is that which Friend pursued are frequently seen eating their noonday meal in their shirt sleeves. The probabilities, therefore, are as consistent with the assumption that Friend was returning from his lunch as that he was going to or returning from the purchase of lumber for Clapp. Moreover, the assumption that Friend may have been returning from his lunch is not necessarily the only reasonable alternative to the assumption that he was going to or returning from the purchase of lumber. The evidence shows that he did not always work steadily on the fence throughout the day, but that, for any purpose that might suit his whim, he sometimes left the fence-building job for an hour or so, or even for a longer period of time.

[5] We find no substantial evidence to sustain the Commission's conclusion that the injury to Friend arose out of and in the course of his employment, and therefore we, perforce, must annul the award.

The statute expressly authorizes us to enter a judgment affirming or annulling the award or remanding the case for further proceedings before the Commission. Stats. 1917, p. 876, § 67, subsec. "c". The judgment in Pacific Coast Casualty Co. v. Pillsbury, 171 Cal. 319, 325, 153 Pac. 24, affords a precedent for the entry of a judgment annulling the award, and, at the same time, remanding the case for further proceedings by the Commission. We are asked by the Commission, in the event that we find it necessary to annul the award, to remand the cause for further proceedings before that body. This request is based upon the ground that, since the entry of the award, new evidence, material to the claimant's case has been discovered—evidence which, it is claimed, could not have been sooner discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence. The petitioner here opposes the request upon the grounds: (1) That the court's power to remand exists only where the applicant did not have a fair trial before the Commission, as, for example, where testimony was improperly rejected; and (2) that in any event the nature of the newly discovered evidence should be shown by affidavits.

We think that where an award is annulled for insufficiency of the evidence to sustain a material finding of the Commission, and it is made to appear that if the case be remanded for further proceedings before the Commission additional evidence can be produced, the court should exercise its power to remand. A new trial in a court of record follows as a matter of course when the judgment of such a tribunal is reversed by an appellate court on the ground that a material finding is not sustained by the evidence; and we can see no reason why a more rigorous rule should be applied to a judgment of the Industrial Accident Commission, annulled in a certiorari proceeding, in view of the express grant of power to remand the case for further proceedings by the Commission. Such liberal construction of the act accords with the express declaration that its provisions are to be liberally construed, with the purpose of extending its benefit to the protection of injured persons. Section 68, Stats. 1917, p. 877.

As to the other objection—the failure to support the motion by affidavits—we think that while it doubtless would be more regular to file an affidavit showing the new evidence that can be produced on a rehearing by the Commission, still in this particular instance that course is not a sine qua non. Here the claimant, Mrs. Friend, was too poor to engage counsel. The Commission, a public body created by law with power to subpœna any witness who has not been required to attend at the request of any party (section 61), claims that it has endeavored to ascertain all the facts. We think that under the circumstances we should accept at its face value the Commission's statement of the evidence which it claims can be produced in the event of a rehearing.

The award is annulled, the cause remanded, and the Commission is directed to take such further proceedings in the matter as it may deem advisable.

We concur: WORKS, J.; CRAIG, J.

PEOPLE v. STENNETT. (Cr. 542.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Feb. 14, 1921. Rehearing Denied March 16, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 14, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊜1039 — Objection deputy sheriffs were disqualified to take custody of jury must be made below.

The objection that, since the sheriff was a witness in the case and was thereby disqualified from summoning the jury, his deputies were likewise disqualified to have the custody of the jury pending the trial, cannot for the first time be raised on appeal.

2. Criminal law ⊜868—Objection to improper custody of jury is waived by failure to object.

Accused, by his failure to object to the order placing the jury in charge of one of the sheriff's deputies because the sheriff was a witness for the prosecution in the case and the deputy was therefore disqualified, waived the objection even in the trial of a felony, since such order is a mere irregularity which can be waived.

3. Witnesses ⊜274(2)—Defendant's character witnesses can be cross-examined as to knowledge of previous offenses by him.

Where defendant offers witnesses who testify to his previous good reputation, the prosecution can cross-examine such witnesses to ascertain the credibility of their testimony by asking them if they had heard that defendant had been previously convicted or charged with other offenses.

4. Witnesses ⊜274(2) — Statute prohibiting reference to prior conviction does not prevent cross-examination of character witnesses.

Pen. Code, § 1025, providing that, if defendant pleads guilty and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction alleged in the indictment, the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury nor alluded to on the trial, merely prohibits a gratuitous and unnecessary allusion thereto, but does not prevent the district attorney from cross-examining defendant's character witnesses by asking them if they knew defendant had been convicted of the prior offense.

5. Criminal law ⊜722½—Statute prohibiting reference to prior conviction is one of procedure which defendant can waive by offering evidence of good character.

The provision of Pen. Code, § 1025, prohibiting reference at the trial to a prior conviction if defendant has admitted such conviction on arraignment, is only a statutory regulation of the trial which defendant can waive and does waive by offering evidence of previous good character.

6. Criminal law ⊜722½—Argument on reference to prior offense on cross-examination of character witnesses held proper.

In a prosecution for petit larceny after a prior conviction, where defendant had offered character witnesses who had admitted on cross-examination they had heard defendant had been previously convicted of petit larceny and accused of other crimes, it was proper for the district attorney in his argument to refer to such admissions in discussing the credibility of defendant's testimony.

7. Witnesses ⊜37(4)—Witness who has not heard defendant's reputation discussed can testify it was good.

A statement by a witness called by defendant as a character witness that had never heard defendant's reputation discussed, does not render him incompetent to testify defendant's reputation was good, since the fact that it was not discussed is an indication that it was good.

8. Criminal law ⊜1186(4)—Exclusion of testimony of one of several character witnesses for defendant held harmless.

Error in excluding the testimony of only one of several character witnesses offered by defendant is harmless, where the evidence of defendant's guilt was such that it could not be held the error resulted in the miscarriage of justice within meaning of Const. art. 6, § 4½.

9. Criminal law ⊜789(17)—Instruction reasonable doubt could only arise from evidence held correct.

An instruction defining "reasonable doubt" is not objectionable because the court therein told the jury that such doubt could only arise from the evidence actually produced in the case and consequently excluded doubt created through or by a want of evidence.

10. Criminal law ⊜822(13)—Instruction held not to authorize consideration of circumstances not shown by evidence.

An instruction that unexplained possession of stolen property, though not itself sufficient to justify conviction, is a circumstance which might be considered with other designated circumstances which had been shown by the evidence "and by any and all other circumstances tending to show the guilt of accused," is not objectionable as authorizing consideration of circumstances not brought out by the evidence, where the instruction when read as a whole and in the light of the general charge must have been considered by the jury as limited to circumstances shown by the evidence.

11. Criminal law ⊜822(11)—Instruction defendant must explain possession of stolen goods to remove incriminatory effect is correct.

In a prosecution for larceny, an instruction that defendant was bound to explain the innocent possession of the property to remove the effect of such possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, which, when considered with other parts of the instruction, merely meant that if the property was stolen and in possession of the defendant immediately thereafter he would be required to explain that his possession was innocent to remove the incriminatory effect of those circumstances, was not erroneous.

12. Criminal law ⊜784(4)—Instruction all relevant circumstances may be considered held unobjectionable.

An instruction that, when circumstantial evidence is wholly relied upon, any relevant fact or circumstance leading to or surrounding the fact of the commission of such crime may be shown and considered by the jury, hardly more than states a commonplace and is not open to substantial objection.

13. Criminal law ⊜784(5)—Instruction as to circumstantial evidence held unobjectionable.

An instruction, explaining the distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence and declaring that guilt may be established by means of either, and emphasizing the obvious proposition that to justify a conviction on circumstantial evidence there must be produced in the minds of the jury the same degree of certainty as is required where direct evidence is relied upon, is not objectionable.

14. Criminal law ⊜757(5) — Instruction on credibility of witnesses held not one on the facts.

An instruction on the credibility of the witnesses in the language of Code Civ. Proc. § 1847, except that after the statement that the presumption that witness spoke the truth may be repelled by the manner in which he testifies was added "his interest in the case, if any, or his bias, or prejudice, if any," does not make the instruction objectionable as one on the facts.

15. Criminal law ⊜810—Instruction defining "willfully" in statutory language held misleading and contradictory.

An instruction in the language of Pen. Code, § 7, subd. 1, defining "willfully" and including the clause that it does not require any intent to violate law or to injure another or to require an advantage, is misleading and contradictory to an instruction given in the language of Pen. Code, § 20, that in every crime there must exist a joint operation of act and intent or criminal negligence.

16. Criminal law ⊜1172(4, 5) — Instruction defining "willfully" held harmless.

An instruction defining "willfully" in the language of the statute which is misleading and contradictory does not require reversal of the conviction, where the evidence is amply sufficient to warrant the inference that defendant had the intent to steal.

17. Larceny ⊜64(7)—Evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction of stealing automobile tires.

Evidence that defendant had an opportunity to steal the automobile tires of prosecuting witness, and that when the officers appeared at his house with a search warrant he stated that he knew they came for the tires and gave an improbable explanation of his possession of them, held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

18. Larceny ⊜51(1), 64(1) — Unexplained possession of recently stolen property not alone sufficient to convict, but may be considered with other evidence.

The mere unexplained possession of recently stolen property is not of itself sufficient to establish the guilt of the possessor, though it is a circumstance tending to show guilt to be considered with other facts and circumstances having a like tendency.

On Petition for Rehearing.

19. Jury ⊜70(3)—No formal showing required for summoning special venire or directing coroner to serve summons.

No formal showing or procedure is required to authorize the court to order a special venire of jurors because of the depletion of the regular panel or to order the special venire to be summoned by the coroner because of the disqualification of the sheriff.

20. Jury ⊜70(6) — Court can order special venire before case is called.

Though a special venire is generally not called until the trial of the case has been begun and the regular panel has been exhausted without securing a jury, there is no legal objection to the summoning of such special venire before the case is called for trial whenever it appears satisfactorily to the court, howsoever informally, that a special venire will be required in a case about to come to trial.

21. Criminal law ⊜1166½(5)—Directing coroner to summon special venire when sheriff was witness is favorable to defendant.

Where the sheriff was a witness for the prosecution and thereby disqualified from serving the process for the special jury under Civ. Proc. § 602, subd. 4, and a challenge to the special venire selected by him could have been sustained under Pen. Code, § 1064, the action of the court in directing the coroner to serve the summons for special venire, if erroneous because no formal showing had been made of the sheriff's disqualification, was favorable to defendant.

22. Jury ⊜31(5)—Provisions for selection of matters of procedure which can be regulated.

The proceeding for the ordering and summoning of a special venire is a matter of procedure which the Legislature can regulate so long as the right of the accused to a fair and impartial trial guaranteed him by the Constitution is protected.

23. Criminal law ⊜1144(8)—Presumed necessary showing was made to authorize special venire, unless minutes show they contained only showing.

If any special showing was necessary to authorize the trial court to order a special venire and to direct the coroner to summon it because of the disqualification of the sheriff, it will be presumed on appeal that such showing was made, where the minutes of the court at the time of entering the order were in the record, but they contained no recital that no showing other than that stated in the minutes was made.

24. Criminal law ⊂1144(11)—Presence of defendant presumed unless record shows contrary.

If the presence of the defendant was necessary at the time the court ordered a special venire to be summoned by the coroner, it will be presumed on appeal in support of the judgment that defendant was present unless the record affirmatively shows that he was not.

25. Criminal law ⊂1186(4)—Errors in summoning jury held not reversible.

If it was error for the court to order a special venire and direct it to be summoned by the coroner because the sheriff was disqualified as a witness without any formal showing, such error was a mere irregularity involving only a matter of procedure which does not require a reversal of the conviction under Const. art. 6, § 4½, where an examination of the entire record including the evidence shows that no miscarriage of justice resulted therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sutter County; K. S. Mahon, Judge.

J. H. Stennett was convicted of the felony of petit larceny after a prior conviction of a like offense under Pen. Code, § 666, and he appeals from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial. Judgment and order affirmed.

M. T. Brittan and W. E. Davies, both of Marysville, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

HART, J. The defendant was charged by an information filed in the superior court in and for the county of Sutter with a felony, consisting of the crime of petit larceny and a prior conviction of a like offense (Pen. Code, § 666), and he brings the case to this court by an appeal from the judgment and the order denying his motion for a new trial.

The property charged to have been stolen by the defendant consisted of automobile tires, three outer casings or tires, and three inner tubes, and were, so it is claimed, taken from the Ford automobile of one A. F. King, a resident of Meridian, Sutter county.

It appears that on the evening of March 5, 1920, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock, Raymond King, a brother of the owner of said automobile, was driving in said car on the road running between the city of Marysville and the town of Meridian when, at a point on said road a distance of about a mile and a quarter from the last-named place, a part of the machinery of the car became so disabled that it could not be made to move, and thereupon said Raymond King left the machine on the roadside at said point, where it remained overnight or until the next morning. At the time that said King left the machine, the tires of the car were on the wheels of the car and in good condition. On the following morning, March 6th, between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock, it was discovered by one of the Kings (the evidence does not show clearly which of the two brothers) that the tires above described had been removed from the wheels of the car and taken away. The larceny was immediately reported to the sheriff of Sutter county, who thereupon, in ferreting out the author of the crime, immediately invoked the assistance of the sheriff of Yuba county, the county seat of said county (the city of Marysville) and the county seat of Sutter county (Yuba City) being only a short distance from each other and divided by the Feather river.

It further appears that the defendant was, at the time the tires were taken, a taxi driver in the city of Marysville, his hours of work at the time in question being in the nighttime, and that, near the hour of 2 o'clock of the morning of the 6th of March, 1920, one Royce Albertson, a resident of the aforesaid town of Meridian, employed the defendant to carry him from Marysville to his (Albertson's) home in said town. Albertson testified that it was about 2 o'clock in the morning when they departed from Marysville; that, while they were going towards Meridian, he saw a car standing on the road about a mile and a quarter east of that town and identified it as the car of A. F. King; that, referring to the stalled car, he remarked to the defendant that "somebody must have run out of gasoline"; that he observed that on the side of the car that he could see, while passing it, the tires were on the wheels; that they proceeded on their way to Meridian without stopping, arriving at his home about 3 o'clock, or about an hour or possibly a little more from the time they left Marysville; that he paid the defendant for his services; and that the latter immediately started on his return to Marysville.

Upon the complaint of A. F. King, a search warrant was issued by a justice of the peace, authorizing the search of the defendant's house. With this process the sheriff of Sutter and Yuba counties went to the home of the defendant, in Marysville, arriving there shortly after noon. The defendant was at home and, on seeing the officers and before the object of their visit was made known to him by them, made a remark to the effect that their presence there was rather expected by him. One of the officers proceeded to read the warrant to him, when he interrupted to say that the tires they were looking for were in his house.

Explaining to the officers his possession of the tires, the defendant stated (so the officers testified) that, while he was on his return to Marysville from Meridian, and as he was crossing a long bridge not far distant from Meridian but beyond the point at which King's car was standing, he observed a car, apparently stalled, on the opposite end of the bridge; that, as he approached said car, he noticed that it was a Ford truck; and that when he reached the point where the car was standing, the owner or man in charge of the car saluted him as follows: "Hello, Jack, do you want to buy some tires?" The defendant, so he proceeded with his explanation, asked the man what his trouble was, and the latter replied that he could not make the truck work. The defendant thereupon alighted from his car and proceeded to make an inspection of the truck, finally discovering and pointing out the reason the truck refused to move. He found, upon examination, that the truck was loaded with a variety of old articles or junk, among which were about 20 or 25 used or second-hand automobile tires. He looked over the tires and picked or selected from the number in the truck the tires referred to and described in the information and therein alleged to be the property of A. F. King. After considerable dickering as to the price, it was agreed that defendant could have the tires he had selected for the total sum of $21. Defendant, so he further explained, paid the man $7.50 in cash, with the understanding that the latter would later that day call at defendant's house and receive the balance of the money, and thereupon, placing the tires in his own car, resumed his journey home. He further stated that he waited for some hours for the man to put in an appearance at his home to receive the balance due for the tires, but that, up to the time the officers called at his house, the vendor of the tires had not called for the money.

The above embraces substantially a statement of the testimony presented by the people.

The defendant, testifying for himself, denied seeing or noticing King's car standing on the roadside as he and Albertson were on their way to Meridian; stated that, as they were within a short distance of Meridian, he heard Albertson make a remark about a car being out of gas, but thought that, because his own car was not running smoothly at about that time, Albertson was referring to his (defendant's) machine; stated that the side curtains were up on his car; that Albertson had very little to say while they were moving along and that from that fact and from the position in which he placed and maintained himself in the seat from the time they left Marysville, he supposed that he (Albertson) was asleep or dozing most of the way; denied seeing King's or any car standing on the roadside when returning to Marysville and denied taking the tires found in his possession from any car; positively denied that he knew or had any previous acquaintance with the man from whom he claimed to have purchased the tires, and denied telling the officers that the seller of the tires addressed or saluted him as "Jack," and denied that he was so addressed by said seller. He stated that, with the exception that he did not say to the officers or either of them that the vendor called him "Jack," the circumstances under which he met the man who sold him the tires were such as were related by him to the officers and to which the officers testified, as above indicated. He testified that he bought the tires from the man referred to for the sum of $21; that he paid down the sum of $7.50 only and that the vendor was to call at his home in Marysville between the hours of 12 and 2 o'clock of the day the sale was made for the balance of the $21. He explained that the reason he said to the officers when they arrived at his house that he expected that they came for the tires he had purchased from the man on the road, was because the vendor had not called for the balance of the purchase price at the hour agreed upon (it was after 1 o'clock p. m., when the officers appeared at defendant's home), and he thereupon became suspicious that the tires had been stolen by the man he bought them of; that he had, before the officers arrived at his home, remarked to his wife that he was afraid that he had bought stolen tires and that he intended to take them to the police office, where he would leave them pending an investigation and determination of whether or not they had been stolen. He further declared that he left Meridian on his return trip to Marysville at about half past 3 o'clock, arriving at the latter place near the hour of 5 o'clock, and in this he was corroborated by a night watchman who saw him when he reached Yuba City. He further expressed the opinion or his best judgment, based upon his experience in that particular, that it would have required at least a half an hour for him to remove the tires from the King car; the inference from this statement being that, if he had stopped to remove and take the tires, he would not have arrived at Marysville as early as he and said night watchman testified that he did.

Taking up in orderly sequence such points urged for a reversal as it is conceived require special consideration, attention first will be given to the proposition, advanced by the defendant, that the trial court erred in denying his challenge to the panel of jurors from which the jury to try his case was selected; and, as to this point, it may in the outset be stated that there is before us no properly authenticated or, indeed, any record upon that particular proceeding authorizing this court to review that question.

It appears that, prior to the day that the case had been set for trial, an order was made by the court for the summoning of a special venire of jurors to try the case, and the court ordered the coroner of the county to serve the summons. On the day on which the case was called up for trial, counsel interposed a challenge to the panel; said challenge being in writing. The grounds thereof were: (1) That there was "a material departure from the forms prescribed (by C. C. P.) in respect to the drawing and return of the jury," in that it was not made to appear that the regular panel of jurors had been exhausted at the time the special venire of 35 jurors (the number ordered to be summoned by the court) "was ordered by the court to serve on the trial of said defendant," it also being claimed that said order for a special venire was made in the absence of the accused from court when said proceeding was had. (2) That, without any showing of the disqualification of the sheriff of Sutter county to serve and summons the special venire, the court ordered that duty be performed by the coroner of that county.

The minutes of the court relating to the orders in question are not reproduced in the transcript containing the record in these appeals, and there is, consequently, nothing in the transcript disclosing upon what showing, if any, the court ordered a special venire of jurors to be summoned to try the case or who were present in court at the time the order was made. In other words, the record as it is presented to us does not disclose that the sheriff was not legally qualified to serve the process for the special venire, nor does it disclose that the defendant was not present in court when that proceeding was had. The only information regarding the proceeding furnished by the record as we have it here is the written challenge to the panel as returned by the coroner interposed by defendant's counsel and the statement of the district attorney, in reply to the challenge so made, that it was made to appear, before the order for the special venire and the order appointing the coroner to serve the process and so secure the attendance of the special jury were made, that there was on the regular panel in the jury box an insufficient number of jurors to secure a jury to try the case and that the sheriff was disqualified from serving the process for the special venire. The district attorney did not state whether the defendant was or was not in court when those orders were made, but he did state that the disqualification of the sheriff consisted in the fact that he was a witness for the people against the defendant. These matters are, however, purely extrajudicial or dehors the record, and cannot be considered in determining whether the challenge was or was not well taken. There is before us, therefore, as before stated, no record upon which we may predicate a consideration of the point now in hand, except to rest our conclusion upon the presumption, which must be indulged where the record is silent as to a vital matter of procedure or there is no affirmative showing that those steps which the law requires shall be taken in a case have not been taken, that all that has been legally required to be done was done as required. The rule "is too well settled in this state to require the citation of authorities that where an appellant alleges error it is incumbent upon him to show it affirmatively, and that we will not presume that a trial judge failed to do what the law required him to do, but, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, will presume that he did what he was directed * * * to do." People v. Russell, 156 Cal. 450, 457, 105 Pac. 416, 419. See, also, People v. Yee Foo, 4 Cal. App. 730, 89 Pac. 450; People v. Holmes, 118 Cal. 444, 449, 50 Pac. 675; People v. Douglass, 100 Cal. 1, 4, 34 Pac. 490. In this case, as before stated, the minutes of the court containing a record of the proceedings of which complaint is made by appellant are not in the record here. What, therefore, those minutes show, we do not know, nor have we any authentic way of finding out. The result is that there is here not only no affirmative showing of error or failure by the court to observe the legal requisites for or the essential legal prerequisites to the making of the orders complained of, but the record is absolutely silent as to what took place in court when the orders were made or who were present at that time. We must presume, therefore, that there was a sufficient legal showing to justify the court in ordering a special venire, and that, upon a like showing, it found that the sheriff was not qualified under the law to serve the writ. It is, of course, not questioned but that if the sheriff was disqualified to summons the special venire it was not only within the power but the duty of the court to require the coroner to perform that duty, if he was not also disqualified. Pol. Code, §§ 4172, 4773, subd. 1; Code Civ. Proc. § 226.

[1, 2] In connection with the point above considered, it is argued that, if the sheriff was disqualified, so were his deputies, and therefore the court erred in placing the jury in charge of one of the sheriff's deputies pending its deliberation upon the case. The point was not made in the court below and cannot for the first time be raised on appeal. Indeed, by his failure to object to the order at the time it was made, the defendant waived any objection which might have been interposed to the order placing the jury in charge of the sheriff's deputy. To a precisely similar point, arising under like circumstances, in the case of People v. Nakis, 193 Pac. 92, the Supreme Court replied:

"While the deputy was, perhaps, technically disqualified by reason of the admitted disqualification of the sheriff from official participation in the proceedings (People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535), no objection to his appointment was raised at the trial, and, in fact, it was at one time suggested by counsel for defendant that the jury be placed in charge of the sheriff himself. The rule that by failing to call the court's attention thereto by timely objection at the trial a defendant in a criminal case may waive his right to object to certain irregularities and errors not basal in their nature has frequently been applied to irregularities in matters concerning the custody and control of the jury. People v. White, 20 Cal. App. 156; People v. Tarm Poi, 86 Cal. 225, 24 Pac. 998; Price v. U. S., 14 App. D. C. 391; Dreyer v. People, 188 Ill. 40, 58 N. E. 620, 59 N. E. 424, 58 L. R. A. 869; Id., 187 U. S. 71, 23 Sup. Ct. 28, 47 L. Ed. 79."

It is further said in the Nakis Case:

"Moreover, in the instant case no attempt has been made to demonstrate that any prejudice has resulted from the error. In the absence of an affirmative showing of prejudice to the defendant, a reversal for irregularities in regard to the custody and management of the jury cannot be had. People v. White, supra; Jarnagin v. State, 18 Tenn. (10 Yerg.) 529; Speer v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. Rep. 297, 123 S. W. 415; Galan v. State, 68 Tex. Cr. Rep. 200, 150 S. W. 1171; Holmes v. State, 70 Tex. Cr. Rep. 214, 156 S. W. 1172."

In the case at bar there is no affirmative showing that the defendant was prejudiced by the act of the court in committing to the deputy sheriff the custody of the jury pending its determination of the verdict.

Next to be considered is the complaint that the court erred to the serious detriment of the rights of the accused by permitting the district attorney, over his objection, to ask on the cross-examination of certain character witnesses introduced by the defendant, whether they had ever heard of the latter having been previously convicted of the crime of petit larceny. The witness Hyde, chairman of the board of supervisors of Yuba county, having stated, in reply to a question by an attorney for the defense as to the defendant's general reputation for "truth, honesty, and integrity" in the city of Marysville, where the latter had continuously resided for some fifteen years, that such reputation was good, was asked by the district attorney, on cross-examination, among other like questions, whether he had ever heard that defendant had, previously to the commission of the larceny charged in the information, suffered a conviction of the crime of petit larceny in San Joaquin county, which question the witness answered in the negative.

The prior conviction charged in the information is therein alleged to have taken place "in the justice's court of Elkhorn township, in the county of San Joaquin," this state. Section 1025 of the Penal Code provides, inter alia:

"In case the defendant pleads not guilty, and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction [a prior conviction being charged in the accusatory pleading], the charge of the previous conviction must not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial."

The point here made is that, by asking the witness Hyde whether he had ever heard of the defendant having been convicted of the crime of petit larceny in San Joaquin county the district attorney violated the provision of section 1025 of the Penal Code above quoted, the said question to said witness involving, it is argued, an allusion, in the presence of the jury, to the prior conviction charged in the information, the truth of which the defendant had, upon his arraignment, acknowledged.

[3] Evidence of the good reputation of a person on trial for a crime is valuable, as a rule, only in those cases where the guilt of the accused is required to be established, if at all, wholly by means of circumstantial evidence, the theory being that evidence of the good reputation of the defendant for the trait or traits of character necessarily involved in the charge in the community where he has resided for a sufficient period to acquire a general reputation as to such trait or traits may be sufficient to overturn the effect of the incriminatory circumstances proved against him, or so to diminish, as in their application to him, the inculpatory force of such circumstances as that thereby a reasonable doubt of his guilt may be created. Such testimony is, in its nature, of a hearsay species, being based upon what the people of the community generally say of the accused, taken out of the rule of exclusion as to such testimony, however, because of the jealous consideration which the law has for the rights of a citizen when his right to life or liberty is, for some infraction of that self-same law, duly and regularly challenged in a judicial proceeding appropriated by the law to that purpose. Such testimony, while not involving a very high character of exculpatory proof where one is charged with and on trial for a crime, is, nevertheless, of that peculiar character which is likely to have a more far-reaching effect upon the just rights of the parties in the trial than it is actually entitled to exert, unless it is so sifted and its stability so tested before the case is given to the jury as to keep it down to the standard of its real probative function and abstract probative value. The testimony of a witness that, as to certain indicated traits of character, a defendant on trial bears a good reputation generally in the community in which he resides or has resided, necessarily implies that the defendant's personal character, as to those traits, is such that it is most likely he would not commit the crime charged against him, and likewise implies that the witness giving such testimony has never heard anything to the contrary as to such defendant in such community, or has never heard or known of the defendant having been accused of acts which, if committed by him, would not only tend to prove that he was not a man of good general reputation but would stamp him as a man of bad character. It is true that a witness giving such testimony concerning a defendant cannot, on direct examination, detail or refer to specific acts tending to show the defendant's personal character and consequently his general reputation to be good. He may only answer the general question in a general or a categorical way, but, having declared such reputation to be good, it is then within the legal province of the other side (the district attorney in a criminal case) to prosecute an inquiry by cross-examination of the witness as to the basis of his statement that the general reputation of the defendant is good, and to that end he is entitled to and should be given the privilege of asking the witness about any fact or circumstance adversely affecting the defendant's personal character, as, for instance, whether he knew or had ever heard of the defendant being previously convicted of, charged with or accused of or arrested for other crimes, and this not for the purpose of proving against the accused the commission of other crimes, or merely of prejudicing the defendant in the minds of the jury, but only to weaken or destroy the force of the direct testimony of the witness that the general reputation of the defendant for the traits involved in the inquiry was good and at the same time remove from the case, as far as it may so be done, such testimony as an evidential factor to be considered in determining the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant. The rule has often been, in different language, so stated and explained. The case of People v. Burke, 18 Cal. App. 72, 88, 89, 122 Pac. 435, exhaustively considers the rule and, besides an independent discussion and exposition thereof and the principle supporting it, braces the conclusion therein arrived at, and with which the views above expressed harmonize, by a throng of authorities.

[4] We know of no exception to that rule, unless it can be successfully maintained that an exception must be recognized in a case to which the provision quoted above from section 1025 of the Penal Code is applicable. But, in view of the above considerations, we can conceive of no sound reason for holding such exception exists or that the Legislature could have so intended. The evident intent of said provision is that, where a prior conviction is charged against a defendant and he has, upon his arraignment, admitted such prior conviction, he shall not be prejudiced thereby in the minds of the jury, in its consideration of the case as to the subsequent offense charged, by a gratuitous and an unnecessary allusion thereto at the trial by the district attorney or the court. In the instant case, however, the defendant himself made the question of his general reputation as a man of good character, in so far as the traits or elements of personal character involved in the charge against him are concerned, an issue in the case by voluntarily introducing testimony tending to establish for him a good general reputation for said traits. The issue was presented upon his own initiative; no attack upon his character, other than that inhering in the charge against him, having previously been made. We may presume that he introduced and pressed that issue with full knowledge that thus he was inviting a full and minute examination by the district attorney into the basis of the testimony of any witness declaring such reputation to be good, and that any such witness, for the purpose only of impeaching the force of his direct testimony, could properly be asked whether he knew of prior specific acts that the defendant had either committed or been accused of which would not comport with the declaration of the witness that the general reputation of the defendant was good.

[5] The provision of the Penal Code safeguarding a defendant charged with a prior conviction of a public offense, who upon his arraignment admitted such a conviction, against the detrimental consequences which are apt to follow reference thereto in the presence of the jury, is not basal or fundamental, but only a statutory regulation in the trial of such a case, and therefore it must be held that the defendant in this case, by opening up himself the question of his good reputation, waived his right to the protection of the provision of the Penal Code referred to, in so far as it was necessary for the district attorney to transcend that right in an attempt to destroy the force of the direct testimony of witnesses produced by him to bolster up his personal character for the traits involved in the charge against him. If the protection guaranteed to a defendant by the provision of the Penal Code in question were by the Constitution, a different proposition might then be presented in a case such as this; but, as before declared, it is a statutory provision and must be read and understood with the qualification that when the defendant himself voluntarily invites inquiry into his personal character for traits involved in the charge against him, as well as in the offense of which he was previously convicted, as also charged, by introducing testimony tending to establish a good general reputation for such traits, he must be held to have challenged inquiry, in this collateral way, into every wrongful act involving such traits which previously he may have committed or been accused of, for the purpose of destroying the force of the testimony of witnesses testifying to his good general reputation, and it must be held that the operation of the provision of the Penal Code referred to is, in such case, in the very nature of the situation, for that purpose, suspended or put in abeyance.

[6] The district attorney, in his argument to the jury, referred to the fact that certain of the character witnesses had admitted or testified that they had heard of the defendant having been previously convicted of petit larceny, and also of his having been previously accused of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder, grand larceny, and perjury. It is claimed that, even if the cross-examination (above considered) of the defendant's character witnesses was permissible, still the district attorney went beyond proper and legitimate argument in referring to the prior offense and those of which he had been accused. Except for the purpose of showing by argument that the defendant failed to establish a good general reputation, we think the district attorney was not at liberty to refer in his address to the jury to the past record of the accused; and, as we read that officer's argument, as it is embodied in the transcript, he went no farther than that. He was discussing the question of the credibility of the defendant's testimony and comparing it to that of certain witnesses for the prosecution as to matters as to which there was a variance between the testimony of the former and that of the latter, and pointed out, in his own way, how, in his opinion, the defendant not only failed to show a good reputation, but had by his own course at the trial opened the door for the prosecution to show that, as a matter of fact, he had a bad reputation for those traits inhering in the charge set forth in the information. We doubt not that the prosecuting officer thus kept himself within the sphere of legitimate argument.

There is a large number of other assignments of error, involving rulings of the court on evidence; but all of these, with the exception of one, to which we will next give special notice, we have found, upon examination, to possess no substantial merit, and therefore require no specific consideration herein.

[7, 8] The witness Johnson, for the defendant, was asked if he knew the general reputation of the accused, in Marysville and vicinity, "for truth, honesty, and integrity," to which question he replied in the affirmative. When asked whether it was good or bad, the district attorney interposed before an answer was returned to the question and asked permission to ask the witness some preliminary questions to ascertain whether he did know such general reputation and was qualified to testify to it. The district attorney brought out the fact from the witness that he had never, previously to the time of the filing of the charges against defendant of stealing the tires described in the information, heard the latter's reputation for the traits mentioned discussed, and the court thereupon ruled that the witness was incompetent to give testimony as to the general reputation of the defendant, and the witness did not answer the question whether such reputation was good or bad. It is argued that the ruling was erroneous and prejudicial. We think the witness, having said that he knew the defendant's general reputation, etc., should have been permitted, also, to say whether it was good or bad. It does not necessarily follow from the fact that a person has not heard another's character discussed in the community in which he has resided for a number of years that he does not know or cannot say that he knows such other person's general reputation in such community for the traits of character germane to such inquiry. The fact that no reproach has ever been heard or known to have been uttered against the character of a person generally known in a community in which he has for many years resided may be the very highest evidence that the general reputation of such person in such community is good. Generally speaking, it is the man addicted to the commission of bad or wrongful acts whose character is generally discussed by those who know him, while, on the other hand, a person who has lived a uniformly exemplary life in all respects is one whose character is not often spoken of. But be that as it may, as stated, the court should have allowed Johnson to answer the question whether the defendant's general reputation in Marysville was good or bad (First National Bank v. Wolff, 79 Cal. 69, 21 Pac. 551, 748), and the fact that the witness had never heard defendant's reputation or character discussed could have been brought out by the people as a fact to be considered by the jury in determining whether it affected the weight of the witness' testimony, and, if so, to what extent. We are, however, firmly of the opinion that, since there were several other witnesses who testified to the good general reputation of the defendant, which would make Johnson's testimony, if allowed, merely cumulative as to that fact, the action of the court with respect to said witness' testimony could not have had the effect of prejudicing the substantial rights of the accused. Moreover, as we shall later particularly point out and, indeed, as we think the above recital of the facts shows, the evidence of the defendant's guilt is such that it cannot justly be held that the error referred to has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½; Vallejo, etc., R. R. Co. v. Reed Orchard Co., 169 Cal. 545, 147 Pac. 238.

[9] The instruction given in this case, defining and amplifying the doctrine of reasonable doubt, is criticized by the defendant. The criticism is that the court told the jury that a reasonable doubt could only arise from the evidence actually produced in the case, and that, consequently, such a doubt could not be created through or by want of evidence. But an instruction in precisely the same language as the instruction here assailed was critically considered and sustained as involving a correct exposition of the doctrine in People v. Del Cerro, 9 Cal. App. 764, 771, 100 Pac. 887, the Supreme Court having denied an application for the hearing of the case by it after decision by this court, and we here refer to that case for an answer to the argument here against the soundness of the instruction.

Instruction No. 7, after stating that while the mere unexplained possession of stolen property is not of itself sufficient to justify a conviction, such possession is nevertheless a circumstance which may be considered in connection with other testimony in determining the question of the guilt of the accused, declared that there must be, in addition to the proof of possession, proof of corroborating circumstances tending in themselves to establish guilt. This language of the instruction is followed by a statement of specific circumstances, the existence of which could well be inferred from the evidence in this case, which, it was stated, could be considered as corroborative of the circumstance of the unexplained possession of the stolen property, and the instruction concludes as follows: "and any and all other acts or circumstances tending to show the guilt of the accused."

[10, 11] The criticism of the instruction is directly aimed at the italicized language, and of it it is said that in effect it invited consideration by the jury of facts, acts, and circumstances not brought out by the evidence. The criticism is unjust. The instruction must be read and considered in its entirety and in connection with and by the light of the general charge of the court, and as so considered, as obviously the jury considered it, the language criticized plainly means such other acts or circumstances as were shown by the evidence as tending to show the guilt of the accused. The court, in a preceding instruction, told the jury that the question as to what facts had been proved and whether the defendant was or was not guilty must be determined by them "from a consideration of the testimony admitted at the trial," and the language of the instruction condemned by the defendant must be and undoubtedly by the jury was considered as referring only to acts or circumstances shown by "the testimony admitted at the trial." The above instruction is further assailed because it stated that—

"The defendant is bound to explain the innocent possession in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence discloses any such."

This language of the instruction followed the statement in the same instruction that—"If the jury believe the property was stolen, and was seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen," etc.

Considered as a whole, we understand the instruction merely to mean that, if the property was stolen and in the possession of the defendant immediately after it was stolen, to remove the incriminatory effect of those circumstances as against him, he would be required to explain that his possession was innocent or honestly brought about. As so understood, we can see nothing wrong in the instruction. Indeed, if it be the law, as undoubtedly it is, that the unexplained possession of stolen property soon after it is stolen, while in itself not sufficient to convict, may nevertheless be regarded as an incriminatory circumstance against the accused, then, quite logically, it follows that, to remove the incriminatory effect of the circumstances as against him, it is incumbent upon the accused to explain that his possession was innocent.

[12, 13] We have examined instructions Nos. 13 and 14 and have found no substantial objection to them. No. 13 simply means that, when circumstantial evidence is wholly relied upon to prove the defendant's connection with the commission of the crime, any relevant fact or circumstance leading to or surrounding the fact of the commission of such crime may be shown and considered by the jury. The instruction, it may be said, is not in graceful language, but at the most it hardly more than states a commonplace. No. 14 fairly well explains the distinction between direct and circumstantial evidence, correctly declares that guilt may be established by means of either, and emphasizes the obvious proposition that, to justify a conviction on circumstantial evidence, there must be produced in the minds of the jury the same degree of certainty as to the defendant's guilt as is required where direct evidence is relied upon.

[14] Instruction No. 6 very clearly explained how or in what manner the jury should consider the evidence and the testimony of any witness testifying in the case, also explaining the tests whereby the credibility of any witness might be determined by the jury, and concludes with the statement that a witness is presumed to speak the truth, that such presumption may be repelled by the manner in which he testifies, "his interest in the case, if any, or his bias, or prejudice, if any," etc. The words in quotation constitute the foundation for the contention by defendant that the instruction enters upon the domain of fact. With the exception of those words, the instruction is in the language of section 1847 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but the instruction, as so given, is general or abstract and refers to no particular witness and, with the added words indicated, has often been given and very properly held not to be obnoxious to the objection registered against it here. See People v. Amaya, 134 Cal. 531, 546, 66 Pac. 794; People v. Sheffield, 9 Cal. App. 130, 98 Pac. 67.

[15] Instruction No. 10 is in the precise language of subdivision 1 of section 7 of the Penal Code, defining the legal meaning of the word "willfully" as applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, and includes the following language which is that of the concluding clause of said section:

"It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire an advantage."

This language, it is claimed, states a proposition contradictory to the rule, stated by the court to the jury in a preceding part of its charge, that—

"In every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence." Pen. Code, § 20.

[16] The instruction, with the language complained of embodied therein, is really misleading and should never be given; but the instruction involves only an abstract statement of a rule of law as it is declared by the Legislature, and, in view of the fact that the evidence is amply sufficient to warrant the inference that the defendant took the property in question with the intent to steal it (which, it seems to us, in a sense involves an intent to violate the law), and in view of the further consideration that the court instructed the jury in the language of section 20 of the Penal Code, we think it is very clear that the defendant could have suffered no prejudice from said instruction, and we so hold.

[17] The last point which it is conceived necessary to consider is that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. We think the recital of the facts in the outset of this opinion is of itself sufficient to refute this contention.

[18] It is true, as has been above intimated, that the mere unexplained possession of stolen property is not of itself sufficient to establish the guilt of the possessor thereof, although a circumstance tending to show guilt, to be considered with any other proved facts or circumstances having a like tendency. In this case, however, there are many cicuumstances, other than the possession of the stolen property by the defendant, which are strongly indicative of his guilt and, with the circumstance of possession, sufficient, if the jury believed them to be true, to sustain the conclusion that the defendant committed the larceny charged. His alleged purchase of the tires under the circumstances claimed and detailed by him; his selection, in the nighttime, out of 20 or 25 tires, the very tires stolen from King's car; the fact that the alleged vendor was willing to let him (a perfect stranger, he testified) have tires sold for $21 upon payment down of only $7.50, with the understanding that such vendor would call at his (defendant's) house for the balance of the purchase price later that day; the failure of the alleged seller to call at the appointed time for such balance; the statement of the officers that the defendant told them that, upon meeting the alleged seller in the dark at the end of the bridge, the latter familiarly addressed him as "Jack," and the further fact that defendant on the stand declared that he made no such statement to the officers; the fact that defendant passed and was near the point on the roadside where the King car stood—these and other circumstances which it is not necessary to restate were matters for the jury to consider in connection with the fact of the defendant's possesson of the stolen property, and all, it must be admitted, are of the most incriminatory nature as against the accused.

We have examined and considered such of the points, of which there are many, as we have conceived called for special notice with a minuteness which the briefs and the importance of said points appear to us to have demanded, and our conclusion is, as must be apparent from the foregoing discussion, that the result reached below should not be disturbed.

The judgment and the order are, accordingly, affirmed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

HART, J. The defendant asks for a rehearing of his appeal, basing his petition on the sole ground that this court, in treating the points urged by him that error was made in the ordering of a special venire of jurymen to try his case, and in the making of the order, because of the disqualification of the sheriff, that the coroner serve the process for the special jury, grounded its conclusion thereon upon a misapprehension of the record. In the original opinion it was stated:

"The minutes of the court relating to the orders in question are not reproduced in the transcript containing the record in these appeals, and there is, consequently, nothing in the transcript disclosing upon what showing, if any, the court ordered a special venire of jurors to be summoned to try the case or who were present in court at the time the order was made."

Upon a re-examination of the transcript we find that we were mistaken in declaring that the minutes pertaining to the orders in question were not contained in the transcript, that portion of the transcript having in some way been overlooked by the writer of the opinion in the original investigation.

It appears from the transcript that, prior to the day previously fixed for the trial of the accused, the district attorney stated in open court that there were remaining but 28 names in the jury box of jurors summoned on the regular panel, "some of whom are not now living in the county," and others of whom "had been drawn and examined in the two previous trials of said case" (two previous mistrials of the defendant on the charge stated in the information having been had), "others legally disqualified on account of deafness, and not being able to understand the English language, and at least two of them mothers with infant children at their breasts"; that the sheriff of the county, who had testified at the two previous trials as a witness to material and incriminating facts against the defendant, would be called as a witness against the defendant again at the ensuing trial, and asked that, in view of the disqualification of the sheriff to summon a special panel, the coroner of Sutter county be appointed as an elisor to summon a special jury to try the case. It further likewise appears:

"The court met at 2 p. m. Present: Hon. K. S. Mahon, judge; Albert Brown, clerk; the district attorney and the sheriff."

It does not appear from the minutes whether the defendant was or was not present.

As shown in the original opinion, the attorney for the defendant, on the day that the case was called for trial, interposed a challenge to the panel on the grounds that the order for the special venire was made in the absence of a showing that the regular panel had been exhausted or so reduced numerically as to require a special venire and that the order appointing the coroner to perform the duty of summoning the special venire was made in the absence of a showing of the sheriff's disqualification to serve the process for the special venire. It is also argued in the briefs filed on behalf of defendant that it does not appear from the minutes that the defendant was present when the said orders were made. There was no other showing made by the defendant on the challenge than that involved in the mere written challenge itself.

We are still of the opinion that there is not before us a record upon the proceedings resulting in the making of the orders complained of which warrants a review of the objections to the action of the court with regard to the matters referred to.

[19-21] In the first place, we remark that we know of no provision of law prescribing a particular or a formal procedure whereby a special venire of jurors shall be ordered, nor do we know of any provision for such procedure in the appointment of the coroner or an elisor to summons a special venire of jurors because of the disqualification of the sheriff to perform that duty. Ordinarily, the ordering of a special venire in a particular case is done in the course of the trial —that is, of course, before a jury to try the cause has been completed and the regular panel has been exhausted without securing a jury. And it is generally then, where it transpires that the sheriff is for any legal reasons disqualified from summoning the special veniremen, that the court orders either the coroner or an elisor to serve the process. We think we can safely say that in almost all such cases the court acts, not upon any formal showing, but upon its own knowledge of the situation with respect to the trial. It is to be conceded that (so far as the writer of this opinion knows) the ordering of a special venire for a particular case and the appointment of the coroner or an elisor to summons the special jury before the trial has begun constitute an unusual proceeding; but we know of no legal objection to it. In such a case, however, it seems to us that when it has been made to appear satisfactorily to the court, howsoever informal the showing may be (there being, as stated, no formal procedure prescribed for conducting such a proceeding), that a special venire will be required in a case not yet on trial, but about to come to trial, and that the sheriff is legally disqualified from summoning the special jury, the court, exercising a lawful jurisdiction and power, is then authorized to make the order for the special venire and an order naming the coroner or appointing an elisor to serve the process for the special veniremen. In fact, we know of no reason why the court may not in such a case act largely if not altogether upon its own knowledge of the situation, and, as it undoubtedly may in the case where the trial is actually on, make the orders sua sponte. Indeed, if the court was invested with knowledge of the fact that the sheriff was disqualified from summoning the special venire because of bias and prejudice against the defendant in a criminal case, it would be its duty, as a matter of common justice, to commit the duty of serving the process for a special jury to act in the defendant's case to some other proper person. The minutes of the court and, in fact, the record of the trial, show that the sheriff was a witness against the defendant at two previous trials of the charge stated in the information and that he was to be and was a witness against the accused in the third trial, which resulted in a verdict of guilty, and in all the trials gave testimony tending strongly to show the defendant's guilt. Clearly, then, it was made to appear that the sheriff was disqualified from serving the process for the special jury (Code Civ. Proc. § 602, subd. 4; People v. Le Doux, 155 Cal. 535, 542, 102 Pac. 517), and if that officer had summoned the special venire, a challenge to the panel could have been successfully interposed on the ground of the bias of the sheriff (Pen. Code, § 1064; People v. Le Doux, supra), and obviously, it was in the interest of and for the special benefit of the defendant, and in his interest and for his benefit alone, that the order appointing the coroner to take the place of the sheriff as the server of the special jury process was made—a duty which conferred upon the coroner, as it is by law conferred upon the sheriff, where he summons a special venire, the power of selecting the persons to be returned under the process. And so it is to be said that, even if there was an irregularity in the proceedings culminating in the orders complained of, particularly that devolving upon the coroner the duty of serving the special process, in point of fact the defendant could not have been prejudiced by that order or the manner in which it was made, unless it transpired that the coroner, too, was biased and prejudiced against the defendant. There was, though, no showing that the coroner was biased against the accused or that he was disqualified legally from serving the summons. In fact, the defendant made no extrinsic showing whatsoever in support of his challenge to the panel. In other words, the defendant did not show, by affidavits or otherwise, except by reference to the minutes of the court, what actually took place when the orders were made, if, in fact, anything more than said minutes disclose did then take place.

[22] The whole proceeding involved in this discussion was merely one of procedure. The Constitution, it is true, guarantees the right of trial by jury as that institution was known to the common law, and thus the right inheres in all criminal cases amounting to felonies. That right cannot, of course, be denied to a defendant in such a case by legislative fiat, nor can the Legislature by the procedure it adopts for the enforcement of the right impair its exercise in any degree. But the Legislature may regulate the procedure by which the right is enforced or exercised. All that a defendant in a criminal or a litigant in a civil case is entitled to, so far as that right is concerned, is to a trial by a fair and impartial jury. He is entitled to no more—he cannot be denied any less. The provisions of the law authorizing the selection of special venires and the appointment of the coroner or an elisor to summons such special veniremen are designed to preserve to litigants in civil and defendants in criminal cases the full efficacy of the constitutional guaranty of a jury trial. Those provisions and the method of enforcing them are, as stated, purely procedural in their nature, and this the Legislature is legally competent to regulate, and has so regulated it as not to impinge in the least upon the basal right. It is plainly manifest in this case that the action of the court in the proceeding with which we are here concerned, particularly in the matter of committing to the coroner of the county the duty of summoning the special jury, was, as before stated, not only in the interest of justice but for the sole benefit of the defendant, who was entitled to have the jury by which he was to be tried composed of persons fair and impartial as to his case. He was therefore entitled, not only as a matter of common justice, but by the express mandate of the law, to have the special jury selected by a person not directly interested in the prosecution of the case against him—not by one who the law declares is to be regarded as entertaining bias and prejudice against him. And the fact that the court, having knowledge of the situation, and to the end that the party serving the process for the special venire would be wholly disinterested in the case and not biased and prejudiced against the accused and that the defendant might be given that fair and impartial trial to which he was entitled, "took time by the forelock" and in advance of the day fixed for the trial provided for the special jury and the summoning thereof in the manner indicated, cannot be said to be more than an irregularity in procedure, even if that, but if that, the only effect thereof was, without detrimentally affecting the substantial rights of the accused, to save the time, trouble, and delay which would necesariy have attended similar action after the trial had been begun and while in progress; for safely may we venture the conjecture that had the sheriff instead of the coroner selected the special venire, either before or in the course of the trial, the defendant, upon the return of the process by that official, would have challenged the panel on the ground of the bias of the sheriff and, of course, under the circumstances of this case as revealed by the record of the trial, the court would have been required to sustain the challenge.

[23] Nor can it avail the defendant anything by a consideration of the points under discussion upon the theory, as assumed by him, that, in order to clothe the court with authority to make the orders in question, it was necessary that a showing be made by affidavits or some other mode of proof of the existence of the conditions upon which only may a special venire be ordered and the coroner designated to serve the process for such venire because of the disqualification of the sheriff. If such a showing be required in such cases, then the reply to the defendant's position that the court was without authority to make said orders is, as before pointed out, that the record does not affirmatively disclose or show whether any other showing than that indicated by the minutes above referred to was or was not made. The transcript does not contain a statement that the minutes contained and revealed the only showing that was made in the proceedings eventuating in the making of the orders. It follows, then, that it must be presumed, as we declared in the original opinion, that all the legal steps essential to the giving the court the right to exercise and apply its jurisdiction to order a special venire and to find that the sheriff was disqualified and thereupon to appoint the coroner to summons the special venire were regularly taken. The presumptions applicable to this situation (we are now merely assuming that the position of defendant as to the showing that should be made in such matters is sound) are that official duty has been regularly performed, and that a court or judge, acting as such, was regularly acting in the lawful exercise of its or his jurisdiction and of the power vested by law in it or him as to any particular proceeding. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subds. 15 and 16. In other words, if the law contemplates that there must be, before the court is authorized to order a special venire and to designate the coroner as the server of the process for such venire in the place of the sheriff, some showing by way of proof of the existence of conditions justifying the making of such orders, then, in the absence of an affirmative statement in the record that the minutes of the proceeding resulting in the making of the orders contain all the showing that was made and upon which the orders were predicated, the presumption would be that whatever showing was required by the law to be made as a prerequisite to the making of the orders was regularly and duly made.

[24] As to the declaration of the defendant that he was not present in court when said orders were made and that, consequently, the orders were void, we first desire to be understood as not deciding that his presence at the time mentioned was either necessary or unnecessary. It is to be suggested that parties to civil actions or the defendants in criminal cases are never present or by law required to be present when a regular panel of jurors is drawn, and we mention this only for the purpose of showing that the Legislature never regarded the presence of the parties litigant in court when that proceeding is carried on as important or as affecting their substantial rights at the trial. Generally, however, when a special venire is ordered the trial is in progress, and it may be that the action of the court in ordering a special venire and in appointing the coroner to serve the process for the special jury, where it appears that the sheriff is disqualified from performing that service, is to be regarded as a part of the trial. But, however that may all be, and without deciding whether the defendant should or should not be present in court when such a proceeding is had, the reply to the point predicated upon that proposition in this case is to be found in what we have above had to say regarding the ordering of a special venire and the appointment of the coroner to summon it, since there is no affirmative showing in the record that the defendant was not in court at the time referred to. The record neither shows that he was then present nor shows that he was not present in court. Therefore, if his presence in court at that time was essential to the validity of the proceedings, upon the presumption of the due regularity of the proceedings, it must be assumed, in the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary, that he was present in court when the orders were made.

[25] We may suggest, in conclusion, that assuming that the proceedings complained of were irregular, we can conceive of no reason why section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution is not applicable; the said proceedings involving only a matter of procedure and it appearing to our minds, after an examination of the entire record, including the evidence, that a miscarriage of justice has not resulted therefrom.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

PEOPLE ex rel. JONES et al. v. CARDIFF IRR. DIST. OF SAN DIEGO COUNTY.

(Civ. 3403.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 7, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 7, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⊂=224—Irrigation district a municipal corporation, though duties and powers are limited.

The legal status of an irrigation district is that of a municipal corporation, although its duties and powers are of narrower scope in the subjects of their action than in the case of a city or other municipal organization.

2. Waters and water courses ⊂=225—Law as to proceedings for organization of irrigation districts to be liberally construed.

So far as proceedings for the organization of irrigation districts are concerned, a reasonably liberal rule of construction should be adopted to carry out the wise purposes of the law, and the same rule of construction should be applied to provisions of the statute which cover the changing of boundaries of a district.

and the annexation of additional territory (Irrigation District Act, §§ 85–97).

3. Waters and water courses ⟸226—Irrigation district without water supply may legally enlarge boundaries.

An irrigation district, organized under the Irrigation District Act and amendments thereto (St. 1897, p. 254, St. 1915, p. 1367, St. 1917, p. 751, Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, p. 701, and Consolidated Supplement of 1917–19, p. 1282), could change its boundaries and enlarge the district under sections 85–97, although it did not own or possess any water supply for irrigation purposes, original proposed source having failed or having been abandoned, and new sources of water supply being contemplated.

4. Constitutional law ⟸278(2)—Waters and water courses ⟸226—Owner of property being taken into irrigation district not entitled to notice under due process of law provision of Constitution.

The requirement of the Constitution as to due process of law does not give a property owner an absolute right to notice and hearing before his property may be included within the limits of an irrigation district on petition for change of boundaries under Irrigation District Act, §§ 85–97.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

5. Waters and water courses ⟸226—No jurisdiction in board of directors under petition for change of boundaries of irrigation district where land taken in was not contiguous.

A petition under Irrigation District Act, §§ 85–97, for change of boundaries and inclusion of additional lands in an irrigation district did not vest in the board of directors any jurisdiction over the proceeding where the description of the boundaries of the land proposed to be included, as set forth in the petition, clearly exhibited the fact that the lands were not contiguous and did not, taken together or at all, constitute one tract of land, and an order of inclusion, as well as the intervening steps in the proceeding, were void.

6. Waters and water courses ⟸226 — Lands attempted to be included in irrigation district held not contiguous.

Parcels of land separated by a lagoon from a quarter of a mile to three-quarters of a mile in width were not contiguous, and a petition, under Irrigation District Act, §§ 85–97, attempting to include them in an existing irrigation district, did not give board of directors any jurisdiction, and an order of inclusion and intervening steps in the proceeding were void; the nature of the land underlying the lagoon being such that it could not appropriately be made part of an irrigation district, even though the petition included such lagoon in its description.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People of the State of California, on the relation of George H. Jones and others, against the Cardiff Irrigation District of San Diego County. Judgment for defendant, and relators appeal. Reversed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., S. D. O'Neal, of San Diego, and Charles H. Taylor, Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellants.

Charles C. Crouch, Claude L. Chambers, and Crouch & Chambers, all of San Diego, and Henry J. Stevens, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Quo warranto. By order of the board of supervisors of the county of San Diego, under date of March 20, 1916, respondent herein was organized as an irrigation district, in compliance with the provisions of the California Irrigation District Act and amendments thereto. Stats. 1897, p. 254; Stats. 1915, p. 1367; Stats. 1917, p. 751; also in Deering's Gen. Laws, 1915, p. 701; and Consolidated Supplement of 1917–19, p. 1282. As originally formed, the district contained about 1,000 acres of land. By subsequent proceedings the area thereof was reduced to 616.8 acres. Thereafter, on the 14th day of October, 1918, a petition was filed with the board of directors of the district praying for a change of boundaries of the district so as to include therein the lands described in the petition, which additional lands contained 25,751 acres. This petition was signed by the owners of more than one-half of the territory which they sought to have included within the district. Thereafter, on the 23d day of December, 1918, the board of directors of the district passed its resolution No. 44, purporting to change the boundaries of the district by including therein said additional area, in accordance with the prayer of said petition. All of the proceedings, from the filing of the petition to and including the final order of inclusion, were in accordance with the form of such proceedings as set forth in section 85 et seq. of the California Irrigation District Act. This action is prosecuted for the purpose of obtaining a judgment that said petition for change of boundaries and inclusion of land and all of the proceedings had thereunder are null and void, that the defendant is unlawfully exercising the franchise of an irrigation district over the lands described in the petition, and that defendant be ousted and excluded from exercising any power or franchise as an irrigation district over said lands or any part thereof. Judgment was entered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal therefrom.

Appellants' first point, as stated by their counsel, is that the thing attempted to be accomplished by the inclusion proceedings is not, within the meaning and intent of the Irrigation District Act, the enlarging of an existing district, but is in all substantial respects the creation of a new district. In effect, the contention is that at the time of filing the annexation petition and during the pendency of the proceedings thereunder, notwithstanding that respondent had been organized as an irrigation district, it was not in reality an existing district, and therefore was not a district which the law intended to vest with authority to increase its territory by such proceedings as those here challenged by appellants. The claim is that the irrigation enterprise on which the original organization was based had wholly failed; that the district did not own or possess any water supply for irrigation purposes; that the district had become a mere legal shell, without substance and fit only for dissolution; and that a district in that condition is not legally capable of saving its existence by bringing in other lands and thereby acquiring actual capacity to function as an irrigation district by the development of new sources of water supply not contemplated in the original organization.

The proceedings which must be followed in the organization of an irrigation district are set forth in the first 12 sections of the Irrigation District Act. Those proceedings are conducted by and under the supervision of the board of supervisors of the county in which the district is to be located. In the course of those proceedings the board of supervisors is empowered to receive and consider a report from the state engineer concerning the supply of water available for the use of the proposed district, and is authorized to make such changes as it may deem advisable in the boundaries proposed by the petition presented to it by the required number of property owners within the proposed district. When the board of supervisors, in the exercise of the authority vested in it by the statute, shall have made the necessary preliminary orders, it is required to give notice of an election, at which the electors within the boundaries of the proposed district shall by their votes determine whether or not the district shall be organized. It is only after such an election is duly canvassed and a declaration of the result duly made by the board of supervisors that, if the necesssary favorable vote has been obtained, the organization of the district becomes complete.

Sections 85 to 97 of the same act provide for changing the boundaries of an irrigating district and the inclusion of other lands therein. None of these proceedings are submitted to the board of supervisors of the county. Inclusion proceedings are initiated by petition filed with the board of directors of the district. The required notice of such filing and of the proposed hearing thereon is given and published by the secretary of the board of directors. All of the successive steps of the process are conducted by that board or under its supervision, and all orders made, including the final order of inclusion, are made by the board of directors. The election, which under certain contingencies is required to be held to determine whether the boundaries of the district shall be changed, is an election solely by the electors within the existing district. The argument for appellants rests in part upon these and other striking differences between the proceedings for the organization of a new district and the proceedings for the inclusion of lands by annexation thereof to an existing district.

The lands constituting the territory of the Cardiff irrigation district, as it existed prior to these inclusion proceedings, are located near the shore of the Pacific Ocean. The lands which are claimed to have been annexed lie south, east, and north of the old district and extend along the coast in such form that there is a distance of about 18 miles between the southerly limits and the northerly limits thereof. Section 1 of the Irrigation District Act, in designating the necessary conditions on which the organization of an irrigation district may be proposed, provides for the presentation of such proposition by a required number of holders of "lands susceptible of irrigation from a common source and by the same system of works (including pumping from subsurface or other waters)." Section 2 requires that the petition "shall set forth the boundaries of the proposed district, and also shall state, generally, the source [or sources which may be in the alternative] from which said lands are proposed to be irrigated, * * * and shall pray that the territory embraced within the boundaries of the proposed district may be organized as an irrigation district under the provisions of this act." In the petition for the formation of the Cardiff irrigation district it was stated:

"That the source from which the said lands are proposed to be irrigated are from the storage of surface water and from water-bearing sands and underground streams and percolating waters of the Escondido creek at a point situate two miles distant from the said irrigation district, or to be utilized by means of wells, reservoirs, pumping and distributing plants, and storage and distributing reservoirs to be acquired and installed by the said district, or water to be leased or purchased for delivery into storage and distributing systems of the said district from persons, companies, associations, or corporations furnishing water for irrigation to consumers."

Prior to the time of the inclusion proceedings respondent abandoned its plan for obtaining water from the Escondido creek source. It had acquired a pumping plant and three wells on the Encinitas creek, located about two miles away from the Cardiff village. This water was used for domestic and garden purposes in the village, but not for irrigating lands set to crops. In accordance with the evidence of these facts the trial court determined, by finding XIII:

"That the said Cardiff irrigation district before the inclusion of said annexed territory did not own or possess any water supply or any system of waterworks or any means or source of obtaining water for irrigation of its own area or any part of said area, save and except that said irrigation district possessed a pumping plant from which water was and is pumped from wells sufficient in quantity to supply water for domestic and garden use to a part, but not all, of the platted town lots of the unincorporated town of Cardiff, which was included within said irrigation district; that said Cardiff irrigation district, before the inclusion of said annexed land, did not own or possess water or source of water supply for the irrigation of said lands described in said petition and sought to be annexed, or any part thereof; that the only sources of water supply that could be obtained for the irrigation of any part of said annexed territory are outside of and several miles distant from said original Cardiff irrigation district; and that said Cardiff irrigation district has not now and never had or possessed any right or interest in said sources of water supply."

Appellants argue that the plain intent of the sections of the act which relate to inclusion is that the only legitimate purpose of a petition of landowners to have their land included in an irrigation district is that they may share in the water supply and works for the irrigation of land; that therefore it is only irrigation districts having adequate water supply and works to irrigate additional territory which have the capacity to entertain or the competency to grant any petition to enlarge their boundaries to include new territory; that an inclusion proceeding under the statute is contractual, and the subject of the contract is an admission to rights in an existing water system of the district; that, since this district has no irrigation system, there exists no subject-matter of the contract, and therefore no basis for the proceeding.

Pursuing their argument further, appellants direct attention to the provisions of the statute which outline the procedure subsequent to filing of a petition for such inclusion of additional territory; and they contend that the effect of such procedure, if enforced, is such that nonpetitioning owners of land within the territory sought to be brought into the district will be deprived of their property, or have burdens imposed thereon, without their consent and without due process of law. In support of this contention it is claimed that the procedure thus required and observed did not give to nonpetitioning owners any notice of the proposed inclusion of their lands; did not vest in the board of directors any jurisdiction to determine whether those lands would be benefited by being included in the district; did not provide for such nonpetitioning landowners any opportunity to vote upon the proposition; and, further, that the board of directors was disqualified, and particularly that Cullen, the president of the board, was disqualified to act in the matter, because Cullen, as owner of some of the land sought to be included, was the chief promoter of the plan and was one of the signers of the petition. All of these claims are contested, although Cullen's relation to the matter is admitted to have been in fact as stated. Assuming, however, for the moment, that the statute does not provide for notice to nonpetitioning owners, or give them any opportunity to be heard upon their objections to the matter proposed, respondent relies upon the fact that the district is a public and municipal corporation, and upon those numerous decisions which hold that in the creation of such corporations, and in annexation of territory to such corporations, laws which omit to provide for notice and a hearing and judicial determination of the question of benefits do not infringe upon the right of the landowner to be protected against the taking of his property without due process of law; that it is only when the corporation, by some process of taxation or assessment, seeks to impose a lien upon land, or to collect such tax or assessment, that the property owner may insist upon the right to have the validity thereof subjected to judicial inquiry.

[1-4] It is no longer open to doubt that the legal status of an irrigation district is that of a municipal corporation. Although its duties and powers are of narrower scope in the subjects of their action than in the case of a city, or other general municipal organization, nevertheless the affairs concerning which such district does act are those "of a public corporation to be invested with certain political duties which it is to exercise in behalf of the state." In re Madera Irrigation Dist., 92 Cal. 296, 323, 28 Pac. 272, 278 (14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106). This being so, it has been held that—

"So far as proceedings for the organization are concerned, we think that a reasonably liberal rule of construction should be adopted to carry out the wise purposes of the law." Irrigation Dist. v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 351, 21 Pac. 825.

For like reasons, the same rule of construction should be applied to the provisions of the statute which cover the changing of boundaries of a district and the annexation of additional territory. The Irrigation District Act provides (section 85):

"The boundaries of any irrigation district now organized or hereafter organized under the provisions of this act may be changed in the manner herein prescribed."

Nowhere is there any stated limitation upon the exercise of the right thus given other than that there must be an existing district to which the annexation or inclusion may be made. Whether the purpose contemplated in such inclusion proceeding looks toward an extension of water service from the district water supply to the additional territory, or whether the purpose be to provide for the district sources of supply which otherwise it could not have—under either of these conditions, or both of them, if we are to take the statute as it reads—the power is equally given to extend the limits of the territory within which such public corporation lives, moves, and has its being. As for the manner in which these things are to be done, the Constitution of California provides that corporations for municipal purposes shall be organized under such general laws as the Legislature shall provide. We have before us the procedure which the Legislature has prescribed. So far as the constitutional objection herein presented by appellants is concerned, the short and sufficient answer is given in People ex rel. v. City of Ontario, 148 Cal. 627, 632, 84 Pac. 205, 208:

"We do not understand that the requirement as to due process of law gives a property owner an absolute right to notice and hearing before his property may be included within the limits of a municipality."

Without attempting to offer an extensive review of the leading decisions on the subject—a work which has been done thoroughly and often by courts of the highest authority—we hold that the proceedings in question here, so far as they have relation to the constitutional rights relied upon by counsel for appellants, have not been conducted in violation of those rights.

Section 86 of the Irrigation District Act reads as follows:

"The holder or holders of title, or evidence of title, representing one-half or more of any body of lands adjacent to the boundary of an irrigation district, which are contiguous, and which, taken together, constitute one tract of land, may file with the board of directors of said district a petition, in writing, praying that the boundaries of said district may be so changed as to include therein said lands. The petition shall describe the boundaries of said parcel or tract of land, and shall also describe the boundaries of the several parcels owned by the petitioners, if the petitioners be the owners, respectively, of distinct parcels, but such descriptions need not be more particular than they are required to be when such lands are entered by the county assessor in the assessment book. Such petition must contain the assent of the petitioners to the inclusion within said district of the parcels or tracts of land described in the petition, and of which said petition alleges they are, respectively, the owners; and it must be acknowledged in the same manner that conveyances of land are required to be acknowledged."

Appellants contend that the petition for inclusion of these lands as part of the Cardiff irrigation district is void on its face for the reason that the description of the boundaries of the land proposed to be included, as set forth in the petition, clearly exhibits the fact that the lands to be included are not contiguous and do not, taken together, or at all, constitute one tract of land. If the fact be as thus claimed it must result that the filing of the petition did not vest in the board of directors any jurisdiction over the proceeding, and that the order of inclusion, as well as the intervening steps in the proceeding, must be held to be void. In People v. City of Monterey Park, 40 Cal. App. 715, 181 Pac. 825, this court had under consideration certain proceedings for the annexation of land to the city of Alhambra; the proceedings being conducted under a statute providing for the annexation of inhabited territory. From the description contained in the annexation petition it appeared that several distinct portions of the territory were not inhabited. Therefore it was held that the petition was on its face not sufficient, and for that reason no valid annexation proceeding was pending. It was contended by appellants in that case that the defense based upon the validity of the annexation proceedings could not be maintained because such defense came by way of collateral attack in a quo warranto case. But the court held, for reasons there stated more at length, that such claim of want of jurisdiction may be asserted in an action of this nature where the facts which make the proceedings void appear in the petition by which they were initiated.

It is contended by appellants that this area of 25,751 acres, sought to be annexed to the Cardiff irrigation district, consists of not less than six large areas comprised in the description contained in the petition (and, for illustrative purposes, shown on the map received in evidence herein), separated from each other by five natural features consisting of deep indentations of salt water lagoons of the Pacific Ocean. These areas for convenience are numbered consecutively from 1 to 6. Nos. 1 and 2 lie south of the old district, and the other divisions lie north and east thereof. Assuming, without deciding, that areas numbered 1 and 2 might reasonably be held to constitute one tract of land, and that the remaining areas taken together might constitute one other tract of land, it seems clear to us that Nos. 1 and 2 are in all respects a different tract of land from the remaining portion of the territory sought to be included. This is so by reason of the fact that there is no connection whatever between parcels 2 and 3, which, on the contrary, are so separated from each other that we are unable to find any justification for the claim that they should be considered as one parcel or body of land. While the description, as written in the petition, is continuous, we find that the calls thereof leave parcel 2 and run around the southeasterly boundary of the old district about a third of a mile before they touch and begin to run around the boundaries of parcel 3. The connecting line thus written into the description bounds no part of the lands sought to be included. As to them it is purely a mathematical abstraction, unrelated to any material thing. Covering nearly the entire width of the district at that point, parcels 2 and 3 are separated by a lagoon, known as the San Elijo lagoon, which appears to be, roughly speaking, from a quarter of a mile to three-quarters of a mile in width. Counsel for respondent point out that the nature of the land underlying this lagoon is such that it could not appropriately be made part of an irrigation district; that, if it had been included in the district, justice would have required that it be immediately excluded therefrom by proceedings for that purpose, and argue that therefore the lagoon should not count as an element in determining the contiguity or noncontiguity of the lands north and south thereof. We must reply that the question here to be answered should not turn upon the narrowness or liberality of definition of the word "contiguous." The statute was carefully written so as to govern the use of that word by providing for the inclusion in the district of only such lands as "are contiguous and which taken together constitute one tract of land." And since these lands, as they lie, are separated by a great and conspicuous natural feature, to such a degree that it is admitted that the intervening territory could not appropriately have been brought within the district, we are constrained to hold that they are not "one tract of land" within the meaning of the statute. To the suggestion that this would be a very technical construction of the words used, the obvious reply is that the opposite construction might easily frustrate the purpose of the limitation expressed in the right of petition which the statute has granted. It was not intended that the more numerous owners of one parcel of land should have the power, on their own volition, to initiate a proceeding to bring in their less numerous neighbors in an entirely different parcel, jointly involving all of them together in an annexation petition. Our conclusion is that the board of directors did not acquire jurisdiction to proceed on the petition filed, and that the order of inclusion is void.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by John F. Gray against the Cardiff Irrigation District of San Diego County and others, as directors of said district. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

George H. Stone and Haines & Haines, all of San Diego, for appellant.

Claude L. Chambers, of San Diego, and Henry J. Stevens, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought by plaintiff to have it determined that proceedings for the enlargement of defendant irrigation district were void, and that an assessment levied by the defendant district upon plaintiff's property, in consequence, was invalid. Plaintiff purported to sue on his own behalf and also on behalf of approximately 1,000 landowners situated similarly to himself and having property within the Cardiff district, upon which an assessment had been levied. The grounds alleged, generally stated, were that fraud had been committed by the promoters of the plan by which the boundaries of the original Cardiff irrigation district had been extended to include the land of the plaintiff and of others. We need not here enter into a more particular statement of the grounds of the petition. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, and the point was urged, among others, that plaintiff had not the capacity to sue for the relief demanded, for the reason that an action such as this could only be maintained at the suit of the people of the state. The court sustained the demurrer, and the plaintiff appealed from the judgment of dismissal which followed.

[1] We think that the court did not err in sustaining the demurrer. From the allegations of the complaint it appears that the proceedings for the annexation of territory to the Cardiff irrigation district were regular in form, and that the district had assumed to exercise authority over the annexed land. The district had at least a de facto existence, and that was enough to make it immune from an attack by an individual property owner or any number of such owners. The cause of action does not relate to matters of irregularity in the proceedings of the district, for which cause the property owners within the district might have a right of action under sections 68 and 69 of the Irrigation Act. Deering's Gen. Laws 1915, p. 696. It calls into question the existence of the district itself and denies the right of the district to exercise its corporate authority over the annexed territory. Such a cause of action may only be maintained at the instance of the people of the state. Quint v. Hoffman, 103 Cal. 506, 37 Pac. 514, 777; Reclamation District v. Turner, 104 Cal. 334, 37 Pac. 1038; Hamilton v. County of San Diego, 108 Cal. 273, 41 Pac. 305; Keech v. Joplin, 157 Cal. 1, 106 Pac. 222. In another case, People v. Cardiff Irrigation District, 197 Pac. 384, this day decided, Civil No. 3403, which was properly brought as a quo warranto proceeding, we have considered the main questions affecting the same district, which is attempted to be raised on this appeal. As to this action, however, it is plain that the plaintiff has not the capacity to sue for the relief demanded.

The judgment is affirmed.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

[2] Whether or not under some circumstances a property owner included in an irrigation district may attack an assessment by the district on the ground that his property was erroneously included in the district in the first instance, or whether, if this can be done under some circumstances, such circumstances exist here, need not be determined. The case is now moot in view of the decision of the District Court of Appeal in the companion case of People v. Cardiff Irrigation District, L. A. No. 6463, 197 Pac. 384, holding upon quo warranto that the defendant district had not properly been enlarged to include the plaintiff's land, a decision which has now become final by our refusal this day to grant a hearing before this court.

The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division 1, is denied.

All concur, except SLOANE, J., absent.

1. Highways ⊂⊃166—Where several vehicles are pulled by a tractor, red light should be exhibited at rear; "motor vehicle."

Under Motor Vehicle Law, § 1, declaring that the term "motor vehicle" shall include all vehicles propelled otherwise than by muscular power except vehicles run on rails or tracks and that any motor vehicle drawing a trailer shall be deemed an automobile, a train of vehicles drawn by a motor tractor must be deemed a motor vehicle and a red light should be exhibited on the rear vehicle.

2. Highways ⊂⊃184(3)—Whether driver of vehicle train drawn by tractor was negligent as to rear light or in failing to leave road entirely held for jury.

In an action for injuries received when the motor car plaintiff was driving struck a vehicle train drawn by a tractor to the side of the road, whether the driver's failure to light the rear vehicle with a red light, or to leave the paved roadway entirely when the tractor failed to work satisfactorily was negligence, held for the jury.

3. Master and servant ⊂⊃404—Subrogated compensation insurer's policy admissible.

Where an insurance carrier who paid compensation on behalf of the injured employee brought an action against a third person on the ground that it was subrogated to the employee's cause of action, the policy was admissible in evidence.

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1058(2)—Exclusion of question harmless error in view of other testimony of witness.

In an action by an insurance carrier which had paid compensation to an employee, brought against a third person asserted to have negligently caused the employee's injury the exclusion of the question whether the employee had been receiving after the accident more or less money than before was harmless, where the witness had already testified that when he went back to work he received the same wages as before the injury.

5. Appeal and error ⊂⊃702(1)—Refusal of instructions cannot be reviewed where charge was not brought up.

The refusal of instructions cannot be reviewed where neither in the briefs or in the typewritten record was there a full statement of the charge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; T. N. Harvey, Judge.

Action by the Western Indemnity Company, a corporation, against the Wasco Land & Stock Company, in which Wilbur Austin intervened. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. J. Emmons, of Bakersfield, for appellant.

Anderson & Borton and R. B. Lambert, all of Bakersfield, for respondents.

JAMES, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant corporation for the sum of $2,727.50. The recovery was awarded because of injuries suffered by one Austin through the alleged negligence of defendant corporation. Austin was employed by a laundry company doing business in and about the city of Bakersfield, and, while engaged in his employment as a driver of a motor vehicle, suffered the injuries for which compensation was allowed. The plaintiff, Western Indemnity Company, was the insurance carrier for the laundry company employer, and assumed the liability of the latter toward the employee. Upon making such assumption of liability it became subrogated to the rights of the insured, which included the right to bring action against the corporation alleged to have been at fault.

The contentions advanced by appellant in the brief of its counsel are: (1) The verdict of the jury was not warranted by the evidence; (2) that the court erred in rulings upon the introduction of evidence; (3) that the court erred in its instructions to the jury. A consideration of the first proposition requires a brief statement to be made of the evidence offered in support of the plaintiff's claim. In the month of January, 1917, an employee of appellant was traveling on a public highway toward the city of Bakersfield. He was in charge of a tractor motor which was propelled by a gasoline engine. To this motor was attached, first, a wagonload of grain, and behind this an oil wagon, and to the latter a cookhouse. The cookhouse was built upon a truck platform. As evening came on the engine of the tractor failed to work satisfactorily, and the employee of appellant conducted his train of vehicles to the side of the highway, leaving, however, the left wheel of the tractor upon the paved portion of the highway; the tractor wheels being 28 inches wide. From front to rear the train of vehicles covered a distance of about 85 feet. When the train was stopped, as has been noted, with the left wheel of the tractor upon the paved highway, the rear of the train and the left-hand corner of the cookhouse projected to a distance of about 3½ feet upon the pavement. The paved highway at that point was of sufficient width only to allow two vehicles to pass conveniently with a 2-foot clearance between. The accident, of which a description follows, occurred at about 7 o'clock in the evening. It was dark and foggy. The employee of appellant had before that time lighted three lanterns, one of which he placed at the top of the engine, one in the middle of the second wagon, and one on the left-hand corner of the cookhouse or last vehicle of the train. These lanterns were ordinary oil lanterns and emitted a white light. No colored lights were set on any part of the train.

[1] It becomes important here to consider whether the law requiring the display of lights upon motor vehicles demanded that a colored light should have been placed at the rear of the train of vehicles. Appellant contends that such was not the requirement of the law, but we think as to that matter it is mistaken. Section 1 of the motor vehicle law, Statutes of 1915, p. 397, in defining what shall be considered a motor vehicle, declares that such designation shall include all vehicles propelled otherwise than by muscular power, except vehicles which run upon rails or tracks, and provides further:

"That any motor vehicle which shall be operated on the highway drawing a trailer or other vehicles shall be deemed to be an automobile for all the purposes of this act."

Other parts of the act required the display of a red light at the rear of all motor vehicles during the night time.

[2] At the outset, then, it must be considered that appellant was negligent in not displaying a red light at the rear of its motor train; and this condition alone furnishes a sufficient reason why, upon the evidence, this court must conclude that the verdict of the jury should be sustained. Austin, the injured party, testified that he was driving the automobile of the laundry company on a return trip to the city of Bakersfield on the evening in question; that just before reaching the point where the train of appellant was standing the glare of a passing automobile struck upon the windshield; that he observed no lights ahead of him and that as the automobile mentioned passed him he observed the rear of appellant's train immediately in front, and too late to avoid a collision with it. Appellant insists that under this statement of the complainant it is made to appear that the accident was caused wholly by the glare from the headlights of the automobile which passed Austin immediately before the occurrence of the collision. We are not authorized and neither was the jury required to draw such conclusion from the evidence. Had a red light been exhibited on the rear of appellant's train, for aught that appears, the warning of this light might have been made appreciable to Austin in time to have stopped his vehicle and avoided a collision. In a consideration of the evidence another important matter presents itself: It was shown that appellant's driver might have, without the contour of the ground preventing him from so doing, removed the train of vehicles entirely off the paved portion of the roadway before stopping. He gave as his reason for not so doing that the ground was somewhat wet and he was afraid the tractor wheels might slip. It was for the jury to determine whether his act in this, as in other regards, was consistent with the exercise of a reasonable degree of care. The evidence, in our opinion, was sufficient to sustain the verdict.

[3] Appellant objected at the trial to the introduction of the policy of insurance issued by the plaintiff to the employer of the injured person. We think there was no error in the ruling of the court in allowing the document in evidence. One of the conditions which was a prerequisite to the right of the plaintiff to appear in the action was that it was the insurance carrier for the laundry company.

[4] Appellant, on cross-examination of the witness Austin, inquired as to whether Austin had been receiving after the accident less or more money than he had received before. The objection was sustained. Assuming that the direct examination of this witness was given such a scope as to include the subject-matter of the question objected to, the error was harmless. This witness had, before the question was asked, already testified that when he went back to work he received the same wages as he had received before the accident.

[5] Error is predicated upon the further claim that the court should have read to the jury certain instructions offered by appellant. It would be useless to enter upon any analysis of the instructions offered to determine whether they stated a relevant proposition of law, for the reason that nowhere in the briefs, nor in fact in the typewritten record brought up, is there a full statement of what the charge was as given by the court. It may well be the fact that the court sufficiently covered all the propositions contended for in the instructions offered, in other instructions given.

The judgment is affirmed.

RHODES v. FIRESTONE TIRE & RUBBER CO. (Civ. 3526.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—Evidence held to justify finding driver of defendant's truck responsible for collision.

In an action for damages caused by accidental collision between auto trucks of the parties, evidence held sufficient to justify the conclusion of the trial court that the driver of defendant's truck was responsible for the collision.

2. Negligence ⟸72—Person in peril not required to exercise normal care.

A person in great peril, where immediate action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise all the presence of mind and carefulness which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances.

3. Evidence ⟸121(13)—Statement of driver of defendant's auto truck properly admitted as res gestæ.

In an action for damages caused by an accidental collision between the auto trucks of the respective parties, a statement of the driver of defendant's truck, made practically simultaneously with the accident, was properly admitted as part of the res gestæ.

4. Trial ⟸59(2)—Order of proof discretionary.

The order of proof was within the discretion of the trial judge, particularly as to the admission of evidence of the cost of repairs of plaintiff's truck collided with by defendant's without first showing the value of the truck immediately after the accident.

5. Damages ⟸113—Measure of damages for injury to personalty is diminution in value unless repairs will cost less.

Where personal property, as an automobile or motor truck, has been negligently injured, but is susceptible of repairs, the measure of the owner's damage is the difference in value immediately before and immediately after the injury, subject to the proviso that, if it can be entirely repaired at a less expense than the diminution in value because of the injury, the measure of damages is the reasonable cost of repairs.

6. Damages ⟸163(2)—Burden on defendant to show diminution in value less than cost of repairs.

In an action for damages to plaintiff's auto truck in a collision with defendant's, if the amount of the repair bill, considered alone, was not the true and exclusive measure to apply in the ascertainment of the damages, it was incumbent upon defendant to have offered proof showing that the diminution in value on account of the injury would be less than the cost of such repairs, thus limiting the damages to a sum not greater than the diminution in value.

7. Damages ⊂⊃163(2)—Showing of cost of repairs made prima facie showing of damages subject to reduction or mitigation by defendant.

When plaintiff, suing defendant company for damages to her motor truck in collision with its truck, established by her proofs that the repairs were necessary and the cost thereof reasonable, she completed a prima facie showing of her damages, and if the diminution of the value of the injured truck was less than the repair bill, the defendant should have shown that fact in reduction of the damages claimed by plaintiff, for the burden to show matters in reduction or mitigation of damages rests on defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Susan Ethel Rhodes, doing business under the firm name and style of D. H. Rhodes, against the Firestone Tire & Rubber Company. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Waldo F. Postel, of San Francisco, for respondent.

BARDIN, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an action for damages caused by an accidental collision between auto trucks of the respective parties to the action, near the intersection of Polk and Ellis streets in San Francisco. Immediately prior to the accident an employee of defendant was driving an auto truck of the defendant in a northerly direction on the east side of Polk street, and at the same time the driver of plaintiff's truck was proceeding in a southerly direction on the west side of the same street but northerly from the intersection of the streets referred to. On reaching Ellis street the auto truck of the defendant came into collision with a touring car of a third party, which was being driven westerly on Ellis street. The driver of the touring car, in endeavoring to avoid collision with defendant's truck, turned to the right into Polk street, but was unable to avoid contact with defendant's truck. The truck of the defendant became disengaged without coming to a stop and a very short time thereafter came into a head-on collision with the truck of the plaintiff at a distance, the court found, in excess of 100 feet northward from the intersection of the two streets referred to.

The court found that the said collision between the two trucks was caused solely by reason of the negligence of the defendant, and also found substantially to the following effect: That immediately prior to the collision the employee of the defendant was operating defendant's auto truck at a speed in excess of 15 miles per hour, and on the wrong side of the street; that after the collision with the touring car already referred to, the driver of defendant's auto truck swerved over to the west side of Polk street and continued in a northerly direction on the west side of Polk street and the sidewalk thereof; that the driver of the plaintiff's auto truck immediately before the collision of the two trucks drove plaintiff's truck to the extreme westerly side of Polk street and partly on the westerly sidewalk thereof to avoid a collision with the truck of the defendant; that the two trucks met head-on on the west side of Polk street partly on the sidewalk and on the extreme westerly side of the street; and that the truck of the plaintiff had come to a complete stop prior to the collision, with all brakes firmly set.

[1] A number of points are relied on by the appellant for a reversal of the judgment the major portion of which relate to arguments in support of the defendant's theory that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in the operation of the auto truck at the time of the collision and that the driver of plaintiff's auto truck at said time was himself guilty of contributory negligence in not taking the proper precautions to avoid the collision between the two trucks. In answer to the criticism that the evidence does not support the findings of the court in relation to the negligence of defendant, it will be sufficient to say that the record shows an abundance of evidence sufficient to justify the conclusion of the trial court that the driver of defendant's truck was responsible for the collision between the two trucks. The arguments set forth in the appellant's briefs in exposition of the reasons why the defendant was not at fault, while proper to have been addressed to the trial court are, in the face of the conflicting evidence, of no avail here. The credibility of the witnesses and the weight of the evidence were matters for the determination of the trial court.

[2] It is contended by appellant that the defendant is not answerable for the results of an accident brought about through stress of a sudden emergency created through no fault of its own. While it is true, as stated in Harrington v. Los Angeles Railway Co., 140 Cal. 514, 74 Pac. 15, 63 L. R. A. 238, 98 Am. St. Rep. 85, that "a person in great peril, where immediate action is necessary to avoid it, is not required to exercise all that presence of mind and carefulness which are justly required of a careful and prudent man under ordinary circumstances," nevertheless, while the collision between the two trucks would probably never have occurred except for the presence of the touring car under the circumstances already indicated, the court was justified in concluding, as it must have done, that the driver of defendant's auto truck had ample time and space to have avoided the collision with plaintiff's truck, after becoming disengaged with the touring car. And the trial court may have concluded, and it would have been fully warranted in so doing, that the negligent driving of defendant's employee began at a time and place antecedent to the collision with the touring car and continued without intermission until the collision had occurred between the two trucks.

[3] The contention that the evidence fails to show that the driver of defendant's truck was an employee of defendant is manifestly without merit, as is also the claim that the court committed error in admitting in evidence the statement of the driver of defendant's truck made practically simultaneously with the accident, and therefore properly considered by the trial court to be a part of the res gestæ.

The defendant interposed the defense of contributory negligence, and in behalf thereof alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence in that the driver of plaintiff's truck carelessly and negligently ran the truck of plaintiff into the truck of defendant, and also carelessly and negligently failed to control said truck, or apply the brakes thereof, at or before the time of the accident. It is claimed that the court failed to find on these material issues, and for that reason the judgment should be reversed. An examination of the findings of the court discloses, however, that the court specifically found that the obverse of these particular allegations was true, and further found that the collision between the two trucks was caused solely by the negligence of the employee of defendant.

[4] We come now to the consideration of defendant's claim that the court below committed error in two respects with reference to the damages awarded to the plaintiff by its judgment, namely: (1) That it was error to admit any evidence as to the cost of the repairs of plaintiff's truck, without first showing the value of the truck immediately after the accident; and (2) that the proper measure of damages was not applied in the case. The first objection, at most, goes merely to the order of proof, as will presently more clearly appear and may therefore be summarily dismissed with the comment that the order of proof was within the discretion of the trial judge.

We gather from the complaint that the plaintiff originally intended to endeavor to recover as compensation for the damages she had suffered by reason of the collision referred to, the aggregate sum of $1,240.45, made up of the following items: $394.45 on account of moneys, claimed to be reasonable in amount, expended in making necessary repairs to plaintiff's truck; $750 on account of the depreciation in value of said truck beyond the amount expended in repairing it; and $96 expended in hiring a substitute truck while the injured truck was undergoing repair. No evidence was presented in support of the allegation that the injured truck had depreciated in value beyond the amount of the repair bill. The court found that plaintiff expended the sum of $394.45 to repair the damages resulting from the said collision and that such sum was a reasonable and necessary sum to have been expended for said repairs which were actually made and were made necessary by reason of the negligence of defendant, and that plaintiff had expended, in procuring the hire of a substitute truck while the injured one was being repaired, the sum of $96. Judgment followed in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $490.45. Inasmuch as the defendant has made no objection to the allowance of the amount paid for truck hire, that item need receive no further consideration from us.

[5] This brings us to a consideration of the proper measure of damages to apply in negligence cases such as this, where the injured vehicle is susceptible of repair. According to some authorities the measure of damages in such instances is the cost of repairing the injured personal property, together with the value of the use of the property while undergoing repair. 17 C. J. 877; Weleetka Light & Water Co. v. Northrop, 42 Okl. 561, 140 Pac. 1140; McGuire v. Post Falls Lumber & Mfg. Co., 23 Idaho, 608, 131 Pac. 654. The usual measure, however, to apply in the ascertainment of damages in cases where personal property has been negligently injured but is susceptible of repair, and the one we prefer to follow, is that which makes the measure of damages the difference in value immediately before and immediately after the injury, subject, however, to the proviso that if it can be entirely repaired at a less expense than the diminution in value because of the injury, the measure of damages is the reasonable cost of repairs. Kincaid v. Dunn, 26 Cal. App. 686, 148 Pac. 235; Huddy on Automobiles, § 719; Babbitt on Motor Vehicles (2d Ed.) § 1740.

[6] While the complaint was drawn on the theory that the injuries to plaintiff's truck exceeded the amount of the cost of repairs, the case was actually tried on the theory that the truck was susceptible of being entirely repaired. No evidence was produced by the plaintiff as to the diminution in value of the truck by reason of the collision. Whether or not the plaintiff was actuated in presenting her proof by an erroneous idea as to the proper measure of damages to apply is not important, for if the amount of the repair bill, considered alone, was not the true and exclusive measure to apply in the ascertainment of the damages plaintiff had suffered, it was incumbent upon the defendant to have offered proof showing that the diminution in value on account of the injury would be less than the cost of such repairs; thus limiting the damages to a sum not greater than such diminution in value. Kincaid v. Dunn, 26 Cal. App. 686, 148 Pac. 235; Huddy on Automobiles, § 720.

[7] When the plaintiff established by her proofs that the repairs were necessary and the cost thereof reasonable, she completed a prima facie showing of her damages. If the diminution in value of the injured truck was less than the repair bill, the defendant should have shown that fact in reduction of the damages claimed by the plaintiff, for the burden of showing matters in reduction or mitigation of damages rested upon the defendant. The reasonable cost of making necessary repairs in such cases as this has been accepted as a proper element in determining the amount recoverable as damages in many other jurisdictions, as has already been pointed out, and we think it proper to accept it as such in the establishment of a prima facie admeasurement of damages, subject to the right of the adverse party to apply to it the test as to whether or not the diminution in value by reason of the injury was less than the repair bill, and if so, to reduce the damages recoverable to equal the sum representing such difference in value.

The defendant, having failed to make any showing in reduction of damages, cannot now be heard to complain.

The judgment is affirmed.

WESTPHAL v. ARNOUX. (Civ. 3611.)

1. Adverse possession ⇐112 — Possession within five years held shown prima facie.

The requirement of Code Civ. Proc. § 318, that to maintain action for recovery of real property it must appear that plaintiff or his predecessor was seized or possessed of the property within five years before commencement of the action, is prima facie satisfied by showing that plaintiff had been invested with the legal title; section 321 declaring the person establishing a legal title is presumed to have been possessed of the property within the required time; so that defendant must dissipate the presumption.

2. Limitation of actions ⇐76(2)—Statute for recovery of real estate continues to run against infant if started against predecessor in title.

If the possession of the person under whom an infant claims title was invaded, thus setting in operation the statute of limitations for recovery of real property, it continues to run after the title passes to the infant, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 328, excepting from the time for an infant to commence action, the years of his disability.

3. Adverse possession ⇐45—Running of statute for recovery of real property interrupted by litigation between the parties over the title.

The running of the statute for recovery of land is interrupted by pendency of actual litigation in court between the parties, of the title and every incident of ownership, including the right of possession.

4. Limitation of actions ⇐105(1) — Statute for recovery of real estate did not run against plaintiff and his devisor, where latter died after judgment adjudging title in him, but before denial of new trial, and plaintiff was minor.

As against rights created by a judgment adjudging land to be the property of plaintiff's devisor, the statute of limitations for recovery of real estate did not begin to run till after the judgment became a final determination of the controversy by denial of new trial, so that, the devisor having died between judgment and denial of new trial, the statute did not commence to run against devisor, and therefore, under Code Civ. Proc. § 328, not against plaintiff, a minor, during disability.

5. Appeal and error ⇐174—Objection that action was by guardian instead of by infant held too late on appeal.

Objection that action was by guardian, as such, and not by infant, by her guardian, cannot be raised for the first time on appeal, the case having been tried on the theory that the minor was the real party in interest, and that it was her title and interests that were being litigated, and the judgment will be construed as for the infant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Cora A. Westphal, as guardian of Agatha Lawrence, against J. A. Arnoux. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Vincent Surr, of San Francisco, and Harry M. McKee, of Fresno, for appellant.

Ernest Klette, of Fresno, and Manning & Thompson, for respondent.

BARDEN, Justice pro tem. This is an action wherein there is involved the question of the ownership of a parcel of land in Fresno county. The complaint, drawn in the usual pattern of an action in ejectment and for mesne profits, alleged ownership and right to possession in the plaintiff of the real property referred to. The defendant, by way of answer, controverted the plaintiff's allegations of ownership and right of possession, and pleaded, in bar of recovery, the statute of limitations, and also by cross-complaint asserted ownership in himself of said real property by reason of his adverse possession thereof.

The plaintiff was successful at the trial, and the defendant has appealed from the judgment.

The controversy now before the court is the outgrowth of marital differences and litigation between the defendant and his now deceased wife involving the title to the same parcel of land. Arnoux was married in the year 1907 to Anna Lawrence, a widow and the mother of Agatha Lawrence, then a child of five years of age and the ward in whose behalf the present action was begun. Four years later, for a sufficient consideration, he conveyed the said property to his spouse. In March of 1913 he filed an action against his wife for the annulment of their marriage, and sought in the same action the decree of the court canceling the said deed and reinvesting him with title to the said property. The prayer of his complaint was predicated upon the allegations that Mrs. Arnoux had committed a fraud upon him by pretending to be a widow at the time of their marriage and that, believing her to be his lawful wife, he had made the said transfer of property to her. Mrs. Arnoux denied these allegations and filed her cross-complaint seeking, not only a decree of divorce, but also a decree in legal effect quieting her title to the said property. Upon the issues thus joined the parties went to trial, and the resulting judgment granted neither an annulment of the marriage nor a divorce; but the judgment which was entered on March 9, 1914, did determine that the real property there involved was the separate property of the wife and upheld the validity of the deed.

No appeal from the judgment was ever taken, and on March 12, 1915, a motion for a new trial was denied. Meanwhile, on May 6, 1914, Mrs. Arnoux died testate, and on July 8, 1917, there was distributed to Agatha Vivian Lawrence the premises here involved.

The present action was commenced on September 15, 1919. At the trial the defendant sought to invoke, in aid of his defense to the action, the provisions of section 318 of the Code of Civil Procedure, under the theory that neither Agatha Lawrence, nor her mother, had been seized or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the present action on September 15, 1919.

[1] While it is true that before the plaintiff could be permitted to prevail, it was necessary that it be made to appear that either Agatha Lawrence, or her mother, was seized or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action (section 318, Code Civ. Proc.), yet this requirement was properly satisfied when it was established that Agatha Lawrence, in consequence of the death of her mother, had been invested with the legal title. And when that fact was made to appear, as it was, by the stipulation of the parties, the burden was thereupon cast upon the defendant to dissipate such presumption by showing that he had held and possessed the property adversely to such legal title for five years before the commencement of the action. Section 321, Code Civ. Proc.

During the course of the trial the defendant undertook to show facts tending to support the affirmative allegations of his answer and cross-complaint having relation to the nature of his hostile possession of the premises in suit.

Objection to this line of testimony was sustained by the court upon the theory that the action between Mr. and Mrs. Arnoux had the legal effect of interrupting the statute of limitations, and that no period of time, either antecedent to the finality of judgment in that case, or subsequent thereto, could be made available to defendant either in support of the bar of the statute of limitations, or of his claim to title by adverse possession.

It must be remembered that pending the hearing of the motion for a new trial, and less than two months after the rendition of judgment, Mrs. Arnoux became deceased, leaving as her sole heir and descendant Agatha Lawrence a minor.

[2-4] It is, of course, true that if the possession of the ancestor had been invaded before death, the statute of limitations, thus set in motion, would not be suspended in favor of a minor taking title from such ancestor, but would continue to run against the minor. McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 329, 14 Pac. 879, 2 Am. St. Rep. 814; Alvarado v. Nordholt, 95 Cal. 116, 30 Pac. 211; Castro v. Geil, 110 Cal. 292, 42 Pac. 804, 52 Am. St. Rep. 84. But where the ancestor died before her rights were invaded, the minor might commence her action within the period prescribed by the statute (section 328, Code Civ. Proc.) after the removal of disability.

That the litigation between the two spouses had the effect of interrupting the statute of limitations seems clear. Gower v. Quinlan, 40 Mich. 572; Oberein v. Wells, 163 Ill. 101, 45 N. E. 294. While the husband may have been in the physical possession of the premises, asserting some sort of dominion over it, for the requisite time, he was not, during the period of the litigation between the spouses, in the peaceable and undisputed possession thereof. Estate of Richards, 154 Cal. 478–488, 98 Pac. 528; Read v. Allen, 56 Tex. 176–180. The title and every incident of ownership, including the right of possession, were being then actually litigated in court. And as the statute of limitations would not begin to run against the rights created by the judgment rendered in favor of the wife and vesting the real property in her as her separate property, until that judgment had become a final determination of the controversy between the parties litigant (Kirsch v. Kirsch, 113 Cal. 56, 45 Pac. 164; Feeney v. Hinckley, 134 Cal. 467, 66 Pac. 580, 86 Am. St. Rep. 290), and as the day on which the judgment did become a final determination found the mother deceased and Agatha Lawrence still a minor and within the protection of section 328, Code of Civil Procedure, the trial court was right in its conclusion that the defendant must of necessity fail in his affirmative defense and upon his cross-complaint.

In Kirsch v. Kirsch, supra, as in this case, the husband and wife became involved in litigation affecting their marital relation and the title to certain real property standing in the name of the wife and which she claimed as her separate property, but which subsequently was awarded to the husband on the theory that it was community property. The wife appealed from the judgment, entered in 1887, and remained in possession of the property. The judgment was affirmed in 1890. A writ of assistance to recover possession of the real property was granted to the husband in 1893, and from the order granting the writ an appeal was taken, in which appeal it was claimed by the wife that she had, subsequent to the entry of the judgment and prior to the issuance of the writ of assistance, acquired a new title to the real property by adverse possession. In denial of this claim the court held that the original action was pending until 1890, when the judgment became final by the affirmance of that court, "and while it was pending she could not acquire title by adverse possession, since during the pendency of the appeal, all rights under the judgment were suspended. As Kirsch, while the appeal was pending, could enforce no rights under the judgment, per contra, the possession of the wife during that period could not be held to be adverse to her husband."

Whether or not Arnoux and his wife were living separate and apart at any time following their marriage does not appear. No suggestion has been made, however, that the husband was precluded, on account of coverture, from invading the possession of the wife of said real property (Madden v. Hall, 21 Cal. App. 541, 132 Pac. 291), and because the point has not been raised, we have refrained from discussing that question.

[5] This action was brought by Cora A. Westphal, as guardian of the estate and person of Agatha Lawrence. The point is now raised, and for the first time, that the suit should have been brought in the name of the minor, by her guardian. That the minor should have been named as the plaintiff cannot be questioned. Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 111–117, 91 Am. Dec. 566; Justice v. Ott, 87 Cal. 530, 25 Pac. 691; O'Shea v. Wilkinson, 95 Cal. 454, 30 Pac. 588; Dixon v. Cardozo, 106 Cal. 506, 39 Pac. 857.

But the record shows that neither in the pleadings, nor in the evidence, nor in any part of the proceedings below, did the defendant make any objection in the behalf now stated, nor so much as allude to the error which it is now claimed is fatal to the judgment. We are well satisfied that this belated objection cannot now be interposed, for notwithstanding the defect in naming the guardian as plaintiff, the case was actually tried on the theory that the minor was the real party in interest and that it was the minor's title and interests that were being actually litigated. The answer of defendant admits that Agatha Lawrence was a minor, and that Cora A. Westphal had been duly appointed the guardian of her person and estate, and had qualified as such; it denies that any damage resulted to said minor. It contains the averments that the hostile possession of defendant was known by said minor, and that the claim and possession of defendant commenced before said minor claimed any interest in the premises in controversy. The cross-complaint of defendant contains the following introductory language:

"And for a further defense to the complaint of plaintiff filed herein, and for a cross-complaint, the defendant herein complains of Agatha Lawrence, the said minor, and of Cora A. Westphal, as guardian of the person and estate of said Agatha Lawrence, * * *" and prays that the title of defendant be quieted against "said plaintiff and said minor."

In the stipulation of counsel during the course of the trial as to certain facts, Agatha Lawrence was referred to as "the claimant in this action."

This case, having been tried upon the theory that the pleadings were of such form and substance as to properly frame the issues that were actually tried, comes well within the rule:

"That where a case is tried upon the theory that the issues are properly joined in the trial court, and no objection or exception is taken there, it is too late to raise such objections here." Kirsch v. Kirsch, 83 Cal. 633, 23 Pac. 1083.

See, also, People v. Reis, 76 Cal. 269, 18 Pac. 309; Haines v. Stillwell, 5 Cal. Unrep. 27, 40 Pac. 332; Hill v. Nerle, 29 Cal. App. 473, 156 Pac. 981.

We construe the judgment to be in favor of Agatha Vivian Lawrence (known also as Agatha Lawrence), who was treated as, and who, for the purpose of giving effect to said judgment, must be held to be, the real plaintiff in the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

PYRAMID LAND & STOCK CO. et al. v. SCOTT et al. (Civ. 2660.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 2, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸138—Lower riparian owner cannot acquire by prescription or appropriation rights against upper riparian owner.

Though rights to take water from a stream can be acquired by prescription as against riparian owners, or by the upper riparian owner against a lower riparian owner, a lower riparian owner cannot acquire, either by prescription or appropriation, any rights to the use of the water as against an upper riparian owner, since the upper riparian owner is not injured by any use of the water by the lower owner and, therefore, has no legal right to prevent such use.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Appellate court does not resolve conflicts in the evidence.

It is not within the province of the appellate court to resolve conflicts in the evidence on issues of fact or, in other words, to examine conflicting evidence to determine whether the conclusion arrived at below should have been different.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸152(8)—Evidence held not to show user by upper owner was adverse to lower owner.

In an action by lower riparian owners against upper owners to quiet title to water rights, evidence by defendants themselves that they recognized that the lower owners had some rights to the water and had made an agreement, the terms of which were not in evidence, regulating the use thereof, held not to sustain a finding that the upper owners had acquired by prescription a right as against the lower owners to use specified quantities of water.

4. Waters and water courses ⟸40—Riparian rights are parts of lands, not mere appurtenances.

The riparian rights of owners of lands bordering upon a stream are parts and parcels of the lands and of the ownership, not mere easements or appurtenances to the lands.

5. Adverse possession ⟸114(1)—Plea of prescription must be sustained by clear and satisfactory proof.

Since the presumption of a grant on which the plea of prescription is sustained is not true in fact in most of the cases in which real property is claimed by adverse possession, the plea of adverse possession must be sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory proof to warrant depriving a person of his property.

6. Waters and water courses ⟸44—Riparian owners on a stream insufficient to irrigate all lands simultaneously should rotate use.

Both the upper and lower riparian owners have reciprocal rights in the common stream to the reasonable use of the water thereof, and where the flow is insufficient to irrigate all the riparian lands simultaneously, such rights should be regulated by applying the doctrine of rotation in use.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

Action by Pyramid Land & Stock Company, a corporation, and others against C. A. Scott and another, to quiet title to water right. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Dodge & Barry, of Reno, Nev., for appellants.

Pardee & Pardee, of Susanville, and R. M. Rankin, of Orland, for respondents.

HART, J. This action was brought by plaintiffs to quiet their title as against defendants to the water of Long Valley creek, a creek flowing northerly through the lands of all of the plaintiffs and defendants, and thence into Honey Lake, in Lassen county, California.

Plaintiffs in their complaint claim as appropriators and as riparian proprietors. Defendants claim as appropriators and as riparian proprietors, and by amendment to their answer claim prescriptive rights.

The court found that defendant Scott had an adverse right to 90 inches of the waters of the creek and defendants Galeppi had an adverse right to 310 inches of the waters of the creek. The court failed to find that the plaintiffs were appropriators, but did find that both the plaintiffs and defendants were riparian owners, and as to this the court found that plaintiff Pyramid Land and Stock Company has 1,200 acres of land riparian to said Long Valley creek; that plaintiff F. M. Rowland has 400 acres of land riparian thereto; that plaintiff A. J. Hall has 560 acres of land riparian to said creek; that defendant C. A. Scott has 1,120 acres; and defendants Galeppi have 400 acres of land riparian thereto.

It was further found that the several defendants and their predecessors in interest have taken, ever since the year 1861, out of said stream, and used for the necessary irrigation of their said lands, all the water required to produce agricultural crops thereon; that the quantity of water so taken by defendant Scott and his grantors was 90 miner's inches, and that the water so taken and diverted by the defendants the Galeppis, and their predecessors in interest, was 3,500 gallons per minute, or 310 miner's inches; that said several defendants have used the respective quantities of water mentioned for a useful and necessary purpose upon their respective lands, and have "severally been in the open, notorious, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted, and adverse possession and use of said water, and all thereof, as aforesaid, holding and using the same adversely to the plaintiffs and each of them, and adversely to all other persons, for more than five years before the commencement of this action; that neither nor any of said plaintiffs was or were seised or possessed of the right to use said water or any part thereof within more than five years before the commencement of this action;" that the holding and use of said water was under a claim of right and title by said defendants, and exclusive and hostile to any right, title, or claim of possession or use by said plaintiffs or either of them, or their predecessors in interest or grantors, etc.; that said defendants have during all of said period paid all taxes of whatsoever kind or nature levied or assessed upon said lands and water rights, etc.

The evidence shows, and, indeed, it is practically, if not expressly, admitted that Long Valley creek is one of those so-called wet season streams that flow an enormous lot of water at the high-water season and towards the end of the season run down to almost nothing—in other words, it is what is sometimes called a torrential mountain stream.

It was expressly stipulated by the parties at the trial that—

"the country in which all of the lands of plaintiffs and defendants are situated is an arid country, and that artificial irrigation is necessary."

The judgment is that defendant Scott was entitled to 90 miner's inches of water from the creek and defendants Galeppi to 310 miner's inches from said creek, and that the "plaintiffs take nothing by their action."

The plaintiffs appeal from said judgment. The points urged for a reversal are: (1) That the court erred in failing to make any finding as to the claims of the plaintiffs as appropriators; (2) that there is no evidence to support the finding that the defendants have acquired a right to use the water by prescription; (3) that there is neither evidence nor any finding which supports that part of the judgment that the "plaintiffs take nothing by their action."

[1] The failure of the court to find upon the claim of plaintiffs, the lower riparian owners, that they had appropriated respectively a certain specified number of miner's inches of the waters of Long Valley creek is not material, since it is the settled law in California that, while the right to take water from a stream, as against riparian owners, may be acquired by prescription (Gallaher v. Montecito Valley Water Co., 101 Cal. 245, 35 Pac. 770; Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 144, 58 Pac. 442, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158; Arroyo D. & W. Co. v. Baldwin, 155 Cal. 280, 285, 100 Pac. 874), no such right may be acquired either by prescription or by appropriation by a lower as against an upper riparian owner in the same stream. In view, however, of the fact that the decree complained of here is grounded upon findings of a prescriptive title in the defendants to certain specified quantities of water in the creek in question, as against the riparian rights of the plaintiffs, it is proper to say that the rule has been declared to be different as to upper riparian proprietors. In Bathgate v. Irvine, 126 Cal. 135, 140, 58 Pac. 442, 444, 77 Am. St. Rep. 158, the law upon this proposition is thus stated:

"Plaintiffs contend that as lower riparian proprietors they acquired the right to all the waters of the creek by prior appropriation, notwithstanding defendant and his predecessors in interest were upper riparian owners long before plaintiffs made their appropriation. We understand the rule to be settled, and is no longer open to discussion in this state, that such right cannot be thus acquired. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72. And it is equally well settled that no right to the water can be acquired by prescription where the lower riparian proprietor has taken the water out of the stream at a point on his own land and has used such water only as the upper riparian proprietor permitted it to pass down through his land to the lower owner; such use by the latter is not adverse in the sense required to give a right by prescription. Hargrave v. Cook, supra. Nor can the nonuser of the water by the upper riparian owner of land be invoked to strengthen the claim of appropriation or prescription by the lower riparian owner under like circumstances. Hargrave v. Cook, supra. In appropriating the water which flows across his land, the lower appropriator invades no right of the upper riparian proprietor. The latter has no right of action to prevent such use, for he is in no wise injured, and the former should not be permitted to acquire a right in this manner which the latter is powerless to prevent. The case is quite different where the upper owner appropriates the water. The lower owner is injured at once and the law gives him a remedy, and, if he fails to avail himself of it, the appropriation may, by lapse of time, ripen into an absolute right."

The essential theory of the decision is that the plaintiffs permitted their riparian rights to be invaded by the defendants and failed to take timely steps towards invoking the remedy available to them for preventing the ripening of the wrong into a right, and we shall, upon that theory, consider the case.

As stated, plaintiffs, with respect to the defendants, are lower riparian owners, and their lands are commonly known as the "Constantia Ranch," the "Rowland lands," the "Friday field" and the "Doyle lands." The plaintiff Pyramid Land & Stock Company is the owner of the so-called Constantia properties, the plaintiff Hall of the Doyle and Friday lands and the plaintiff F. M.

Rowland of the Rowland lands. It appears from the testimony presented by the plaintiffs that these lands have for many years been used for growing hay and other agricultural products, and that, being located in a section of great aridity, are wholly unavailable for any such use without the aid of irrigation. As the court found, and as is conceded, said lands, as well as those of the defendants, are riparian to Long Valley creek, from which both the plaintiffs and the defendants claim to have, for many years, by means of ditches, taken and used the waters of said creek for the irrigation of their several tracts of land.

As we have seen, the court found that the defendant Scott had, ever since the year 1861, taken and used 90 miner's inches of the waters of said creek for agricultural purposes and that for a like number of years the defendants Galeppi had taken and used for a like purpose 3,500 gallons per minute, or 310 miner's inches of said waters, and that all said defendants had severally so diverted and used said waters and been in the open, notorious, continuous, exclusive, uninterrupted possession and use of the same, adversely to the plaintiffs and to all other persons, "for more than five years before the commencement of this action," the action having been commenced in the year 1916. As also seen, the court, from its findings, concluded as a matter of law that the plaintiffs were entitled to take nothing by their action. In other words, the necessary effect of the decree is, from the findings and conclusions of law, that the defendants had acquired a prescriptive right to all the waters of Long Valley creek, and that therefore the plaintiffs have lost their riparian rights in said creek, and, consequently, have no rights in the waters thereof as to which an adjudication is necessary or required.

[2] It is not within the province of this court, as is obvious, and as has often been pointed out by the decisions, to resolve conflicts in the evidence addressed to issues of fact, or, in other words, to examine conflicting evidence with a view of determining whether the conclusion arrived at below should have been different or in accord with the evidence presented by the opposing litigant. In this case, however, an examination and analysis of the evidence presented by the plaintiffs in support of their several and respective claims, in connection with a like consideration of the evidence presented by the defendants, have convinced us that, upon the all-important issue in this case there is really no conflict in the evidence. Hence, it is proper, as well as important, in disposing of this appeal, to consider herein the evidence presented by the plaintiffs.

The plaintiff A. J. Hall testified that he farmed the Constantia ranch continuously for five years, from 1905 to 1910; that he superintended the irrigation of said ranch with the waters of Long Valley creek; that there were at that time two ditches used for the purpose of irrigating the Friday lands, and, that, during the entire period of time he was at Constantia, "we always had water for the Friday field"; that about 150 acres of the Friday field were irrigated, and that "no one ever interfered with our use of the water." He further testified that from said creek he had irrigated about 200 acres of the Doyle tract since 1910. Hall testified that either in the year 1913 or 1914 the defendants Galeppi installed a pumping plant for the purpose of pumping water from the creek into their ditches, and that they commenced pumping in the year 1915. "Previous to that," he continued, "there was a difference in the way the waters flowed down to me. In the morning I would have a good head of water in the ditch, and along towards night it would be down, and the next morning it would be up again. When they put in the pump it shut off and no more came after that."

C. C. Rowland, son of the plaintiff Rowland testified that the Rowland lands are and have been irrigated with the waters of Long Valley creek for about 30 years, he having known the said lands for that period of time; that there were two ditches by means of which such irrigation was done, and that through those ditches have said lands been irrigated every year, "except a few dry years when there was no water." He testified that he remembered when the Galeppis commenced pumping—his best memory was that it "was last year and this year." (This action was begun in the year 1916, and the trial had in the year 1917). "I remember last spring," the witness proceeded to testify, "we were getting a good head of water until the pump was started, and then we didn't get any more. Previously to the time they started pumping we got water later in the season, except, of course, the year before they started to pump, they had a dam in the stream and that stopped the water. We have raised mostly grass hay and pasture."

R. C. Turritin, general manager of plaintiff Pyramid Land & Stock Company testified that, as a representative of the Nixon National Bank of Reno, which corporation owned the controlling interest in the Pyramid company in the year 1911, he looked over the Constantia and other properties of said plaintiff, and that from that year since he has known that said Constantia Ranch and the Friday field were irrigated with the waters of the creek in question. The witness early in the year 1914 took possession of the Pyramid's properties (the Constantia and the Friday) and down to the time of the trial had had such possession continuously, and he testified that during all that time the lands named were each year irrigated by means of ditches connecting with Long Valley creek. He continued:

"We raised alfalfa, grain, and wild hay. On the east side we had a ditch that irrigated the Friday field. We raised alfalfa and some grain on the east side. A portion of the lands we were still to irrigate for the second crop. We have been able to irrigate the Friday field twice."

The witness stated that the Galeppis commenced pumping in the year 1916, and that from and after that time the water would be "shut off" so that it would not reach the lands of the plaintiffs—very often, or generally, that condition would last for 12 hours. In the year 1915, he said, 1,250 tons of hay were raised on the Pyramid's lands. At that time the Galeppis were not pumping. Since that year the average number of tons of hay produced on said plaintiff's lands was about 700. Turritin said that the only interference there had been with his water supply had been due to the pumping by the Galeppis.

Other witnesses corroborated the above testimony in so far as it relates to the claim of the several plaintiffs that they had always, and without interruption, except when interfered with by the pumping of the water of the creek by the Galeppis into their ditches, used the waters of said creek for the irrigation of their respective tracts of land. Adverting now to the testimony received in behalf of the defendants, we find this to be about the substance thereof: That since the year 1879, the lands now owned by the defendants have been irrigated from Long Valley creek; that the lower riparian proprietors, or the owners of the lands now owned by the plaintiffs, never interfered with the use of the said waters by defendants; that there were times when all the waters of the creek were necessary for the irrigation of the lands of defendants, and the latter would then use all said waters for that purpose. The witness, defendant Scott, testified that he had, by means of a ditch, diverted water onto his lands from the year 1901, in which year he became owner of said lands, down to the year 1916, without interruption or protest from any person. "My ditch," he said, "comes out of the creek just below where the Hot Springs come in. I think those springs flow in the neighborhood of 90 inches. * * * The ditch was there when I first knew the place. The capacity of the ditch is about the same now as when I took it. * * * The springs that I spoke of are close to the creek. I diverted the water by damming the channel of the creek; that catches the water of the creek, also the waters of the spring. I tried to turn it all. * * * The creek is not in view of the road. To find out I was taking the water they would have to go up the creek and see my dam and ditch, the Constantia people. * * * I never saw them up there before this spring. * * * I never knew of their being up there." Scott further said that he lost approximately 25 per cent. of the water he attempted to divert to his ranch; that he measured the water as it was flowing onto his ranch; and, that he found that it amounts to "something around 100 inches." He continued:

"Before this I measured it as it went off, and there was 150 inches going off. The engineer said we were losing 25 per cent. Under these conditions, I don't think the people below would ever know we were using it. I don't think I ever told Hall or Rowland or the Pyramid people that I claimed the right to divert all the waters of the stream. Most generally after the flood waters quit after the 1st of June, I would hold them until the 1st of October, except at haying time, when it was turned loose. There was always water flowing off my ranch. I never claimed the right to deprive those people of water below me all the time. I understood they had rights."

Frank Galeppi, one of the defendants, testified that a centrifugal pump, operated by steam, with a pumping capacity of 3,500 gallons per minute, was installed in the year 1916 for the purpose of pumping water from the creek onto the Galeppi lands. "At that time," he proceeded, "there was about three times more water in the creek than the pump could throw. We had a five-foot dam in the creek. We couldn't lower the water with the pump. * * * When we started the pump we ran not to exceed 12 hours. After the water got low, by changing the dam we could save the water a little longer than 11 hours. * * * We took the water out on both sides of the creek, and used it in the old ditches. We started to pump this year the 20th of May. Under the contract we made we ran it up to the 25th of June; then we had to lay off for a while. We laid off for five days, I think. We ran it according to the time stated in the stipulation. They (the Constantia people) had it from the 30th of June to the 7th of July. From July 8th to July 13th it was not operated. The water was permitted to flow down the creek. On the 13th of July we were privileged to close the gate so as to raise the water in the dam sufficiently for us to use the pump, and we ran it then to the 18th—that is the last day I pumped."

Charles Galeppi, son of defendant Rosa Galeppi, C. E. Jones, David Cameron, and William Galeppi, also son of Rosa Galeppi, gave testimony for the defendants, but, reduced down to its real scope and purport, none of it amounted to more than the mere statement that the lands of the defendants had for many years been irrigated by waters diverted by one means or another from Long Valley creek. It should be stated, however, that, on cross-examination, Charles Galeppi said that—

"There was always lots of water went down to the plaintiffs every year—that is, when the water was high, not when the water was short."

He further testified, on cross-examination:

"We never told these people that we owned all the water and that they had no rights, those people below. We never at any time claimed all the water in the creek."

On redirect, however, the witness qualified that testimony by saying:

"All the water was in the creek, we didn't claim it all but what water during the time we needed it. My understanding with regard to our water rights was at low water stages we took it all. I understood we had the right to take it all."

Thus we have set out, largely in synoptical fashion, all that was offered and received in the matter of proof in support of the respective claims of the parties to this action, and, as declared in the outset, we are unable to perceive any conflict in the evidence, as it was presented by both sides, upon the substantial or vital issue submitted for adjudication herein.

[3] The differences arising between the upper and lower riparian owners seem to have occurred shortly before the institution of this action, and were due to the installation of the pumping system on the lands of the Galeppis to pump the waters of the creek onto their lands, thus causing, as was claimed by plaintiffs, such a diminution in the usual flow of the waters of the stream as practically to deprive the plaintiffs of the quantity of the waters ordinarily passing down, and so becoming available for use on their property, and thereby depriving them of the necessary use of said waters. The witnesses, it will be noticed, referred to an agreement entered into between the Pyramid representatives and the Galeppis, under and by the terms of which the Galleppis were to cease pumping for a certain number of days during a specified month of the irrigating season. The said agreement is not in the record, and we are consequently without light as to its specific terms, but from the testimony relating to it we may infer that its purpose was to facilitate a reasonable use of the waters of the stream by both the lower and upper riparian proprietors. From the whole situation as it is shown by all the evidence, we may well assume that the object of the agreement was merely to adjust the use of the waters by all the parties so that all might have an opportunity, in the exercise of their rights as riparian owners, to as reasonable a use of the waters of the creek for the irrigation of their lands as the existing conditions would permit. But, be that as it may, it is very clear to our minds that, upon the testimony presented by the defendants, the finding of a prescriptive title in them to all the waters of Long Valley creek cannot justly be predicated. In the first place, we are justified in observing that the evidence produced by the plaintiffs that they had for many years continuously used the waters of said creek for the irrigation of their lands, and that they had constructed and maintained lateral ditches for that purpose, is not only not directly contradicted by, but in no way conflicts with, any testimony presented by the defendants. The defendant Scott and the witness Charles Galeppi, whose testimony was the strongest of any given in behalf of the defendants, each declared, as shown, that the defendants at all times recognized that the plaintiffs had rights in the waters of the stream, and that they had never intended depriving the latter of their rights. This testimony, considered without regard to the uncontradicted proofs made by the plaintiffs, is itself sufficient to demonstrate that the defendants never at any time used said waters in hostility to the rights of the plaintiffs, under a claim of right, much less for the statutory period prescribed for the establishment of title to real property by prescription or adverse possession. Moreover, we have found no evidence clearly warranting the finding that the defendant Scott has the right to the use of 90 miner's inches and the Galeppis to 310 miner's inches of the waters of said creek. There is no testimony which shows that exact or any proper measurements had been made of the respective quantities of waters used by the defendants. Scott merely expressed the opinion—that is, it amounted to no more than an opinion—that 90 miner's inches of water had usually been diverted through his ditch to his lands from said creek—some of this, however, from what was known as the "Hot Springs." The only testimony which could by any possibility be said to support the finding that the Galeppis had used as much as 310 inches of water is that describing the pumping capacity of the pump installed on their lands about a year before the commencement of this action. That testimony falls quite short of showing that 310 miner's inches of waters had for over five years been habitually used by the Galeppis or that that quantity of water was necessary for their purposes.

[4] It must be borne in mind at all times that the decree here, should it be permitted to stand, will deprive the plaintiffs of their riparian rights—rights which do not involve mere easements or appurtenances to their riparian lands, but which are parts and parcels of their lands and of the ownership thereof. Hargrave v. Cook, 108 Cal. 72, 77, 41 Pac. 18, 30 L. R. A. 390; Duckworth v. Watsonville, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 520, 89 Pac. 338; Anaheim Union Water Co. v. Fuller, 150 Cal. 327, 88 Pac. 978, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1062; opinion of Supreme Court denying petition for hearing in Peake v. Harris, 192 Pac. 310, 317 et seq.

[5] It is safe to say that in nearly every case where title to real property is sought to be established by adverse possession or prescription, which is based entirely upon the presumption of a grant of such property to the party so claiming it or to his predecessors in interest, there has in point of fact never been a grant or conveyance to the adverse claimant or his predecessors for a consideration. Hence, no person should be deprived of his property rights upon the plea of adverse possession or prescription unless such plea is sustained by the clearest and most satisfactory proof. Indeed, the proposition as thus stated has been plainly and positively declared in the cases.

In Clarke v. Clarke, 133 Cal. 667, 669, 66 Pac. 10, 11, it is said:

"The law will not allow the land of one person to be taken by another, without any conveyance or consideration, upon slight presumptions or probabilities"—citing Niles v. Los Angeles, 125 Cal. 576, 58 Pac. 190.

Again, in the same case, the proposition is thus stated:

"The burden is upon the party who claims title by prescription to clearly prove by competent evidence all the elements essential to such title. The user must have been adverse to the true owner and hostile to his title. It must have been actual, continued, open, and under a claim of right. It must have all the elements necessary to acquire title by adverse possession"—citing Thomas v. England, 71 Cal. 459, 12 Pac. 491.

Testing the undisputed facts of this case by the principles enunciated in the above-named cases, it is manifest, as we have already declared, that the finding that the defendants have by prescription or adverse user acquired the riparian rights of the plaintiffs in the stream in question (and such is the effect of the finding and the decree) cannot stand.

We think that a fair and reasonable interpretation of the whole evidence justifies the conclusion that the court in this case should have adjusted the differences between the parties to this suit upon the basis of their riparian rights, and, that therefore it was error for the court to conclude as a matter of law that the plaintiffs were not entitled to have their rights in the stream specifically fixed.

[6] The rule as to the reciprocal rights of upper and lower riparian owners in a common stream is that each has the right to the reasonable use of the waters thereof, and we think it is clear that, upon the evidence, as it is disclosed by this record, the decree should have been framed in accord with that principle. And, in view of a new trial, we suggest, if it be found that there cannot be, by reason of the insufficiency of the flow of water in the creek at times when irrigation is required in that section, a simultaneous use of part of the waters of the stream by both the upper and lower riparian owners, that the doctrine of rotation be applied, as it is explained in Hufford v. Dye, 162 Cal. 147, and the cases cited on page 161 of that case, 121 Pac. 400, on page 406, as applicable to riparian proprietors as well as to appropriators where such a condition is found to exist.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: PREWITT, Presiding Justice pro tem.; BURNETT, J.

LOS ANGELES COUNTY v. DODGE.

CITY OF LOS ANGELES v. SNYDER, Mayor.

(Civ. 3382, 3383.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 23, 1921.)

1. Constitutional law ⟸70(1)—Assumption by Legislature, supervisors or council that matter is one affecting public interests conclusive on courts.

When the Legislature or a board of supervisors or a city council engaged in the exercise of legislative functions proceeds on the assumption that the matter concerning which it acts is one affecting the public interest or designed to promote the general welfare, the assumption is conclusive upon the courts, unless it is plainly apparent to them that the view is without just foundation.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸268—Stadium to be erected as consideration for lease from county and city held to be instrument to effectuate trust, and within charter powers.

Projected stadium, to be erected by a development association on land leased to it by the city and county of Los Angeles, the city and county contributing thereto, held to be an instrument through which the trust originally imposed on the land, as well as the purposes named in the proposed lease, might be discharged for the promotion of the public welfare.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸994—Right to determine price of improvements subject to no greater interference from courts than question of improvements itself.

If a city council and county board of supervisors may determine what improvements are calculated to advance the public interest, subject to interference by the courts only when it is plainly apparent that such improvements are not so calculated, it must necessarily be true that they may determine what price should be paid for the improvements, subject to no greater right in the courts to interfere.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸994—Price paid by city and county for improvements held not so great as to subject transaction to court interference.

Expenditure by city and county of Los Angeles of $950,000, one half from each, in payment for a stadium on land of an agricultural association leased by it to the city, and by the city and county to a development association, ownership of the building to vest finally in the agricultural association, possession in the city and county held not so great a price on the part of the county for the public benefits to it as to subject the transaction to the interference of the courts.

5. Agriculture ⊂⊃1—Acts empowering agricultural association to lease construed.

St. 1909, p. 982, § 7, empowering agricultural associations to sell, lease, beautify, improve, and dispose of real property, etc., held merely clarified or supplemented, and not repealed, in its general power to lease, by St. 1909, p. 1082, empowering agricultural associations to lease lands to any municipal corporation, county, or city and county, etc.

6. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃721(1)—Athletic field not a "park" within charter provision.

A playground and athletic field is not a "park" within the meaning of city charter of Los Angeles, § 119b, providing that property dedicated for the use of the public as a public park shall forever remain to such use inviolate, a "park" being a piece of ground set apart and maintained for public use, and laid out in such a way as to afford pleasure to the eye as well as opportunity for open air recreation.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Park.]

7. Municipal corporations ⊂⊃62—Lease to development association for erection of stadium held not a delegation of public duty to private agency.

Proposed lease from city and county of Los Angeles to a development association for erection of a stadium thereon for agricultural exhibits and athletic contests, the city and county to furnish funds for the erection held not to constitute a delegation by the city of performance of its public duty to a private agency.

Applications for writs of mandate by the County of Los Angeles against Jonathan S. Dodge, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County and by the City of Los Angeles, a municipal corporation, against Meredith P. Snyder, as Mayor of the City. Writs granted.

A. J. Hill, Co. Counsel, and Edward T. Bishop, Asst. County Counsel, both of Los Angeles, for petitioner Los Angeles County.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., W. P. Mealey, Asst. City Atty., and J. H. O'Connor, Deputy City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for petitioner City of Los Angeles.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, Sayre Macneil, and John A. Powell, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. These proceedings were instituted to compel the respondent Dodge, as chairman of the board of supervisors of the county of Los Angeles, and the respondent Snyder, as Mayor of the city of Los Angeles, to execute a certain lease on behalf, respectively, of the two bodies politic, the board of supervisors of the one and the city council of the other having ordered such execution, and the respondents having refused to obey the orders. The petitions in the two proceedings allege the same facts, and the return in each is identical with that in the other. These returns are in the form of general demurrers to the petitions. The entire controversy may therefore be resolved from the faces of the petitions, and the two proceedings may be treated as one.

In addition to the county and the city, there are two organizations which find frequent mention in the petitions. One of these is the Sixth District Agricultural Association, "a public corporation of the state of California, to wit, an agricultural district." The other is the Community Development Association, "a nonprofit co-operative corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, with the power and for the purpose of holding and maintaining industrial exhibitions, agricultural fairs, street pageants, athletic exhibitions and other performances designed to foster, promote and promulgate [sic] the industries and industrial welfare of the people of the state of California, and to lease and rent lands and construct buildings thereon for any or all of said purposes, and to lease out such buildings when constructed."

The agricultural association is the owner of Exposition Park, in the city of Los Angeles, but that ownership is charged with a trust thus specified in the deed through which the association derives its title:

"The said lands * * * shall be held in perpetuity as a place for holding agricultural exhibitions or fairs, and shall be managed and controlled by the association for that purpose; and also for the purpose, so far as consistent therewith, of leasing or otherwise managing the same so as to raise a revenue for meeting the expenses of holding such exhibitions or fairs; and especially, so far as consistent with the above purposes, for the purpose of holding exhibitions of horses, cattle, and other stock, and of the agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, mechanical, manufacturing and domestic products" of the sixth agricultural district.

On May 21, 1912, the agricultural association leased to the city a part of the land owned by it as above stated. There were two parcels covered by the lease, but one of them, however, designated as parcel B, being of interest in this controversy. Parcel B is appropriately described in general terms as the tract inclosed by the race course in Exposition Park, and it is the identical land proposed to be demised by the lease which it is the purpose of these proceedings to compel the respondents to execute. The city held an earlier lease to the land, dated February 23, 1910, and the lease of May 21, 1912, somewhat different in terms, supplanted the former instrument. The second lease was for a term of 50 years, running from the date of the first, with a right of renewal, on the part of the city, for a second 50 years. By the terms of the lease the city "agrees to lay out and improve the parcel of land herein designated as 'Parcel B' as and for a public playground and athletic field in accordance with plans prepared by the board of playground commissioners, or by such officer or board as may succeed to the powers and duties of said board of playground commissioners by law hereafter, subject however, to the approval of said plans" by the agricultural association, "and to provide the necessary apparatus for an athletic field and to keep and maintain the same for said purposes during the term of this lease." It was provided, in another part of the instrument:

"That said parcel of land herein designated as 'Parcel B' shall be under the control and direction of the board of playground commissioners of the city of Los Angeles or such officer or board as may succeed to the powers and duties of said board by law hereafter, and said board shall have the right to make and enforce such reasonable rules and regulations for the government of said athletic field or playground and said parcel of land shall be open at all times, except as herein otherwise provided, for the use of the public."

The exception mentioned in the last two lines of the quotation refers to certain reservations made in the lease in favor of the lessor, the nature of which it is not necessary to state. The lease also provided:

"That said parcels of land hereby demised shall at all reasonable times be open to the public as a place for exhibiting agricultural, horticultural and botanical products and for the recreation and enjoyment of all persons desiring to avail themselves of the opportunity therefor."

The consideration paid by the city for the lease was the sum of $10,000, the receipt of which was, by the terms of the instrument, acknowledged by the agricultural association, and the agreement of the city to expend $100,000, within 10 years, in improvements on parts of the demised property other than Parcel B.

We now come to a statement of the terms of the instrument which it is sought to require the respondents to execute. The agricultural association, not being a party to the lease, has in writing consented to its execution and it already has been executed by the Community Development Association. That association, the city, and the county are the prospective parties to the instrument. By the proposed convention between these parties, speaking in the present tense and not prospectively, the city leaves Parcel B to the development association, the "principal consideration" passing from the latter being the "erection and construction" of a certain stadium, which is hereafter referred to with greater particularity, the leasehold interest, and the life of the instrument generally, to terminate February 23, 1960. It is to be noted, however, that, as will more fully appear below, the interest of the development association under the lease is to be, after 10 years from its date, merely nominal.

By the terms of the instrument now under our inspection the development association agrees to construct, on Parcel B, according to the plans of a certain architect, which plans are by reference made a part of the agreement, a stadium capable of seating 75,000 persons "suitable for exhibitions of productions hereinabove mentioned, including all manner of games, parades or other exhibitions in furtherance of the purposes hereinabove stated." By way of elucidation of the terms of this quotation it is to be stated that the "exhibitions * * * hereinabove mentioned," and the "purposes hereinabove stated," appear in earlier portions of the lease in the following language:

"Agricultural exhibitions or fairs, * * * exhibitions of horses, cattle and other stock, and of agricultural, horticultural, viticultural, mechanical, manufacturing and domestic products," and "industrial exhibitions, agricultural fairs, street pageants, athletic exhibitions and other performances designed to foster, promote and stimulate the industries and the industrial business and commercial welfare of the people of the state of California."

The instrument further provides "that for and in consideration of the right to use said stadium, its accessory buildings and grounds at the times * * * herein provided during each year of the term" of the agreement, the city and the county will each pay to the development association $50,000 within 6 months after the commencement of the construction of the stadium, $62,000 within 30 days after its completion, $68,000 1 year after the date of the last preceding payment, $65,000 2 years after that date, $62,000 3 years after that date, $59,000 4 years after that date, $56,000 5 years after that date, and $53,000 6 years after that date, or the total sum of $475,000 from each of said bodies politic, being a grand total of $950,000 from the two together. It is further agreed that for a period of 10 years from the date of the lease the city and the county will each pay to the development association, each year, a sum equal to the tax collected by it, the respective body politic, during such year.

It is further provided by the lease that during the first 10 years of the life of the instrument the county "may have the use, possession and enjoyment of said stadium and its accessory structures or buildings, or any part thereof, for public purposes not inconsistent with the purposes for which the said land is held in trust" by the agricultural association, during a consecutive period, to be selected in a certain manner by the county of 15 days in the months of January, March, May, July, September, and November of each year; and the city is to enjoy a like and equal privilege, upon the same conditions, during February, April, June, August, October, and December of each year. After the expiration of the 10 years the city and the county are each to use and enjoy the property half of the time, under a scheme of division provided by the convention. During the 10-year period except for the above-mentioned rights of the city and the county, the possession and use of the stadium are, of course, to be in the development association, and it may charge an admission fee for exhibitions and performances given under its auspices, but it agrees to maintain the property and keep it in good condition and repair during that period, and "all revenues derived by said association from the same during said period shall be applied by said association to the expense of maintenance of said structures and the accompanying grounds, and the remainder of said revenue shall be used in carrying out those purposes of the association" which are mentioned in the lease. In furtherance of this last clause it is provided that the association shall, during the 10-year period, render to each the city and the county, semiannually, full and complete accounts of its financial operations, receipts, and disbursements under the lease. After the expiration of the 10 years the expense of the maintenance of the property is to be borne equally by the city and the county.

Another provision of the proposed lease is couched in these terms:

"Said stadium and its accessory buildings, when constructed, shall be and become the property of said association, and said association shall have the title to the same, separate and apart from the land; that said association shall have the right to withdraw from this agreement at any time after ten years from the date of its execution, upon written notice of its intention so to do delivered to each of the parties hereto thirty days prior to such termination, in which event the title to said stadium and its accessory buildings shall immediately vest in the said district, subject to all the other provisions of this agreement."

The proposed lease concludes with an agreement upon the part of the development association to vacate the demised premises at the expiration of the 10-year period, and to deliver possession to the city and to the county, with provisions securing and protecting the two bodies politic in the event that the stadium is not constructed, and with a clause providing for the nonassignability of the instrument.

[1, 2] One of the objections made by the respondents to the proposed lease is that it cannot be authorized by the legislative bodies of the city and the county, for the reason that the money proposed to be paid by them for the construction of the stadium would not be expended for a public purpose. We may premise a consideration of this question by the statement of a well-established rule bearing upon the sanctity surrounding action by the legislative department of government and the comparative freedom which that branch enjoys from interference by the judicial department, especially as that rule will be found to have a bearing upon other questions which we shall discuss below. The doctrine to which we refer has been stated in various ways in the many cases in which it has received the attention of the Supreme Court (three of which are Stockton Railroad Co. v. City of Stockton, 41 Cal. 147, 168, 175; Daggett v. Colgan, 92 Cal. 53, 28 Pac. 51, 14 L. R. A. 474, 27 Am. St. Rep. 95; Application of Miller, 162 Cal. 687, 696, 124 Pac. 427), and it may be restated, in language fitting to the present occasion, thus: When the Legislature, or a board of supervisors or city council engaged in the exercise of legislative functions, proceeds upon the assumption that a matter concerning which it acts is one affecting the public interest or designed to promote the general welfare, the assumption is conclusive upon the courts, unless it is plainly apparent to them that the view entertained by the legislative body is without just foundation. Here, if we accord to them the honesty of purpose which must be conceded to them and the assumed existence of which largely supports the rule we have just stated, the board of supervisors and the city council, in ordering the execution of the proposed lease, proceeded upon the assumption that it is calculated favorably to influence the public welfare. Can we say that they were not justified in that view? The respondents, in insisting that they were not, contend that, while the county is expressly authorized by law to acquire real property "for a courthouse, jail, hospital, * * * art gallery, art institute, stadium and almshouse, public pleasure ground, public parks and other public purposes" (section 4041, subdivision 6, Pol. Code), the city has not the power to enter into the field now proposed to be invaded. The respondents quote from the Los Angeles city charter (subd. 4, § 2, art. I) the provision to the effect that the city may acquire property for "libraries, reading rooms, art galleries, museums, assembly or convention halls, schools, kindergartens, parks, playgrounds, gymnasiums, baths, * * *" etc., and that it may acquire buildings and establishments "necessary or convenient for the transaction of public business or for promoting the health, morals, education or welfare of the inhabitants of the city or for their amusement, recreation, entertainment or benefit," and point to it as insufficient to authorize the acquisition of a stadium. Further, the respondents contend that no adjudicated case can be found which upholds an appropriation of public funds for the construction of a stadium, and, having in mind the trusts imposed upon Parcel B by the deed under which the agricultural association holds title, as well as the broad purpose stated in the proposed lease, and commenting upon a definition of the word "stadium" as set forth in the brief of one of the petitioners, they say:

"Certainly the idea of using stadiums for the purpose of holding agricultural exhibitions or live stock shows was foreign to the conception of the ancient Greeks, and the attempt to attach such purposes to the use of the building contemplated by the lease agreement here involved requires a stretch of imagination and a straining of the reasonable construction of the terms used which it is unpleasant to contemplate."

This reference to the Greeks is most unfortunate for the respondents' cause, and is plainly made at random, not from an accurate reading of Grecian annals. It may be confounded by quotation from a standard history of Greece. After describing the stadium used for the Olympic games and after chronicling the rise of the Pythian, Nemean, and Isthmian games, all patterned upon the great original, Grote says:

"The sacred games and festivals, here alluded to as a class, took hold of the Greek mind by so great a variety of feelings, as to counterbalance in a high degree the political disseverance, and to keep alive among their widespread cities, in the midst of constant jealousy and frequent quarrel, a feeling of brotherhood and congenial sentiment such as must otherwise have died away. * * * Nor must we forget that the festival afforded opportunity for a sort of fair, including much traffic amid so large a class of spectators, and besides the exhibitions of the games themselves, there were recitations and lectures in a spacious council room for those who chose to listen to them, by poets, rhapsodes, philosophers, and historians—among which last, the history of Herodotus is said to have been publicly read by its author. * * * Kylon, whose unfortunate attempt to usurp the scepter at Athens has been recounted, had gained the prize in the Olympic stadium; Alexander, son of Amyntas, the prince of Macedon, had run for it. The great family of the Diagoridæ at Rhodes, who furnished magistrates and generals to their native city, supplied a still greater number of successful boxers and pankratiasts at Olympia, while other instances occur of generals named by various cities from the lists of successful Olympic gymnasts; and the odes of Pindar, always dearly purchased, attest how many of the great and wealthy were found in that list."

It is apparent from this passage that the Greeks used their stadiums in exactly the manner in which the one in contemplation by the city and the county is expected to be used by them, considering the difference between the ancient and the modern civilizations; and we have given space to the quotation because it is authority, in the present discussion, of equal value with the opinion of a court upon the subject, which, according to respondents, we must seek in vain. In connection with the striking recital of Grote and with the knowledge which all possess as to the form and character of a stadium and the general uses to which such a structure and the space it surrounds may be put, we may, however, quote with profit from Egan v. City and County of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 Pac. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754:

"The trend of authority in more recent years has been in the direction of permitting municipalities a wider range in undertaking to promote the public welfare or enjoyment. * * * Generally speaking, anything calculated to promote the education, the recreation or the pleasure of the public is to be included within the legitimate domain of public purposes."

The board of supervisors and the city council were amply justified in indulging the assumption upon which we have said their approval of the lease was predicated. We have no doubt that the projected stadium is well designed as an instrument through which the trust imposed upon Parcel B, as well as the purposes named in the proposed lease, may be discharged and effectuated, that its construction and maintenance will in an immense degree promote the public welfare, and that the power to construct and maintain it are well within the provisions of the charter.

In further pursuit of the contention that the city and the county propose to disburse the public funds for other than a public purpose, the respondents assert that, during the parts of the period of 10 years following the date of the proposed lease when the stadium is not in the possession of the city or the county, the development association is privileged to derive a revenue from the property by making charge for admissions to exhibitions or performances held under its auspices. This point is effectually disposed of by the express terms of the lease itself. We have seen that the money resulting from the charge for admissions must be expended in the maintenance of the property, and that such reports are to be made by the development association to the city and the county as will enable them to see to it that it is so expended. Under such circumstances neither the association nor its members may derive a profit from the use of the stadium. In this respect, also, then, the use of the public funds in the erection of the structure is not a use for a private purpose.

Another assault which the respondents make upon the contemplated lease agreement is that the county, under its terms, would acquire too intangible an interest in the stadium and in the land upon which it is to be erected to justify the proposed expenditure of county funds. This contention, although directed alone at the contemplated entry of the county into the arrangement, is based upon the idea that neither the city nor the county would obtain under the agreement more than an option or license to use the property. Respondents cite no authority in support of this contention, for the case of Emerson v. Bergin, 76 Cal. 197, 18 Pac. 264, mentioned in their brief, decides only that a license, in respect to real property, is "an authority to do a particular act, or series of acts, on another's land without possessing any estate therein," while the question here is whether, under the proposed lease, the county would acquire an estate or a tangible interest in Parcel B and in the stadium proposed to be erected upon it.

Notwithstanding the failure of counsel to present authority in support of their position, it must be conceded that, at least upon a superficial examination, the situation presents some difficulties, in view of the fact that the city and the county propose to expend the considerable sum of $950,000, one-half to come from each, in payment for the erection of a structure upon the land of the agricultural association, the ownership of the building to vest, in the final outcome, in that corporation. We propose, therefore, to analyze and consider the question made by the respondents with enough care to demonstrate that the difficulties mentioned are more apparent than real. It is evident that the prospective rights of the city and the county under the lease are quite different in fact, whether or not they are so in legal effect. The city already has, under the lease of 1912, an estate for years in the soil, subsisting until 1960, with a right to extend that estate for further 50 years. Under the proposed lease the city and the county may each occupy and use the property, including the stadium, after it is completed, for one-fourth of the time during 10 years from the date of the execution of the instrument, and for one-half of the time from thence forward until 1960. Thereafter, if the city exercises its option to renew under the lease of 1912, it may exclusively occupy and enjoy the property for an added 50 years. The right of the city under the proposed lease is, then, of more value, and is of a higher quality than that of the county. The holder of an estate for years, it is probably at the same time landlord to the development association, although we need not be at pains to define, in exact terms, its relationship to that corporation, nor need we attempt to give a name to the rights to be enjoyed by the county. It might be a work of some nicety to characterize fittingly the respective situations of the parties under the proposed arrangement, and it is not necessary for us to undertake the task. The lease agreement seems to be novel in form, and by that expression we do not adversely criticize it, for it is admirably conceived and admirably phrased. Whether or not it is to be regarded as creating the technical relationship of landlord and tenant between the city and the development association, or between the city and the county, or whether it makes each of the bodies politic but a tenant of the private corporation, for a time, in the stadium, it certainly creates clearly and definitely expressed contractual obligations between the parties. A very substantial consideration is to be paid by the city and the county for what rights each is to enjoy, and those rights cannot be misapprehended by a reader of the proposed agreement, nor can they be abridged nor taken away. No court can regard them lightly, for they are fixed and determined in apt and accurate language.

[3, 4] We have already said that the rights of the city under the agreement are of more value and of greater quality than those of the county, but that is not to say that the county is not justified in expending as much money as the city under the arrangement. The city is already master of the situation under its lease of 1912. It has a thing of great value under the instrument. It has, in common parlance, something to sell to the county, and it is these two who are to negotiate the terms of the sale. It is for the city to determine what consideration it will accept for the thing offered, and it is for the county to determine whether it can justly pay the price demanded. Surely, the authorities we have noted early in this opinion (Stockton Railroad Co. v. City of Stockton, supra, and the other cases cited with it), and the principle we have there stated, must have a direct application here. If a city council and a board of supervisors may determine what improvements are calculated to advance the public interest, subject to interference by the courts only when it is plainly apparent that such improvements are not so calculated, it must necessarily be true that they may determine what price shall be paid for these improvements, subject to no greater right in the courts to interfere. We cannot say that the county proposes to pay too great a price for the acquisition of the rights to be conferred upon it by the proposed lease, and we are therefore bound to declare, upon the judgment of the board of supervisors, that what it is to get is worth what it proposes to pay.

[5] The most determined objection made by respondents to the validity of the proposed lease agreement is that by its terms an attempt is made by the city to delegate to a private corporation, the development association, nondelegable public functions. Several lines of argument are addressed to this general question. It is first claimed that, under the original deed by which it holds, the agricultural association could not have leased to the development association, and that therefore the city, taking under the lease of 1912 no greater rights than the agricultural association possessed, cannot lease to the development association. By an act approved April 17, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 982, § 7), the Legislature empowered agricultural associations, among other things, to "sell, lease, beautify, improve and dispose of" real property, "and do any and all acts and things necessary to carry out the objects and purposes for which said associations are formed." This language would seem to confer the power to lease to a private corporation, and we do not understand that the respondents oppose this view. In fact, they refer to this statute as conferring a "general power" to lease. They do contend, however, that the authority thus given was removed by a statute approved 5 days later, April 22, 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 1082). This latter act empowers an agricultural association "to lease lands owned, managed or controlled by said association, whether in trust or otherwise, not needed for the permanent use of said association, to any municipal corporation, county, or city and county, in which said lands are located for a period of not to exceed 50 years, for purposes not inconsistent with the objects and purposes for which said association is formed and for which said lands are held, owned or controlled by it." The enactment contains a provision to the effect that "all acts and parts of acts in conflict with this act are hereby repealed," and it is by means of this clause that the respondents contend that the power conferred by the act of April 17 was taken away, for they say that the act of April 22 does conflict with the earlier act. Considering, which is the fact, that the act of April 17 was one defining the territorial limits of the 45 agricultural districts of the state, that it provided the machinery for the formation, organization, and powers of agricultural associations in the various districts, that it authorized the granting of financial aid by the state to the associations, and that it required an annual report from each association to the state board of agriculture, while the act of April 22 is devoted to the single purpose indicated by the quotations we have made from its provisions; considering, also, the fact that the second act sprang into being but 5 days after the first—we should expect to find a plain and decisive inharmony between the respective provisions which are now in question before we could hold that a conflict exists. We actually, however, perceive a contrary situation. Without reference to the considerations just mentioned, and having regard alone to the subject-matter of the two provisions which it is claimed are in conflict, it is apparent that the conflict is not present. The first act conferred a general leasing power. The Legislature, evidently fearing that some doubt might exist as to whether agricultural associations could execute leases to cities, counties, or to a city and county under the general language of that act, passed the act of April 22. The second act merely clarifies or supplements the first. We are convinced that the agricultural association could have leased directly to the development association.

[6] Continuing their contention that the city proposes to delegate the performance of its public functions to a private corporation, the respondents call attention to the fact that the lease of 1912 demised Parcel B to the city for use as a public playground and athletic field and for the holding of the various kinds of exhibitions mentioned in the instrument, and that the municipality bound itself thereby to keep the property open to the public at all times for those purposes and to operate and maintain it under the control of the board of playground commissioners. It is, upon this premise, insisted by the respondents that Parcel B was by the lease dedicated to a specific public use, that the city is bound, under that dedication, to continue the land in that use, and that the proposed lease agreement amounts to an abrogation or violation of that duty. In support of their contention the respondents first cite section 119b of the city charter of Los Angeles, which is to the effect that property "set apart or dedicated for the use of the public as a public park or parks shall forever remain to the use of the public as such park or parks inviolate, and no part of said land or real property shall ever be used or occupied for any other purpose." It is apparent to us that this section does not support respondents' position. A playground and athletic field is not a park within the meaning of the prohibition enforced by the section. None of the many decisions throughout the country which we have discovered, and in which the word "park" is defined, apply that designation to a public playground. A number of these decisions adopt the definition of the Century Dictionary to the effect that—

> "A park is a piece of ground set apart and maintained for public use, and laid out in such a way as to afford pleasure to the eye as well as opportunity for open air recreation."

With that definition we are satisfied, and a public playground does not come within it. We are aware that it has been determined that the setting aside of a part of a park as a playground is not inconsistent with park purposes (Caulfield v. Berwick, 27 Cal. App. 493, 150 Pac. 646), but that is far from saying that a playground is itself a public park. In fact, the case cited indicates the contrary, for it is to the effect, the italics being ours, that "the devotion of a reasonable portion of a public park to tennis courts, croquet grounds and children's playgrounds" comes within the uses for which public parks are created.

In further support of their contention that the city proposes, by the contemplated lease agreement, to delegate its public functions to a private corporation, respondents cite City of Oakland v. Carpentier, 13 Cal. 540, Scollay v. County of Butte, 67 Cal. 249, 7 Pac. 661, Knight v. City of Eureka, 123 Cal. 192, 55 Pac. 768, Thompson v. Board of Trustees, 144 Cal. 281, 77 Pac. 951, Egan v. City and County of San Francisco, 165 Cal. 576, 133 Pac. 294, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 754, and Galindo v. Walter, 8 Cal. App. 234, 96 Pac. 505. As these cases all announce a like principle, and as respondents place great reliance on the latest of them, Egan v. San Francisco, our view that all are inapplicable to the present controversy may properly be presented by considering that one, as compared with other authorities which we shall cite and with the facts which are now before us. In the case relied on the municipality owned a block of land, being part of a tract which had been set apart as a civic center. The city had the power under its charter to erect and conduct an opera house, but a private corporation agreed to expend $750,000 in the construction and equipment of such a building on the block in question, title to the structure to vest in the city and the building to be used for the production of operas and other musical and dramatic performances. The opera house was to be managed and controlled in perpetuity by a board of trustees, composed of nine members, and these trustees were to prescribe the quality of the performances to be given in the building and to fix the prices of admission to them. A citizen brought suit to enjoin the carrying out of the agreement and the Supreme Court determined that he was entitled to the relief demanded, upon the ground, in effect, which respondents invoke in opposition to the lease inveighed against in the present litigation. It is obvious from the above statement that the city of San Francisco, in the case cited, had attempted to barter away its public duty and responsibility, but is that case at all kindred to the present one? Note the difference between the two situations. Here, there is no final abdication of the functions of the city, if, in view of what we shall hereafter say, there can be said to be any abdication of its functions at all. It is true that the development association is to have the use of the property half the time for something less than 10 years, as the period of construction, fixed by the lease agreement at a year and a half, with a right to extensions of time for cause, is to be deducted from the 10 years; but the revenue to be derived from that use is to be expended for the maintenance of the property. The use of the property, without expense to either public treasury for maintenance, then, for nearly 10 years, is to be enjoyed by the city and the county the remaining half of the time for that period, and for all the time thereafter until 1960, with the city's right of renewal under the lease of 1912 yet to be considered. Allowing to the members of the city council and of the board of supervisors the honesty of purpose which we must accord to them and the soundness of judgment which we must attribute to them, under authorities already twice mentioned in this opinion, we are bound to consider, not only that the stadium is necessary to the needs of the people of the city and the county, but that the two bodies have adopted an available means for its procurement, unless their want of honesty or lack of judgment in those matters is apparent to us.

The rights secured to the development association by the proposed lease are temporary only, and their comparatively brief exercise is to be followed by a long and beneficial use and enjoyment of the property by the city and the county. Except for the mere power to present and to superintend presentation of performances and exhibitions, the rights of the development association are shadowy and unsubstantial, with the city and county at all times present and apparent as the substance behind the shadow. The development association is but the representative of the city and the county in the construction, in the maintenance and in the collection and disbursement of funds for the maintenance of the stadium. In its financial operations, under the system of reports provided for in the lease, it is subject to the rigid scrutiny and control of both bodies politic. Does this temporary interposition of the development association into the proposed enterprise, granted that the corporation may, during its intermittent and comparatively brief tenure, regulate the giving of performances and exhibitions; does that interposition, we say, bring the arrangement within the condemnation of the cases, including those cited by the respondents, which are undoubtedly and clearly to the general effect that a public entity cannot delegate the performance of its governmental duty or functions to a private agency? There are many decided cases which establish a rule of law not in opposition to that applied in Egan v. San Francisco, supra, and the other cases relied upon by respondents, but they are based in each instance upon a state of facts essentially different from that presented in those cases. To which of these different lines of facts is our present case most clearly akin? In Worden v. City of New Bedford, 131 Mass. 23, 41 Am. Rep. 185, the municipality had leased a room in its city hall to a private association for the holding of a poultry show, upon a compensation paid for the use of the room, including lighting and heating and the services of a janitor who was regularly in the employ of the city and under whose charge the city hall was. Through the negligence of the janitor a person who was apparently in attendance upon the poultry show was injured, and suit was brought against the city to recover for the resulting damage. The court said:

"The city could not erect buildings for business or speculative purposes, but having a city hall, built in good faith and used for municipal purposes, it has the right to allow it to be used incidentally for other purposes, either gratuitously or for a compensation."

Upon this reasoning a verdict for the plaintiff was sustained. The Supreme Court of Wisconsin impliedly recognizes the power of a municipality to lease park property for other purposes, if the use under the lease be not destructive of its use for park purposes. In passing upon such a lease it was said, in Gilman v. City of Milwaukee, 55 Wis. 328, 13 N. W. 266:

"It may be a question of fact whether such use is inconsistent with its use for a park, such use being to some extent public. If, however, as seems to be implied by the complaint, such use is entirely inconsistent with the use of these grounds for the purpose of a public park, and destructive of such use, then certainly such a diversion of the grounds is unlawful, and a lease for that purpose void."

The rule we have in mind has also been applied by the Supreme Court of the United States. In City of New Orleans v. Louisiana Construction Co., 140 U. S. 654, 11 Sup. Ct. 968, 35 L. Ed. 556, it appears that a certain tract of land along the Mississippi river had long been used as a public landing, the right to such use having been based upon a dedication of the land to the municipality. The city leased the property to a private individual for a term of 25 years, and he erected certain structures upon it, which were used for the landing and storage of sugar and molasses, that having been the purpose to which the tract had been theretofore devoted. In passing upon the validity of the lease the court said:

"The city has not undertaken to alienate or sell the ground under the sheds, but has only leased it for a term of years, reverting at the end of that term, with the sheds built thereon, to the city for the benefit of the public. The ground has no more ceased to be devoted to the public use by the making of the lease and the erection of the sheds, than if the city had itself built and managed the sheds for the promotion of commerce and the benefit of the city and its inhabitants."

In Bryant v. Logan, 56 W. Va. 141, 49 S. E. 21, 3 Ann. Cas. 1011, a similar question was under review. The result of the opinion there rendered is thus expressed in the syllabus prepared by the court:

"A lease for the term of 1 year, with a right to extend it 5 years, by a city, of a part of a public park, to improve it, and use it at times for training and running race horses, for a rental to the city, reserving access at times to the public for riding and driving on the track, is not an unlawful diversion of such park from its legitimate use, and the lease is not void."

Before turning to the decisions of our own state, we cite other cases as illustrating the doctrine upon which the foregoing quotations are based: Little v. City of Holyoke, 177 Mass. 114, 58 N. E. 170, 52 L. R. A. 417; Davis v. Inhabitants of Rockport, 213 Mass. 279, 100 N. E. 612, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1139; Dodge v. North End Improvement Association, 189 Mich. 16, 155 N. W. 438, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 485.

[7] In Harter v. City of San Jose, 141 Cal. 659, 75 Pac. 344, the Supreme Court passed upon the validity of a lease by a city to a private individual of a portion of a public park for hotel purposes. After discussing the question whether there was an express authority in the city to make the lease, the court upheld the instrument upon the broad general principles underlying the decisions from other states to which we have referred in our discussion of this question. In Egan v. San Francisco, supra, which is relied on so strongly by respondents, the court, in connection with its refusal to uphold the agreement then in suit, says:

"There may, of course, be power to lease public property, but the agreement under consideration does not purport to be a lease."

The petitioners and the respondents are in disagreement upon the question as to what is meant by this utterance. Without repeating their arguments upon that matter, we are confident that the expression had its use in a consideration of the principles illustrated and supported by the authorities we have above cited. Certainly, the part of the statement concerning the power to lease has ample foundation in those authorities, and is well justified by them. We are convinced, as well, that the validity of the lease agreement now in question is firmly established by them, and that they, instead of Egan v. San Francisco, in the main doctrine presented by it, and other cases like it, rule the point now under discussion. The line of cases upon which we rely, leading up to Harter v. San Jose, supra, and to the detached expression in Egan v. San Francisco, established the rule that a city may lease property devoted to a public use for purposes not inconsistent with such use when there is no public need therefor, and that it may also lease such property for purposes which conduce to or aid in the discharge of such public use. Under the line of cases which we have already referred to so often (Stockton Railroad Co. v. City of Stockton, supra, and other cases cited with it), it is within the province of the city legislative body to determine that its property devoted to a public use is not needed for such use, either for a limited time, or as to a part of its acreage, and to determine what purposes, to be administered by private agencies, will aid in the discharge of such use, and to make leases thereof accordingly. When that body has solved such a question the courts must be satisfied with the solution, unless it is plainly apparent to them that it is unjustified.

Such a condition is far from apparent to us in this instance, and we now determine that the claim of the respondents that the city is about to delegate the performance of its public duty to a private agency is unfounded and unwarranted.

The demurrers to the petitions are overruled, and a peremptory writ of mandate will issue in each of the proceedings, the one requiring the respondent chairman of the board of supervisors and the other the respondent mayor to execute the proposed lease agreement.

1. Appeal and error ⇐931(1)—Findings construed favorably in support of judgment.

Findings should be construed most favorably in support of the judgment.

2. Sales ⇐442(2)—Measure of damages for breach of warranty as to fitness of heating plant stated.

In action for breach of warranty as to fitness of heating system to produce a sufficient amount of heat for the rooms in plaintiff's building, the measure of damages under Civ. Code, §§ 3313, 3314, was the difference between the value of the heating system and what its value would have been had it complied with the warranty but if the plant was of no value whatever for the purpose contemplated, the measure of damages would be the difference between the amount paid therefor, where that amount was the value of the system if it had answered the warranty, and the actual value of the different articles which entered into its construction and were retained by plaintiffs.

3. Sales ⇐441(4)—Evidence held insufficient to sustain finding as to damages sustained for breach of warranty.

In action for breach of warranty as to capacity of heating plant, evidence held insufficient to sustain finding as to the amount of damages sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Pat R. Parker, Judge.

Action by Urban Alguire and another against the Riverside Sheet Metal Works. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Thomas T. Porteous, of Riverside, for appellant.

Raymond Best, of Riverside, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment entered in favor of plaintiffs in an action to recover damages for the breach of a warranty.

As appears from the complaint, defendant, for an agreed price of $576, performed the labor and remodeled a heating system in plaintiff's rooming house, in connection with which it furnished and installed a furnace, oil burner, oil tank, grills, coils, and necessary connections, and guaranteed that the system as installed and completed would "produce sufficient heat for all the rooms at present connected with the old system, and to deliver heat to these rooms with the exception of any above the first floor that may have an obstruction in the air pipe or a faulty installation."

Plaintiffs alleged facts showing a breach of the warranty in that, while they had operated the heating system—

"in accordance with the direction of defendant, it did not produce sufficient heat for all the rooms at the time of the purchase aforesaid connected with the old system and it did not deliver heat to those rooms, with the exception of any above the first floor that may have an obstruction in the air pipe or a faulty installation."

Admitting the terms of the warranty, defendant denied the breach thereof, and alleged that it duly performed all the conditions of the contract on its part to be performed. As to this issue, the court made an adverse finding to defendant. Appellant attacks this finding, claiming that it is not responsive to the issue.

[1] The rule of law is well settled that findings should be construed most favorably in support of the judgment, and, so construed, we deem it sufficient in form and substance.

It is also contended that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding in that the system as installed was connected with a coal furnace theretofore used by plaintiffs, and appellant claims that the guaranty contemplated and was based upon the use of the coal furnace in connection with the oil furnace so installed by it. Conceding this to be true, there is evidence tending to prove that the coal furnace was so used as an auxiliary to the oil furnace without any appreciable result in the production and distribution of heat to the rooms.

It appears that plaintiffs paid defendant the sum of $351 and made and delivered their promissory note in the sum of $225 covering the balance of the contract price, no part of which was paid. In addition to its answer, defendant filed what it designates a cross-complaint for recovery upon the promissory note so executed by plaintiffs.

Upon these facts, and having found there was a breach of the warranty, the court found "that the furnace and all equipment furnished by the defendant to plaintiffs herein under the terms of the said contract were at the time of delivery to plaintiffs of the value of $265 and no more," and "that said articles would have been of the value of $576 if they had answered the warranty in the said contract contained," thus fixing plaintiffs' damage at $311 less the amount of $225 specified in the promissory note; and as a conclusion of law found that plaintiffs were entitled to recover judgment for $86.

[2, 3] The law as to damages which may be recovered in a case of this kind is declared in the Civil Code as follows:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the quality of personal property is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value which the property would have had at the time to which the warranty referred, if it had been complied with, over its actual value at that time." Section 3313.

"The detriment caused by the breach of a warranty of the fitness of an article of personal property for a particular purpose is deemed to be that which is defined by the last section, together with a fair compensation for the loss incurred by an effort in good faith to use it for such purpose." Section 3314.

The warranty in question was as to the fitness of the heating system for the purpose of producing and distributing a sufficient amount of heat for the rooms in plaintiffs' building, and under the above sections of the Code the burden was upon plaintiffs not only to show a breach of the contract, but the difference in the value of the heating system for the particular purpose for which it was intended and its actual value at the time when delivered to them (Scurich v. Ryan, 14 Cal. App. 750, 113 Pac. 123; Vol. 30 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, p. 231), and this can be done only by evidence of facts and figures from which the amount of damage can be determined. As alleged in the complaint, the furnace, burner, tank, grills, coils, and necessary connections were at the time of delivery to plaintiffs of the value of only $50. This allegation was denied, and the only evidence which the record discloses as having been produced in support of the allegation was the testimony of William Copley, who testified that the value of the castings of the furnace was $90, and that the oil burner installed therewith was of the value of $125, making a total of $215 for these two articles. He further stated:

"There were a great many things connected with the furnace besides the mere castings; that the furnace did not constitute half the labor or anything, or half the price of the job; that there was a brick-set furnace which cost a lot of money, and a hot-air coil in the furnace."

In addition to this testimony, it is alleged in the complaint that, other than the furnace and oil burner, defendant furnished and installed an oil tank, grills, coils, and necessary connections, title to all of which was adjudged to plaintiffs, and as to the character or value of which not a scintilla of evidence was offered. Moreover, the court was left entirely to conjecture as to what constituted the "necessary connections" mentioned in the complaint. If the heating system as installed was of less value to plaintiffs than the amount which they agreed to pay, then the difference in its value as a heating system and what it would have been had it complied with the warranty, would constitute plaintiffs' damage. If, on the other hand, it was of no value whatever for the purpose contemplated, then the difference between $576 paid therefor and the actual value of the different articles which entered into its construction and retained by plaintiffs, would constitute their damage. While in fixing the actual value of the articles the court, in addition to the $215 fixed by Copley as the value of the furnace and burner, charged plaintiffs with the further sum of $50, there is no evidence upon which to base such a charge. If intended to cover the value of "the oil tank, grills, coils, and necessary connections," as to which no evidence was offered, the finding must be deemed based upon the merest conjecture, and not upon proof of facts, without which the damage could not be estimated.

The judgment is reversed.

CALIFORNIA NAT. SUPPLY CO. v. O'BRIEN et al. (Civ. 3240.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 1, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 28, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃762—Contention made on recent decision properly urged in reply brief.

A contention, based on a decision of the Supreme Court rendered since the submission of appeal, will be considered by the appellate court, where urged in reply brief though not in original brief.

2. Corporations ⊂⊃244(7) — Transferees of watered stock, unaware thereof, not liable to creditors extending credit on faith of the fictitious capitalization.

Where a corporation issued stock for property grossly or fraudulently overvalued, transferees of such stock, who did not participate in the transaction, and took their stock unaware thereof, are not liable to corporate creditors, who extended credit on faith of the fictitious capitalization.

3. Pleading ⊂⊃403(2)—Averments in answer not admission so as to supply omissions in complaint.

Where the Supreme Court did not determine until after submission of appeal that transferees of so-called watered stock are not liable to creditors unless they took with knowledge, held that allegations in the answers of stockholders, sued by a creditor of the corporation which had taken property at a gross overvaluation, should not be deemed admissions that the stockholders took with knowledge, judgment for the creditor supplying the complaint, plaintiff having neither alleged nor proved that fact.

4. Corporations ⊂⊃240(1) — Creditor who knows of overvaluation of property taken for stock cannot recover from stockholders.

Though property was received in exchange for corporate stock at a fictitious or fraudulent overvaluation, a creditor, who knew of the overvaluation, cannot recover from stockholders, for the recovery is based on principles of fraud, and a creditor who knew of the overvaluation was in no wise defrauded.

5. Corporations ⊂⊃240(1) — One extending credit on faith of fictitious capitalization may recover despite constructive notice.

One who extends credit to a corporation in reliance on fictitious capitalization, property having been exchanged for stock at a gross overvaluation, may recover, notwithstanding he had constructive knowledge of the facts, and by diligent inquiry might have ascertained the overvaluation.

6. Corporations ⊂⊃271—Whether creditor was deceived by fraudulent capitalization, question of fact.

Whether a creditor was deceived by fictitious capitalization, property having been exchanged for stock at a gross overvaluation, is a question of fact.

7. Corporations ⊂⊃271 — Findings as to constructive notice and credit on faith of fictitious capital held not inconsistent.

In an action by a corporate creditor against stockholders, where he asserted that property was received under gross and fraudulent overvaluation, a finding that the creditor relied on the fictitious capitalization is not nullified by a further finding that he had knowledge of facts sufficient to put him on inquiry, and that by diligence he might have discovered the fictitious capitalization.

8. Corporations ⊂⊃232(3)—Stock held to be based on fictitious capital, and not issued by failing corporation.

Where stock of corporation was given promotor in exchange for property grossly overvalued; and he returned a portion to the treasury, the shares, when issued, cannot be deemed the shares of an insolvent corporation, or one whose capital was impaired, but must be deemed stock issued in pursuance of the original scheme of the promoters to create a fictitious capital.

9. Corporations ⊂⊃99(2)—No exception as to mining or oil and gas companies permitting fictitious capitalization.

There is no exception in favor of mining or oil and gas companies allowing them to accept property in lieu of stock at a fictitious overvaluation.

10. Appeal and error ⊂⊃843(3) — Particular questions of fact not reviewed, where cause is remanded.

Where judgment must be reversed and cause remanded the question of sufficiency of the evidence to establish a particular fact will not be determined, as the evidence might not be the same on retrial.

11. Corporations ⊂⊃170, 174 — Relation of stockholder is one of contract, and exists only when party expressly or impliedly consents.

The relation of stockholder to a corporation is one of contract, and exists only when a party expressly consents to become a stockholder, or his conduct is such that his consent can be implied, and he cannot be made a stockholder merely because some corporate officer has entered his name on the books as such, and caused stock to be issued in his name.

12. Corporations ⊂⊃170—One cannot become corporate stockholder by ratification unless there is meeting of the minds.

Ordinarily, ratification, like a contract, includes within it an intention, and one to whom corporate stock was issued without his authority, does not become a stockholder by ratification, unless it clearly appears that there was some conscious and intended approval of the issuance of the stock in his name.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by the California National Supply Company, a corporation, against Robert F. O'Brien and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed as to defendant O'Brien, and as to other defendants reversed, with directions.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Plaintiff, a judgment creditor of the Panama Oil Company, a California corporation, brought this action against certain of the stockholders of that company to collect what are claimed to be the unpaid balances on the par value of their shares. Plaintiff had judgment and defendants appeal.

In so far as is material to our inquiry, the case, as disclosed by the findings of the trial court, is substantially this: The Panama Oil Company was incorporated with an authorized capital stock of $2,000,000, divided into 2,000,000 shares of the par value of $1 each. At the first meeting of the board of directors, held May 24, 1912, J. B. Hedrick, the president of the company and a leading spirit in its incorporation and organization, presented to the board a written offer to convey to the corporation certain properties, consisting of a lease of certain land supposed to be oil-bearing, certain shares of stock of the Daybreak Oil Company, and an option to purchase certain shares of stock of the Midnight Oil Company, for the sum of $2,000,000, to be paid by delivery of the company's 2,000,000 shares to Hedrick or his order—the shares to be issued as fully paid. This offer was accepted by the board and Hedrick thereupon transferred the properties to the corporation. Three days later, viz. May 27, 1912, Hedrick delivered to the company a written order wherein he directed the corporation to issue to himself 1,000,000 of its 2,000,000 shares of capital stock, and the remaining million to certain of these defendants. Thereupon a certificate for 1,000,000 shares was issued to Hedrick himself, and, at the same time, certificates were issued to such of these defendants as were designated by Hedrick in his order on the company. On the same day a written agreement was entered into between Hedrick and the corporation whereby the former agreed to return to the company, to be held by it in trust, the 1,000,000 shares that had been issued to him, to be disposed of by the corporation for the benefit of its stockholders "with a view to securing the necessary funds with which to carry on the business of said Panama Oil Company, and provide a working capital therefor." Hedrick thereupon indorsed and surrendered the certificate for the 1,000,000 shares that had been issued to him, and a new certificate was issued, certifying that the "treasury" of the corporation is the owner of the 1,000,000 shares. The findings of the lower court refer to the 1,000,000 shares so returned by Hedrick to the corporation as "trust fund stock," also as "treasury stock." Subsequently shares of this "trust fund" or "treasury" stock were issued to certain of the defendants for sums considerably less than the par value.

The actual value of the properties transferred by Hedrick to the Panama Oil Company in exchange for all of its 2,000,000 shares of capital stock was $500,000, and no more. The lower court found that Hedrick and the directors of the Panama Oil Company knew that the properties received by the corporation in exchange for its 2,000,000 shares did not exceed $500,000 at the date of the exchange, and that they caused the 2,000,000 shares to be issued "with the intent to have them appear to have been fully paid for upon their being issued by said corporation."

Thereafter plaintiff sold and delivered to the Panama Oil Company certain goods, wares, and merchandise, for the value whereof it subsequently obtained judgment against that corporation—a judgment for $8,050.56. The Daybreak Oil Company, all of whose issued capital stock was taken over by the Panama Oil Company shortly after the latter's organization, was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $21,978.31. The Panama Oil Company assumed this indebtedness, and gave to plaintiff its promissory notes therefor. These notes were not paid when they fell due, and plaintiff, accordingly, instituted an action thereon, obtaining a judgment against the Panama Oil Company for $26,561.53. Execution having been issued upon each of these two judgments and returned nulla bona, plaintiff brought this action against the stockholders of the Panama Oil Company to make good its two judgments out of what it claims to be the unpaid balances on the par value of their shares.

At each of the times when it extended credit to the Panama Oil Company, which was subsequent to the issuance of the 2,000,000 shares to Hedrick or his order, plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the facts and circumstances under which the 2,000,000 shares had been issued in exchange for properties of the value of $500,000. Neither the Panama Oil Company nor its officers nor any person made any actual disclosure to plaintiff of the difference between the par value of the 2,000,000 shares and the value of the properties received in exchange therefor; nor did plaintiff give credit to the Panama Oil Company with any actual knowledge of any such difference in valuation. So the trial court found. In addition to the findings, thus showing that plaintiff had no actual knowledge of the fraudulent transaction whereby shares of the par value of $2,000,000 were issued for properties worth but $500,000, the trial court further found that at the times when it extended credit to the Panama Oil Company plaintiff and its officers and agents "had knowledge of facts and circumstances sufficient to put it and them upon inquiry as to conditions and circumstances attending the issuance of all of the capital stock of the Panama Oil Company on May 24, 1912, as in these findings hereinabove fully set forth, and the execution by J. B. Hedrick of the contract dated May 27, 1912, * * * and that had plaintiff and its officers and agents prosecuted such inquiry it and they would have learned all of the facts concerning the issuance of said stock and the acquisition of said properties by the Panama Oil Company, * * * and such knowledge would have been acquired by it prior to the time it advanced the aforesaid credit to the Panama Oil Company."

The four points made by appellants in their opening briefs are: (1) According to the trial court's findings, plaintiff had constructive notice of all the facts and circumstances under which shares of the par value of $2,000,000 were issued as fully paid in exchange for properties of the value of $500,000; such constructive notice, so it is claimed, was equivalent to actual notice; therefore it must be held, as a matter of law, that plaintiff did not extend credit to the Panama Oil Company in reliance upon any presumption that the full par value of the 2,000,000 shares had been or would be received by the corporation. (2) Those defendants who hold shares issued from what the court in its findings denominated "trust fund" or "treasury" stock—the 1,000,000 shares that were redelivered to the corporation by Hedrick and later issued as from its treasury—cannot be held liable because, so it is claimed, those shares were issued from the treasury of the corporation for their fair market value to enable the corporation to prosecute its business and develop its properties. Hence, it is argued, those shares are within the doctrine enunciated in such cases as Clark v. Bever, 139 U. S. 96, 11 Sup. Ct. 468, 35 L. Ed. 88; Fogg v. Blair, 139 U. S. 118, 11 Sup. Ct. 476, 35 L. Ed. 104; Handley v. Stutz, 139 U. S. 417, 11 Sup. Ct. 530, 35 L. Ed. 227; and J. F. Lucey Co. v. McMullen, 178 Cal. 425, 173 Pac. 1000. (3) The case is within the rule of the South Mountain Mining Co. Case (D. C.) 5 Fed. 403, wherein it was held, in effect, that the stockholders of a mining corporation are not liable to the corporation's judgment creditors even though their shares were issued as fully paid in exchange for mining properties taken at an overvaluation. (4) The evidence is insufficient to support the finding that defendant Wilbert Morgrage is the owner of shares of the capital stock of the Panama Oil Company, and as such liable to judgment creditors of the corporation for the unpaid balance of the par value of the shares standing on the books of the company in his name.

[1] The foregoing are the only points made for reversal in appellants' opening briefs. Since the first submission of the case, however, appellants, by letter addressed to the court, and, later, by oral argument, have made an additional point, presently to be considered—a point based upon the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 194 Pac. 11, handed down by that court some time after the first submission of this case. Under the circumstances, there was, we think, good reason for appellants' failure to make this point in their opening briefs, and we, therefore, are of the opinion that it is within the exception mentioned in Hibernia Sav. & L. Soc. v. Farnham, 153 Cal. 584, 96 Pac. 9, 126 Am. St. Rep. 129, and that the point should be considered.

[2] Passing now to a consideration of appellants' five points: We shall address ourselves to the point last mentioned, since it seems to be the one that necessitates a reversal of the judgment. And since the four points raised in appellants' opening briefs present questions that will arise on a retrial, it becomes our duty likewise to pass upon those questions for the guidance of court and counsel.

1. In Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 194 Pac. 11, it is held, for the first time in this state, that where stock is issued as fully paid in exchange for property grossly or fraudulently overvalued (commonly known as watered stock), a transferee of such stock, who did not participate in the transaction whereby it was originally issued, and who took his stock unaware of the character of that transaction, is not liable to a judgment creditor of the corporation for any part of the difference between the par value of the stock and the actual value of the property exchanged therefor; and, further, that it is incumbent upon the plaintiff, in an action by a judgment creditor against a transferee of such watered stock, to allege in his complaint and prove at the trial that such transferee, when he acquired his stock, was fairly chargeable with knowledge of the fraudulent transaction whereby the stock, issued as fully paid, was issued in exchange for the overvalued property.

In the instant case all of the defendant stockholders, with the exception of the defendant Robert F. O'Brien, appear to be within the reason of the rule announced in the Rhode Case, irrespective of whether technically they are "transferees" or not. And if within the reason of the rule, then such defendants must be held to be within the rule itself. Civ. Code, § 3511. The reason for the rule enunciated in the Rhode Case is substantially this: Where a person acquires and accepts stock which purports to be fully paid, but which, in fact, is not, i. e., where the stock has been watered, the liability of the stockholder to a judgment creditor of the corporation is grounded on fraud, actual or constructive; the liability exists by virtue of the principle that one giving credit to a corporation is entitled to rely upon its ostensible capitalization as the basis for the credit given, and when the corporation issues watered stock, thereby creating the appearance of a capitalization in excess of its real assets, the transaction necessarily involves the misleading of subsequent creditors; and the transaction, therefore, whether done with that purpose actually in mind or not, is at least a constructive fraud upon such creditors. It thus will be seen that a stockholder's liability to a judgment creditor of the corporation is based, not upon his relation to the corporation as a stockholder, but upon a fraudulent transaction—a fraudulent device to evade the law and defeat its useful and wholesome requirements. It follows, therefore, that because fraud, actual or constructive, is the basis of the stockholder's liability one who did not participate in the original fraudulent transaction, or who acquired his stock in ignorance of that transaction, and who is not fairly chargeable with knowledge thereof, taking his stock in the bona fide belief that it had been fully paid for, cannot be held liable.

In the case before us the immediate parties to the original fraudulent transaction—fraudulent in its purpose and effect, in so far as it created an ostensible capitalization of the Panama Oil Company in excess of its real assets—were Hedrick, on the one hand, and, on the other hand, the corporation itself and its seven directors, one of whom was the defendant O'Brien. With the exception of O'Brien it does not appear that any of the defendants was directly a party to, or participated in, the original fraudulent transaction. It follows, therefore, that, with the exception of O'Brien, none of the defendants should be held liable unless it can be alleged and proved that he or she acquired his or her stock under such circumstances as to make him or her fairly chargeable with knowledge of the fraud with which the original transaction was infected. The complaint is wholly void of any allegation purporting to connect any of the defendants with knowledge of the fraudulent transaction that resulted in the issuance of the watered stock, although demurrers, general and special, were interposed and overruled.

[3] It is claimed by respondent that certain averments in the answers of some of the defendants, upon which the court made findings favorable to plaintiff and responsive to the issues thereby tendered, are sufficient to supply the averment, omitted from the complaint, that defendants had knowledge of the nature of the original fraudulent transaction. The answer of the defendants Webb, Fisher, and Levy may be taken as a sample. After denying that they are the owners of any shares of stock in the Panama Oil Company, the answer filed by the defendants Webb, Fisher, and Levy alleges that they are innocent pledge holders for value and in good faith, "and without notice of any amount due or to become due upon the shares of stock of said corporation, * * * and without notice of any claim of plaintiff against defendants or any of them, and without notice of any amount due or claimed to be due for unpaid subscriptions." We do not think that these affirmative averments in the answer of Webb, Fisher, and Levy were intended to be, or were ever understood by any of the parties to be, the equivalent of an allegation that, when they acquired their stock, those defendants had knowledge of the nature of the fraudulent transaction pursuant to which the 2,000,000 shares were originally issued—1,000,000 to Hedrick himself (subsequently transferred to the treasury of the corporation), and the remainder to persons designated by Hedrick. This conclusion is fortified by the consideration that it is fairly apparent from the record that neither court nor counsel ever had in mind the difference between the liability of a subscriber who was a party to the original fraudulent transaction and that of a transferee of such subscriber. Indeed, counsel for respondent expressly concede that the case was neither tried nor decided, nor were any of the briefs written, with the doctrine of the Rhode Case in mind, or with the idea that the law is as there declared, or that it is applicable to the present case. The answer of the defendant Couse, as well as that of the defendants Dinsmore and wife, presents the issue of knowledge somewhat more directly and explicitly than does that of the defendants Webb, Fisher, and Levy. But regardless of what construction may fairly be placed upon the averments in any of the answers respecting defendants' knowledge of the original fraudulent transaction between Hedrick and the corporation, we think that where, as here, it is fairly apparent that neither court nor counsel ever had in mind the difference between the liability of those who were parties to the original fraudulent device and that of subsequent stockholders acquiring their stock without notice thereof, a new trial, where that distinction is observed, is desirable, and that in such case the affirmative averments of the answers should not be deemed to supply the omission of a necessary allegation in the complaint. It would shock all sense of justice to permit an averment in the answers to relieve plaintiff from the effect of its failure to make an essential allegation in its complaint, when no party to the action, not even the plaintiff itself, ever gave to such averment in the answers the value or effect that would have been given it by all the parties had the averment been pleaded by the plaintiff in its complaint with the intent and purpose that that party now seeks to attribute to it as it is pleaded in certain of the answers.

Our conclusion that a new trial should be had, and plaintiff be permitted to amend its complaint, should it be so advised, accords with what was said by Mr. Justice Wilbur in the opinion filed by him in the Rhode Case:

"I think," says Mr. Justice Wilbur, "that the finding that Knapp was the agent of the defendants in purchasing the capital stock is sufficiently sustained by the evidence and the inferences properly deducible therefrom. In view of the fact, however, that the finding is a general one, and that it is fairly apparent from the record that neither court nor counsel had in mind the difference between the liability of the subscribers and transferees for the unpaid subscriptions resulting from the overvaluation of the property received in exchange therefor, I am satisfied that a new trial, where that distinction is observed, is desirable."

For these reasons we are satisfied that, except as to the defendant O'Brien, who unquestionably was a party to the original fraudulent transaction, the judgment should be reversed with leave to plaintiff, should it be so advised, to amend its complaint to conform to the rule enunciated in the Rhode Case.

[4] 2. It cannot be held, as a matter of law, that the finding that plaintiff had knowledge of facts sufficient to put it upon inquiry respecting the fraudulent issue of the 2,000,000 shares of overvalued properties counteracted the trial court's other finding that plaintiff extended credit to the Panama Oil Company without any actual knowledge of that fraudulent stock transaction. There are, it is true, some loose expressions used by certain of the text-writers to the effect that the issuance of watered stock is binding as against subsequent creditors with constructive notice of the facts. But no case squarely in point has been called to our attention; and we think that, on principle, creditors who extend credit to the corporation with only constructive notice of the fraud practiced upon them are not necessarily precluded from a recovery.

Whether a recovery from the stockholders can be had by a creditor who, without any actual knowledge of the circumstances of the fraudulent transaction that resulted in the issuance of the watered stock, had notice, nevertheless, of facts sufficient to put an ordinarily prudent person upon inquiry, that is, whether a recovery can be had by a creditor who had constructive notice only, presents a question that must be determined in accordance with principles that are a part of the body of the law of fraud. The reason why a subsequent creditor who has actual notice of the real state of affairs cannot disturb the arrangement between the company and its stockholders is that one who has such notice cannot claim that he was deceived by the false representation as to the amount of capital available for the satisfaction of the company's debts. The capital of a corporation is the basis of its credit. It is a substitute for the individual liability of those who own its stock. Persons deal with the corporation and give it credit on the faith of its ostensible capital—on the strength of the appearances created by its articles of incorporation whereby it proclaims to the world that it is capitalized for a certain amount. Persons extending credit to the corporation have the right to assume that it has paid-in capital to the amount which it represents itself as having; and if they extend credit on the faith of that representation, and if the representation is false, a fraud is thereby perpetrated upon them—as much so as if the corporation's officers had secured the extension of credit by the direct and express representation that all subscribed stock had been issued for its full par value in money or money's worth. If the corporation becomes insolvent, the law, upon the plainest principles of common justice, says to the delinquent stockholder, "Make that representation good by paying for your stock." It is the misrepresentation of fact in stating the amount of capital to be greater than it really is that is the true basis of the liability of the stockholder in such cases. It follows, therefore, that it is only those creditors who have relied, or who can fairly be presumed to have relied, upon the professed amount of capital, in whose favor the law will recognize and enforce an equity against the stockholders. It is impossible for creditors with actual notice of the circumstances under which the watered stock was issued, and of the value of the property taken in exchange therefor, to have acted on and trusted appearances rather than the true condition of affairs. It is impossible that creditors with such notice could have been deceived. And since fraud is the sole basis of the right of recovery in such cases (Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., supra), there can be no recovery by a creditor who was not deceived by the corporation's apparent or ostensible capitalization. Such creditor is not defrauded by the taking of overvalued property in payment for stock (Sherman v. Harley, 178 Cal. 584, 174 Pac. 901, 7 A. L. R. 950; Lea v. Iron Belt Mercantile Co., 147 Ala. 421, 42 South. 415, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 279, 119 Am. St. Rep. 93; Hospes v. Northwestern Mfg. Co., 48 Minn. 174, 50 N. W. 1117, 15 L. R. A. 470, 31 Am. St. Rep. 637).

[5] Though a creditor cannot claim to have been deceived if, when he extended the credit to the corporation, he had actual knowledge of all the facts connected with the fraudulent issue of the watered stock, it does not necessarily follow that a creditor who possesses only notice of facts sufficient to put an ordinarily prudent person upon inquiry was not in fact deceived. Such a creditor, notwithstanding his knowledge of facts sufficient to have put an ordinarily prudent person upon inquiry, may, nevertheless, be actually deceived—he may be deceived by appearances, i. e., by the corporation's ostensible capitalization.

There is a strong line of modern authority to the effect that the doctrine of constructive notice can never be so applied as to prevent a defrauded party from recovering for fraudulent misrepresentations. The rule is stated in Ruling Case Law as follows:

"The law of constructive notice can never be so applied as to relieve a party from responsibility for actual misstatements and frauds." 12 R. C. L. p. 376.

The Kentucky Court of Appeals, in Trimble v. Ward, 97 Ky. 755, 31 S. W. 866, quotes Mr. Bigelow as follows:

"If the representations were of a character to induce action, and did induce it, that is enough; for it is not just that a man who had deceived another should be permitted to say to him, 'You ought not to have believed or trusted me,' or 'You, yourself, were guilty of negligence.' "

In Western Mfg. Co. v. Cotton & Long, 126 Ky. 749, 104 S. W. 758, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 427, the court says:

"The rule of law is one of policy. Is it better to encourage negligence in the foolish, or fraud in the deceitful? Either course has most obvious dangers. But judicial experience exemplifies that the former is the least objectionable, and least hampers the administration of pure justice."

In Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 676, 53 Pac. 307, cited with approval in Teague v. Hall, 171 Cal. 668, 671, 154 Pac. 851, 852, the court says:

"It is true that where one is justified in relying, and in fact does rely upon false representations, his right of action is not destroyed because means of knowledge were open to him. In such a case, no duty in law is devolved upon him to employ such means of knowledge."

However impelling to inquiry the facts may be that put a defrauded party upon inquiry, he may, nevertheless, be put off his guard and misled by the very representation of which he complains.

"Whether the victim is actually misled is always an essential inquiry, and that the means of knowledge were open to him, were indeed easily available, and nothing but gross negligence would have failed to discover the falsehood, do not prevent an inquiry into the truth as to whether he in fact had the knowledge, and was in fact misled by the stratagem of his adversary." Western Mfg. Co. v. Cotton & Long, supra.

In Fargo Gas & Coke Co. v. Fargo Gas & Electric Co., 4 N. D. 219, 59 N. W. 1066, 37 L. R. A. 593, it is said:

"The general rule is, and, upon principle, must be, that the question is one of reliance by the buyer upon the false statement of the seller. Whether it was wise for him to rely upon it, whether he was prudent in doing so, whether he is not chargeable with negligence in a certain sense in not investigating—these inquiries are, in general, immaterial, provided the purchaser has in fact been deceived."

Mr. Bigelow, after citing many cases illustrative of the principle here stated, sums up thus:

"The result appears to be, not only in principle but by the weight of authority, that the party to whom the representation is made is affected by means of knowledge, or by notice, only where the language or conduct was not of a kind to withdraw his attention from what otherwise he would be bound to know, i. e., only where the representation was not calculated to put him off his guard, as in cases of representations of value or opinion." Bigelow on Fraud, vol. I, p. 528.

To use the language of another author:

"The doctrine of notice has no application where a distinct representation has been made. A man to whom a particular and distinct representation has been made is entitled to rely on the representation and need not make any further inquiry, although there are circumstances in the case from which an inference inconsistent with the representation might be drawn." Kerr on Fraud and Mistake, p. 80.

The true principle as to the applicabilty of the doctrine of constructive notice in cases of fraud is well put by Mr. Pomeroy in his Equity Jurisprudence (vol. 2, § 895) thus:

"The mere existence of opportunities for examination, or of sources of information, is not sufficient, even though by means of these opportunities and sources, in the absence of any representation at all, a constructive notice to the party would be inferred; the doctrine of constructive notice does not apply where there has been such a representation of fact."

Undoubtedly, where there has been no misrepresentation, a knowledge of facts sufficient to put a person upon inquiry amounts in law to constructive notice of facts which might have been learned by such inquiry reasonably prosecuted; but the fraudulent representation of a fact cannot be counteracted by any such implication of notice. The doctrine of constructive notice is therefore inapplicable to persons who have extended credit to a corporation whose stock is watered, for, as said in the Rhode Case, an action against the holder of watered stock is "essentially one to compel the defendant to make good a false representation in defraud of the plaintiff." (Italics ours.)

[6, 7] Our conclusion is that the effect of the finding that the plaintiff extended credit to the Panama Oil Company without actual knowledge of the fraudulent transaction, pursuant to which the watered stock was issued, is not, as a matter of law, overcome by the other finding that the plaintiff had notice of facts sufficient to put it upon inquiry. The ultimate question, a question of fact for the trial court, to be determined from a consideration of all the circumstances and the inferences reasonably deducible therefrom, is this: Can it fairly be presumed that at the times when plaintiff extended credit to the Panama Oil Company it relied upon the company's ostensible capitalization? Can plaintiff be fairly presumed to have relied upon the misrepresentation of fact arising out of the deceptive appearances created by the apparent existence of an amount of capital greater than that which the company really possessed?

[8] 3. There is no merit in the claim that the stock which is a part of the 1,000,000 shares that Hedrick turned back into the treasury, and which later was issued by the corporation for sums less than par, is within the doctrine of Clark v. Bever, Fogg v. Blair, Handley v. Stutz, and J. F. Lucey Co. v. McMullen, supra. These shares, when issued, were not the shares of an insolvent corporation, received by a creditor in payment and discharge of his debt, at less than par, and at a value in excess of the actual market value—as was the case in Clark v. Bever. Neither in Clark v. Bever nor in Fogg v. Blair was the stock taken in any sense as an investment, but was accepted by the creditor, in each instance, as the best settlement obtainable from an insolvent corporation. Neither is this the case of a going corporation whose capital stock has become impaired or diminished by losses or misfortunes. It is true that in some sense the Panama Oil Company had been doing business in a small way for a month or more before all of this so-called "treasury" stock had been issued; but there is no evidence that its capital had been impaired by losses. These shares, whether the purchasers thereof knew it or not, were sold by the corporation in accordance with the original scheme of the promoters. The purchasers of this "treasury stock" bought their shares as an investment in a corporation that had hardly begun the business for which it was organized. The arrangement by which these shares were to be sold by the corporation for less than their par value was therefore subject to the contingency that, in the event of the insolvency of the corporation, the holders of the stock, if fairly chargeable with knowledge of the original fraudulent transaction, would be liable to creditors who became such in ignorance of the arrangement, and who might rightfully assume that the stock had been fully paid up or would be subject to call.

[9] 4. The doctrine enunciated in the South Mountain Con. Mining Co. Case (D. C.) 5 Fed. 403; Id. (C. C.) 14 Fed. 347, has never been approved by the courts of this state. With respect to the character of liability here sought to be enforced, mining corporations are not at the present day sui generis. Notwithstanding the frequency with which corporations incorporated to exploit oil-bearing lands are organized with a fictitious capital, persons who have occasion to deal with them are not bound to anticipate such a condition of affairs, but may assume that the capital is what it purports to be. The idea that the capital of a mining corporation is a football, to be thrown into the market for the purpose of speculation, is an invention that, though often resorted to by stockholders to escape liability, has always been rejected by our state courts; and the rule stated by the federal courts in the South Mountain Mining Company Case no longer expresses the rule in force in California. Hasson v. Koeberle, 180 Cal. 359, 181 Pac. 387.

[10-12] 5. It will not be necessary to consider whether the evidence supports the finding that defendant Morgrage is a stockholder of the Panama Oil Company; for, on a retrial of the case, the evidence may not be the same, with respect to this issue, as that now presented to us by the record on this appeal. The principles by which court and counsel should be guided on the retrial of this issue appear to be few and simple. The relation of a stockholder to a corporation is one of contract, either express or implied. It exists only when a party has expressly consented to become a stockholder, or his conduct is such that in law his consent will be implied. He cannot be made a stockholder without his consent, simply because some officer of the corporation, without authority, has entered his name upon the books as a stockholder and caused stock to be issued in his name as such. To establish the relation of a stockholder, it must appear that the minds of the parties met; that the one to whom the stock was issued agreed to be and became a stockholder in the corporation, with the privileges and responsibilities of that relation; and that the corporation accepted him as such. The former could not be put in that position against his will, or without his consent, by the unauthorized and unratified act of a third person; for in such case there would exist no contract relation, no mutuality of agreement, but simply a mistake or a wrong, which the person to whom the stock ostensibly had been issued might ratify and condone, or repudiate and reject. Welch v. Gillelen, 147 Cal. 576, 82 Pac. 248; Glenn v. Garth, 133 N. Y. 18, 30 N. E. 649, 31 N. E. 344. If one to whom an unauthorized certificate has been issued without his knowledge and consent, instead of returning the certificate to the corporation, indorses it and delivers it to another for transfer, that act, unexplained, is a recognition of ownership, and consequently, a ratification of the original unauthorized issue. Glenn v. Garth, supra. But to contend successfully that one to whom stock originally was issued without his authority, knowledge, or consent, subsequently became a stockholder by ratifying the unauthorized issue, it must be made to appear satisfactorily that there was a conscious and intended approval of the issuance of the stock in his name. Ordinarily, ratification, like a contract, includes within it an intention. An indispensable element of a contract is a meeting of the minds upon the subject of the contract. And a ratification is the adoption of what would have been a previously formed contract had there been a meeting of minds. Gallup v. Fox, 64 Conn. 491, 30 Atl. 756. Ratification implies a conscious and intended approval of the act done. It rests upon an actual and existing purpose to make such approval. Hence it must occur with full knowledge of all the facts. Glenn v. Garth, supra.

Because plaintiff failed to allege or prove that any of the defendants other than O'Brien participated in or knowingly benefited by or had any notice of the fraudulent transaction whereby the watered stock was issued, it is ordered that the judgment be, and it is, affirmed as to the defendant Robert F. O'Brien, and as to the other defendants it is reversed, and the superior court is directed to permit plaintiff to amend its complaint, should it be so advised.

MULCH v. NAGLE et al. (Civ. 3646.)

1. Dedication ⟸44—Evidence held sufficient to sustain a valid dedication.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding of a valid dedication of a strip of land for highway purposes.

2. Dedication ⟸44—Evidence held to warrant finding that use of strip of land was with knowledge of owner of fee.

In an action to enjoin the obstruction of a strip of land claimed as a highway, evidence held to warrant the court in finding that the use of the strip in question had been with the knowledge and consent of the owner of the fee.

3. Dedication ⟸44—Knowledge of use of strip of land attributed to owner through employees or agents.

Knowledge of employees or agents on land of an adverse use of a strip thereof as a highway was knowledge of the owner of such use.

4. Dedication ⟸20(2)—Owner must assent to dedication or abandonment under statute.

In order to constitute a dedication of a highway under Pol. Code, § 2618, it is essential that it appear that the owner assented to such dedication or abandonment, and that the public has accepted it.

5. Dedication ⟸37—Acceptance of dedication satisfied by user.

Acceptance of a dedication or abandonment of land to the public as a highway shown by public user satisfies Pol. Code, § 2618.

6. Dedication ⟸17—Intention to dedicate need not be shown by express declaration.

It is not required that the intention to dedicate land for highway purposes under Pol. Code, § 2618, be shown by any express declaration of the owner, and such intention may be shown to have been declared either orally or in writing, or it may be implied from the conduct of the owner, and assent to a dedication may be implied from the acquiescence of owner's land as a public highway.

7. Dedication ⟸44—Degree of proof of knowledge of adverse use as a highway to show dedication stated.

Where a public highway is claimed, not by affirmative act of the owner, but by acquiescence in public use, it is not required that knowledge of the owner of such public use be shown to have actually existed in the sense that it is required to be directly shown, as the facts may be such as to raise the presumption that he had information of the use, and where the claim of the public rests upon a long-continued adverse use, that use establishes against the owner the conclusive presumption of consent, and so of dedication.

8. Dedication ⟸20(2)—Knowledge of use necessary to constitute dedication.

Where it is claimed that a public highway has come into existence, not by virtue of any affirmative act on the part of the owner of the traversed property, but by acquiescence in the use of such property as a highway by the public, knowledge of such use is an important and necessary element, without the presence of which the dedication could not be perfected, under Pol. Code, § 2618.

9. Dedication ⟸12—Opening of land for use by one not owner not dedication thereof.

One who purchased land on a contract, but never became the owner thereof, did not dedicate to the public as a highway a strip of land opened for use.

10. Dedication ⟸51—Statutory requirement of width of 20 feet has no application to highways created by dedication.

While it is provided in Pol. Code, § 2620, that all public highways shall be not less than 40 feet wide, and private roads not less than 20 feet wide, this restriction must be held to have application to such highways only as are laid out by formal act of the proper public authorities, and to have no application to such highways as have been created by dedication or abandonment.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; W. A. Beasly, Judge.

Action by J. W. Mulch against Caroline Nagle and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

H. E. Wilcox and D. M. Burnett, both of San Jose, and A. A. Sanderson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Walter G. Fitzgerald, of Gilroy, and John P. Fitzgerald, of San Jose, for respondent.

BARDIN, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal taken by the defendants from a judgment decreeing that a public highway extends along a certain 12-foot strip of land located along the easterly boundary of two lots of land owned by the defendants, whose ownership of said lots was adjudged to be subservient to the rights of the public to use said strip of land as a public highway, and enjoining the defendants from erecting or maintaining any obstruction upon said strip of land in such manner as to interfere with the free use thereof as a highway by the public or by plaintiff as a part thereof.

In response to the issues raised by the pleadings the court found substantially to the effect that a public highway 12 feet wide extended along the easterly line of lots 130 and 131 of the San Martin ranch in Santa Clara county (which for convenience will be referred to as the Nagle property), from Church avenue in a southerly direction 36.60½ chains to Las Llagas creek; that the plaintiff is the owner of a small tract of land facing and bordering on said highway.

Findings numbered IV, V and VI appear as follows:

"IV. That the said highway has constantly and continuously for a period extending over 15 years been used and traveled on foot, in vehicles and otherwise, and kept in repair by the plaintiff herein, his predecessors in interest in the land above described, and by the general public under claim of right, with the knowledge and consent of, and without any objection or hindrance by the owners of said lots 130 and 131 of the San Martin ranch during all of said time, except as hereinafter in these findings set forth."

"V. That ever since the year 1898 the said strip of land above described as a highway has been continuously, openly, and under claim of right adverse to defendants been traveled on foot, in vehicles and otherwise by the plaintiff herein, his predecessors in interest, and by such portion of the general public as had occasion to use the same; that during all of said time there was a well-defined and marked roadway thereon, and that the same was kept in repair and repaired at various times by the general public; that during all of said time no permission was asked or granted for the use of said strip of land as a highway, or was any objection made by the owners of said lots 130 and 131 or those in charge thereof to the use of said strip of land as said highway, or any obstruction placed thereon, except as hereinafter stated."

"VI. That on or about the 31st day of January, 1916, the defendants unlawfully and without right so to do obstructed the said mentioned highway so that it could not be traveled, by placing a gate across the same at a point where said road connects with said Church avenue, without plaintiff's knowledge or consent, and do now threaten and intend to maintain said gate and prevent plaintiff, his agents and employees, and the public from using said road, highway, or right of way, and will continue so to do unless restrained by this honorable court."

Thence follow other findings of fact to the effect that the obstruction of said road is specially injurious to plaintiff; that, if the defendants are not restrained from obstructing said highway, the plaintiff's and the public's use thereof will be prevented, and that the ownership of said lots 130 and 131 is subject to and subservient to the use of said strip as a public highway.

The main burden of defendants' contentions on this appeal is that the findings do not find proper support in the evidence, and that particularly the portion of finding numbered IV relating to the use and repair of said highway "with the knowledge and consent of and without any objection or hindrance by the owners of said lots 130 and 131" is objectionable. In order to clearly understand the nature of this use and whether or not the court was justified in finding as it did, it will be proper to make a detailed search of the record and to briefly state the facts and circumstances surrounding the alleged highway and its use from the time that it came into existence down to the interruption of travel thereon by the acts of the defendants.

The record shows that Santa Clara Land Company acquired title to the lots upon which said disputed road is located, on December 14, 1900, and on April 22, 1902, conveyed the property to D. Guillermo Stein, who in turn conveyed it to Anna B. Glover on November 21, 1911. Glover conveyed to one Olds in July, 1913, and the Olds' ownership passed to one O'Donnell in April of 1915, who in turn conveyed to Caroline Nagle, one of the defendants herein, on July 29, 1915.

Ellis W. Harrison, a witness called on behalf of the plaintiff, testified substantially to the effect that in 1898 he bought the property now owned by the defendant Caroline Nagle on a contract, but that he never became the owner thereof; that while he was in possession of the Nagle tract he entered into an arrangement with two neighbors who owned property south of Las Llagas creek, to extend a road from Church avenue, which marks the northerly end of the disputed strip of land, to Lena avenue; that he continued in the possession of the Nagle property for about two years; that the strip of land in controversy here was opened as a road in 1898, and the public were allowed to through; that no objection was ever raised to his knowledge to the opening of the road, and that it was maintained as a public road as soon as it was opened and traveled continuously: that it was maintained and kept up and repaired by the people living in that neighborhood; that neighbors living to the south of the property desired a way to reach Church avenue lying north of the Nagle property; that he wanted a convenient exit from his property to the south; and that the road thus opened would also be convenient for the accommodation of one Whitney, who then owned and occupied the property now belonging to the plaintiff.

Benjamin Fuller testified that he was familiar with the disputed highway from 1900 to 1907, and that from 1902 to 1907 he was roadmaster of the particular district within which the disputed highway was situate, and had never heard any one question the right of the public or any one to travel the road in question: that it was well-defined and a hard well-traveled road, kept in repair by neighbors, and that he had personally gone over the road and repaired it; that where it crossed Las Llagas creek it was accustomed to be washed out every year during winter, and as roadmaster of the district he fixed the crossing and kept it in repair; that Mr. Whitney (predecessor in interest of plaintiff) used the road every day. He testified further that, when the Nagle place was set out to vines in 1904 or 1905, the roadway was not interfered with in any way, at which time the Nagle property was in charge of a Mr. Cook and a Mr. Caselano; that no objection was ever made by any person in charge of the place to the maintenance of the road; that he had been with the superintendent of the property during Stein's ownership at the time certain repairs were made on the road, but no objection was made because of such repair work. During all the time the witness was there, with the exception of when the washouts occurred, there was an attempt made to keep a road absolutely open and clear at that place, being maintained as such and traveled by the general public. The highway was generally known in the neighborhood as Murphy avenue.

Enos Bechis testified that he acted as superintendent of the Nagle property and at a time when the title to said property was vested in Stein, for a period of five or six years, beginning in 1906 or 1907; that he did not know of any objection having been made by the company he directly acted for, or the people they represented (referring presumably to Stein), relative to maintaining the driveway; that in his capacity as superintendent he raised no objection to the maintenance of the roadway, and permission to use the same was never requested of him by any one.

Charles Curtis testified that he had been familiar with the roadway in dispute since 1897, and that the only time that he had known it to be closed was when the obstruction complained of by plaintiff was placed on the road by the defendants; that from the time he had first known the road it had been traveled as such, open to all who had occasion to use it; that he had hauled gravel on it to repair it while Mr. Fuller was roadmaster; and that he knew of neighbors doing the same.

C. E. Wendell testified:

That he lived in the neighborhood of the strip of land in dispute and he knew that for 16 or 18 years it had been "used generally by the public with wagons hauling produce, delivery wagons, and everything of that character passing over it and anybody that wanted to go by. I never heard at any time of any objection made to its use as a road. So far as I ever heard, it was generally considered in the neighborhood as an open road."

W. E. Sohlke testified that he lived in the vicinity of the roadway in dispute, and that he had known it since the winter of 1913, since which time it had been kept open and maintained as a roadway over which he occasionally traveled, and that there had never been any question or hindrance raised as to his traveling it.

M. E. Mulch testified that he was the son of the plaintiff and had been acquainted with the road in dispute for 11 years, and that it had never been closed until the obstruction referred to in the complaint was placed thereon; that no one had ever questioned his right to travel this road nor did he ever ask any one for permission so to do; that it was a first-class roadway and had never been plowed up; that the plaintiff used the road every day in the year to get mail, haul fruit and produce to town, and for other purposes; that a great deal of travel passes over the road; that the roadway in dispute connects with other neighborhood avenues; and that the plaintiff has no other roadway that is suitable for the ingress and egress of the plaintiff.

The plaintiff testified that he acquired the property occupied by him and fronting on the strip of land in question from one Whitney in 1905, and that at the time he moved on the property Whitney stated that the said strip of land was his road; that plaintiff had used the road thereafter without objection or hindrance until the Nagles had objected to his using it; that the successors in interest of Stein had seen plaintiff use the disputed road; that during the time the Nagle property was in the ownership of Stein it was in charge first of one Casalano and later of Bechis, who knew that plaintiff was using the road, and who did not object to such use, and that plaintiff had never asked any one's permission to use the road.

[1] The foregoing abstract of testimony discloses ample evidence upon which to rest the findings of the court. While it is true that the record does disclose some evidence tending in a weak manner to contradict the testimony thus set out, yet we are well satisfied with the conclusions reached by the trial court that there has been a valid dedication of the strip of land for highway purposes, and that the interference with the plaintiff's use of said road was unwarranted.

[2] It is very earnestly contended by the appellants that the record fails to disclose any evidence which warranted the court in finding that the adverse use of the strip of land in question had been with the knowledge and consent of the owners of the fee thereof. This objection is predicated upon the claim that it was not shown that during the ownership of the Nagle property by Stein he had any knowledge of the adverse use thereof, either by plaintiff or the public. It appears from the record that during the period of time that Stein was the owner of the property referred to he was absent from the state of California and domiciled in Guatemala. It was not affirmatively shown that he had seen the property before he became the owner of it, nor was it shown that any hostile use of the strip of land had ever been actually brought to his knowledge.

[3] There are two answers to the appellants' contention in the behalf last stated. The record shows that there were occupants upon the Nagle property during the Stein ownership who exercised such a continuous dominion and control over the property as to very strongly show that they were not trespassers, but, on the contrary, were accredited representatives of Stein, and either his employees or the employees of his agents. The general adverse use by the public of the highway was under the direct view of these persons. If it be granted that Stein did not know the small tract of land at the time he purchased it, and that a use of a portion thereof in such a manner as to materially affect its value and his own enjoyment of the property was unknown to him during his ownership, we are satisfied that knowledge of the public use of the strip of land must be attributed to him through his employees or agents. Gurnsey v. Antelope Creek, etc., W. Co., 6 Cal. App. 387, 92 Pac. 326; City of Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 Pac. 658.

[4-8] But the court was justified in reaching the conclusion it did for another and equally potent reason. The plaintiff founds his action upon the theory that the strip of land in question was dedicated to the public use as a highway by the owners thereof. Highways are enumerated by section 2618 of the Political Code as of these general kinds: Those laid out or erected by the public, or, if laid out or erected by others, dedicated or abandoned to the public, or created in actions for the partition of real property. In order to constitute the dedication or abandonment spoken of in the statute, it is essential that it appear that the owner assented to such dedication or abandonment, and that the public has accepted it. Acceptance shown by public user satisfies the statute. Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591; City of Monterey v. Malarin, 99 Cal. 290, 33 Pac. 840; City of Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 Pac. 658. It is not required that the intention to dedicate be shown by any express declaration of the owner; such intention may be shown to have been declared either orally or in writing, or it may be implied from the conduct of the owner. As stated in Wheeler v. City of Oakland, 35 Cal. App. 671, 170 Pac. 864:

"The authorities establish the principle that an offer of the owner of land to dedicate it for public use may be established in every conceivable way in which such intention can be manifested."

Assent to a dedication may be implied from the acquiescence in the use of owners' land by the public as a highway. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 642. Whether a particular strip of land has been dedicated or abandoned to the public for highway purposes depends upon the circumstances of each case. The question of the intention to dedicate private property to the public use must of necessity appear. But this intention, as already indicated, may be manifested as well by conduct as by an express declaration of such an intention. Where it is claimed that a public highway has come into existence, not by virtue of any affirmative act on the part of the owner of the traversed property, but by acquiescence in the use of such property as a highway by the public, knowledge of such use is an important and necessary element without the presence of which the dedication could not be perfected. The owner's knowledge of the use of his property is essential, for he could not well assent or acquiesce in a use concerning which he was ignorant. But it is not required that such knowledge be shown to have actually existed in the sense that it is required to be directly shown. The facts may be such as to afford sufficient ground for the law to raise the presumption that he had information of the use to which his land was devoted. State v. K. C., St. J. & C. B. R. Co., 45 Iowa, 139. In Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 593, 41 Pac. 448, 449, it is said:

"But where the claim of the public rests upon long-continued adverse use, that use establishes against the owner the conclusive presumption of consent, and so of dedication. It affords the conclusive and indisputable presumption of knowledge and acquiescence, while at the same time it negatives the idea of a mere license."

[9] We are in agreement with the suggestion of counsel for the appellants that the act of Harrison in first opening the traveled highway could not, of itself, under any view of the case, amount to a dedication of the strip of land for public highway purposes for the reason that he was not then or thereafter the owner of the property. 13 R. C. L. 23.

Finding numbered VII was drawn in order to show that the obstruction complained of by plaintiff to the travel of the highway in question was such as to constitute it a public nuisance and thus to permit the plaintiff to maintain his action under the provisions of section 3493 of the Civil Code. We find it to be sufficiently supported in its essential elements by the evidence.

It is our view that the findings, based, as we have found them to be, upon ample evidence, are entirely sufficient to establish a public highway by implied dedication. Schwerdtle v. County of Placer, 108 Cal. 589, 41 Pac. 448; Hartley v. Vermillon, 141 Cal. 339, 74 Pac. 987; People v. Myring, 144 Cal. 351, 77 Pac. 975; Fleming v. Howard, 150 Cal. 28, 87 Pac. 908; Leverone v. Weakley, 155 Cal. 395, 101 Pac. 304; City of Venice v. Short Line Beach Land Co., 180 Cal. 447, 181 Pac. 658.

[10] It is claimed that the law does not sanction or permit a public highway of but 12 feet in width, and that consequently the court was powerless, under any view of the case, to adjudge that the strip of land was subject to the use of the public as a highway. As has already been made clear, the particular highway in question came into existence by reason of the dedication thereof as such, and not by virtue of any steps taken pursuant to the statutes whereby a public highway may be created by the proper authorities. While it is provided in section 2620 of the Political Code that all public highways shall be not less than 40 feet wide, and private roads not less than 20 feet wide, this restriction must be held to have application to such highways only as are laid out by formal act of the proper public authorities, and after the initiation of the requisite preliminary proceedings, and to have no application to such highways, roads or lanes as have been created by dedication or abandonment. 13 R. C. L. 58. The cases cited by the appellants as supporting a contrary view are of no weight here, since they relate solely to public highways sought to be created by formal steps required by statute for laying out a public way by the prescribed public authorities.

TREESH v. STONE. (Civ. 3102.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 10, 1921.)

1. Damages ⟹91(1)—Exemplary damages allowable only where defendant guilty of oppression, etc.

Under Civ. Code, § 3294, exemplary damages can be allowed only where a defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice.

2. Landlord and tenant ⟹180(3)—Evidence insufficient to justify findings of oppressive conduct against landlord basis of judgment for exemplary damages.

In an action by the tenant of a housekeeping apartment in a hotel against the proprietor on account of an eviction from her apartment when she refused to pay rent for a month, but claimed a credit on account of lost laundry, evidence held insufficient to justify the findings of oppressive conduct on defendant proprietor's part on which judgment for exemplary damages against him was based.

3. Appeal and error ⟹1151(2)—Judgment to be reversed rather than modified on account of improper award of exemplary damages.

Where the evidence fails to justify the findings on which judgment for exemplary damages was based, but the trial court found two items of special damage amounting to $14, and there is some evidence in the record from which the court may have determined that plaintiff was entitled to general compensatory damages, the appellate court cannot say how much of the judgment above $14 was intended as compensatory damages, if any, and how much as exemplary damages, so that the judgment must be reversed rather than modified.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Josephine F. Treesh against D. P. Stone. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Stephens & Stephens and Chandler P. Ward, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. C. Millsap, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a money judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The appellant conducted a hotel, and the respondent occupied a housekeeping apartment in the place under an agreement to pay in advance a monthly rental of $30. As a part of the agreement under which the apartment was let it was understood that respondent might leave at the desk of the clerk of the hotel such apparel as she desired to have laundered from time to time, and that, after it was laundered, it should be returned to her there. On one occasion she left at the desk a parcel for the laundry and it was lost through the fault of the hotel management. This loss occurred in June, and, respondent having asserted a claim against appellant for the value of the missing parcel, the matter was left in abeyance, at the request of appellant, pending an attempt to locate it; respondent not paying her rent in the meanwhile. On August 21 appellant notified respondent that the parcel could not be found, and on the next day she wrote appellant a note inclosing a list of the articles which had been lost, with an itemized statement of values amounting to $30.25. She also stated her total indebtedness to the hotel for July rent, with certain extras added, at $31.65, and inclosed a check for the balance, $1.40. She also inclosed her check for $30 to cover the rent for August. The note which accompanied these inclosures contained a request for receipts in full for the two months. On August 27, while respondent was absent from her apartment, appellant changed the lock on her door and refused to allow her to enter her rooms on her return. The present suit was the outcome of this chain of events.

The complaint alleged, in addition to the matters above stated, that the eviction of respondent occurred without notice to her of the rejection of the offer contained in her letter, without a return to her of the checks, without giving her a thirty-day notice terminating her tenancy or a three-day notice to pay rent or vacate; that the eviction was made wantonly, willfully, and maliciously, and with intent to compel respondent to pay appellant more than was due him; that appellant advised respondent's friends who came to call upon her that the apartment had been closed and that respondent no longer resided in the hotel; that on September 4, in order to get possession of her property and to avoid further humiliation and annoyance, respondent was forced to and did pay to appellant the sum of $65.30, which included rental to September 1; and that, by reason of the acts of appellant, respondent was damaged in the sum of $30.25, the value of the laundry parcel, and in the further sum of $1,000. The prayer for judgment was for the total of these two amounts.

The trial court found with respondent on the allegations of the complaint, with some exceptions, one of which is below noted, and found that she was entitled to exemplary damages, and that the total of the actual and exemplary damages suffered by her was $300. The judgment was for that amount, with costs.

[1] It is contended by appellant, among other things, that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings of the trial court upon which were based the judgment for exemplary damages. Such damages can be allowed only where a defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice. Civ. Code, § 3294. Here, although the complaint alleged that the acts of the appellant were maliciously done, the court declined to so find. There is no fraud in the case, and, in order to justify the judgment, it must therefore appear that the appellant acted oppressively.

There was some conflict in the evidence bearing upon the question whether appellant was responsible for the loss of the laundry parcel, and the finding of the trial court was with him upon the question of the amount of the damage suffered by respondent because of the loss. The parties were at loggerheads over these points for some time, and, when it appeared finally that the parcel was gone beyond recovery, respondent took the matter into her own hands and mailed to appellant her checks for rent, deducting the value she placed on the lost apparel, an amount three times as great as that fixed by the court as her damage in that regard. The note accompanying the checks was not an offer of settlement, as it is styled in the findings. It closed with a demand for a receipt in full, and, under all the circumstances shown by the record, appellant justly regarded it as a refusal to pay more than the amount of the checks; a larger sum being then due him. The rent was past due, and appellant, upon the receipt of respondent's ultimatum, had the right to terminate her tenancy. The findings of the trial court are to the effect that the relation of landlord and tenant existed between the parties, and respondent was therefore entitled to the notice provided by law for the termination of her holding. This notice was not given, but appellant has insisted, from his answer to his final brief on this appeal, that the relationship did not exist, and there is evidence in the record from which the trial court might have found with him on the issue. At any rate, we are satisfied that the defense presented by appellant on the point was made in good faith, and there is nothing in the record from which the trial court could have entertained a contrary view. That being so, appellant's course in attempting to end respondent's occupancy by merely changing the lock on the door was not oppressive. It is generally known that resort is often had to such a course by landlords who evidently deem it justified in order to protect the lien provided by either section 1861 or section 1861a of the Civil Code (as added by St. 1917, p. 1662), both of which give to the lienholder the right to the possession of personal belongings of guests. It is to be remarked that the appellant contends that he was entitled to a lien on respondent's personal property contained in her apartment, and that he had the right to change the lock on her door in order to protect his lien.

The complaint alleges that, after closing the apartment, appellant advised friends of respondent who came to see her that the apartment had been closed and that respondent was no longer living at the hotel; while the court found that appellant told respondent's friends that the apartment had been closed and that there had been some trouble between the management and respondent. These statements of the complaint and of the findings do not fit together, but, if appellant had made any or all of the statements mentioned, no charge of oppression could be predicated of that fact, as he would have stated but the truth. The apartment had been closed, the respondent no longer lived at the hotel, and there had been trouble between her and the management. Further, and to end the matter, none of these statements was made to the friends of respondent either by appellant or by his agents. The record is searched in vain for them.

It is alleged in the complaint and found by the court that appellant closed respondent's apartment without returning to her the two checks she had mailed with her letter asking for receipts in full. We can see no evidence of oppression in this fact. The checks were returned to the counsel for respondent early in September, and we cannot see that the conduct of appellant in this regard could be said to be oppressive if they were never returned.

It was also alleged and found that the acts of appellant were committed with intent to compel respondent to pay to him a sum not due. We can find nothing in the evidence to support such a finding.

[2, 3] We are satisfied, on the whole, that the evidence fails to justify the findings upon which the judgment for exemplary damages was based. We are now confronted with the question whether the judgment may be modified or whether it must be reversed. The trial court finds two items of special damage amounting to $14. There is, however, some slight evidence in the record from which the court may have determined that respondent was entitled to general compensatory damages. We cannot say how much of the judgment over and above $14, if any, was intended as compensatory damages and how much as exemplary damages.

The judgment is reversed.

BRINKWORTH et al. v. SAM SEELIG CO.

(Civ. 3493.)

1. Negligence ⟸32(2), 44—Implied invitation to enter store with safety.

One who during business hours lawfully enters a store to purchase goods does so at the implied invitation of the owner upon whom the law imposes the duty of exercising ordinary care to keep the aisles and passageways of the premises in a reasonably safe condition, so as not unnecessarily to expose the customer to danger or accident.

2. Negligence ⟸136(22, 27) — Storekeeper's negligence and customer's contributory negligence held for jury.

In an action against a storekeeper for injuries to plaintiff customer when she fell over boxes in an aisle, evidence held to require submission of the case to the jury, on the theory that in so obstructing the aisle defendant was guilty of a want of ordinary care, and that though plaintiff, had she looked, might have seen the boxes, she was under the circumstances justified in assuming the place was one of safety, so that she herself was not guilty of contributory negligence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Albert J. Brinkworth and another against Sam Seelig Company, a corporation. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellants.
Hickcox & Crenshaw, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been sustained as the result of defendant's negligence.

In its answer defendant denied the imputed negligence and alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground that the testimony offered on behalf of plaintiff not only failed to show that defendant was guilty of negligence, but established the fact that plaintiff's injuries were the result of contributory negligence. The motion was granted, followed by a judgment from which plaintiff has appealed.

Defendant conducted a store for the sale of groceries, fruits, and vegetables. As shown by a plat received in evidence, the storeroom, on the east side of the street, was about 60 feet square, around the sides and rear of which were counters. In the center of the storeroom was a fruit and vegetable stand, the width of which, fronting the store entrance, was some 12 or 15 feet, and around which were located counters for the display and delivery of goods to purchasers. Around this fruit and vegetable stand there was, for the use of customers, an aisle or passageway, the width of which, in front thereof and next to the entrance, was some 10 feet. At the time in question two boxes, designated as lug boxes, used for bringing vegetables into the store, and which were about 7 inches in depth, 16 inches long and 10 inches wide, placed one on top of the other, were deposited on the floor of the passageway in front of the vegetable and fruit stand at a distance of some two or three feet from the counter thereof. During business hours, and at about 11:45 o'clock a. m., plaintiff, as a customer, entered the west door of the store and, through the north or left aisle, walked to the rear counter to make a purchase, from which place she retraced her steps to the north side of the vegetable and fruit stand, and, while inspecting the goods on display, walked sideways and fronting the counter around to the front of the stand at a point between the counter and the place where the vegetable boxes were deposited, some 15 feet south of plaintiff's line of travel through the north aisle in reaching the rear counter, where she made a purchase of goods, and upon delivery of the same to her, she, in taking her departure, stepped backwards and fell over the boxes, sustaining the injury complained of. At no time while in the store until after the accident did plaintiff see or know of the existence of the boxes so deposited in the aisle, and which had been placed there about 8 o'clock of the morning of the accident and, contrary to defendant's custom, permitted to remain until 11:45 o'clock without transferring their contents to the counter and removal of the boxes.

[1, 2] In granting the motion the court erred. One who, during business hours, lawfully enters a store to purchase goods does so at the implied invitation of the owner (Herzog v. Hemphill, 7 Cal. App. 116, 93 Pac. 899), upon whom the law imposes the duty of exercising ordinary care and prudence to keep the aisles and passageways of the premises, in and through which, by their location and arrangement, a customer in making purchases is induced to go, in a reasonably safe condition, so as to not unnecessarily expose him to danger or accident (Hart v. Grennell, 122 N. Y. 371, 25 N. E. 354; Schmidt v. Bauer, 80 Cal. 565, 22 Pac. 256, 5 L. R. A. 580; Means v. Southern Cal. Ry. Co., 144 Cal. 473, 77 Pac. 1001, 1 Ann. Cas. 206). It has been frequently declared by the courts

"that negligence is a question of fact for the jury, even when there is no conflict in the evidence, if different conclusions upon the subject can be rationally drawn from the evidence." Wahlgren v. Market St. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 663, 62 Pac. 308, 64 Pac. 993.

In Ginns v. Sherer Co., 219 Mass. 18, 106 N. E. 600, it appeared that a store aisle was obstructed by a hat box, 19 inches in width and 9 inches in height, which had been left there for half an hour, and over which the plaintiff in said action fell, sustaining injuries. The court held the facts presented a case for the determination of the jury as to whether leaving the box in the passageway constituted a violation of defendant's duty to plaintiff. In Williamson v. Hardy, 190 Pac. 646, the court upheld a verdict in favor of the plaintiff upon evidence that she slipped and fell upon the floor of defendant's market through having stepped upon a piece of oiled paper made slippery by the adhesion to it of scraps of fresh meat, and, in deciding the case, said:

"It was a question for the jury to determine whether or not the defendant was negligent in permitting such a substance to be lying upon the floor of his market where customers were wont, and were required, to walk while making their purchases therein."

The testimony that plaintiff did not see or know of the existence of the boxes deposited in the aisle is uncontradicted, and the arrangement of the fruit and vegetable stand, upon the counters of which goods were displayed for sale, was such as to induce plaintiff, while looking over and inspecting the articles, to walk sideways. The jury might have properly concluded that in so obstructing the aisle defendant was guilty of the want of ordinary care, and that, although plaintiff, had she looked, might have seen the boxes, she was, under the circumstances, justified in assuming the place one of safety, and hence her failure to observe the obstruction was not negligence on her part.

Respondent, in opposition to the views herein expressed, cites several authorities, in none of which, however, are the facts similar to those involved in the instant case. Hart v. Grennell, supra, was a case where plaintiff tripped over the handle of a truck which was in the rear of the store, and as to which the court, in deciding the case, said:

"It was not exposed in the way of customers visiting the store, as there were no appearances which invited them into that part of the building. The plaintiff had no occasion to go there. * * * Under these circumstances, such an accident as happened was not within the reasonable apprehension of the defendants, and * * * did not expose their customers to hidden or unforeseen dangers."

In Davis v. California, etc., R. Co., 105 Cal. 131, 38 Pac. 647, the defendant, in constructing a street railway, deposited a number of rails upon the sidewalk in front of plaintiff's residence, all of which were removed except one which to plaintiff's knowledge had been lying across the sidewalk for some four weeks. Hearing a call of fire in the night time, plaintiff ran out of the house, and, forgetting the position of the rail, fell over the same and sustained an injury. The court in deciding the case said the fact that the plaintiff forgot the presence of the rail was no excuse, as the circumstances surrounding the accident did not justify her forgetfulness and consequent want of care. Neither line of authorities is applicable to the facts in the case at bar, for the reason that plaintiff's injury was sustained in a part of the store to which she was invited, and, in the absence of warning, might reasonably expect it to be free of open trapdoors, boxes, or other obstructions endangering her safety; and, since she was ignorant of the fact that the boxes were deposited in the aisle, the accident could not be attributed to her forgetfulness.

The judgment is reversed.

McCORMICK v. FARMERS' GRAIN & MILLING CO. et al. (Civ. 3080.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. Feb. 24, 1921. Rehearing Denied March 24, 1921.)

1. Chattel mortgages ⟸48—Sufficiency of description in crop mortgage; "all crops growing."

The description of a crop in a mortgage is sufficient if it be such that a prudent disinterested person, aided and directed by such inquiries as the instrument itself suggests, is able to identify the property, and a mortgage designating "all crops growing" is good as to crops in the ground when the instrument is executed.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Growing Crops.]

2. Chattel mortgages ⟸48, 117—Description held sufficient as to crop in ground, but not to cover a crop not then planted.

A crop mortgage covering "the following growing crops, viz., the crop of barley hay and/or grain and the crop of corn to be grown now being, standing and growing upon that certain piece or parcel of land," etc., should be read as if it were phrased "the crop of corn to be matured which is now being, standing and growing" upon the land, and is not ineffective for uncertainty of description, and is plainly good as to corn in the ground at the time of its execution, but is not good as to corn planted after its execution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by W. A. McCormick against the Farmers' Grain & Milling Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

Benj. W. Shipman, of Los Angeles, John A. Berry, of El Centro, and Henry O. Wackerbarth, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

B. C. Nichols, of San Diego, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a money judgment. On or about January 13, 1917, the respondent leased to one Beretta a certain tract of land and took from him a crop mortgage as security for the payment of the rent provided for in the lease. The instrument was recorded February 10, 1917. By its terms the mortgage covered "the following growing crops, viz., the crop of barley hay and/or grain and the crop of corn to be grown now being, standing and growing upon that certain piece or parcel of land," particularly describing the demised premises. On or about June 29, 1917, Beretta sold to the appellant Farmers' Grain & Milling Company, which had no actual notice of the mortgage to the respondent, a crop of milo maize to be matured on the leased land, agreeing to make delivery on or about November 20, 1917. On that day he refused to deliver, and the Farmers' Company brought a claim and delivery action to recover the crop. Acting under process, the appellant sheriff took possession of the maize December 5, 1917. The respondent made a third party claim to the property, the appellant Farmers' Grain & Milling Company gave bond to secure the officer against the claim, and the respondent commenced the present action as upon a conversion, on April 24, 1918. Judgment was rendered in favor of the respondent for the value of the maize.

[1] A goodly portion of the briefs of the respective parties is devoted to a discussion of the question whether a crop mortgage, in order to be effective, must describe the crop sought to be hypothecated by a mention of the year, or the season of the year, or some definite period of time, during which it is to be grown. The appellants contend that the mortgage now before us is uncertain, in that it does not fix such a period of time in its description of crops and they cite several Iowa cases, headed by Pennington v. Jones, 57 Iowa, 37, 10 N. W. 274, in support of their contention. We need not pursue those cases, and may concede that the fixing of a time during which a given crop is to be raised would ordinarily be a satisfactory method of so describing it as that constructive notice as to the crop intended would thereby be conveyed to the world, but we cannot go further. It is futile to assert that a crop can in no other manner be designated in a mortgage. "The description of a crop is sufficient if it be such that a prudent, disinterested person, aided and directed by such inquiries as the instrument itself suggests, is able to identify the property" (11 Corpus Juris, 468); and one of the cases cited by appellant (Luce v. Moorehead, 73 Iowa, 498, 35 N. W. 598, 5 Am. St. Rep. 695) is authority for the just rule that a mortgage designating "all crops growing" is good as to crops in the ground when the instrument is executed. This rule is in effect supported by Hall v. Glass, 123 Cal. 500, 56 Pac. 336, 69 Am. St. Rep. 77, at least as against the extreme contention of appellant.

[2] The description of the corn intended to be mortgaged by the instrument involved in this action is to be read as if it were phrased, "the crop of corn to be matured which is now being, standing and growing" upon the land. The mortgage is not ineffective for uncertainty of description, for, within the rule of Luce v. Moorehead, supra, it is plainly good as to corn in the ground, if there was any such, at the time of its execution. The description clearly satisfies, also, the rule we have quoted from Corpus Juris. The question now arises, however, as to whether the crop of milo maize seized by the appellant sheriff was "being, standing and growing" on the land at the time of the execution of the mortgage. As incidental to their presentation of the point that a crop mortgage must fix a period of time during which the crop is to be grown, the appellants remark that the corn taken by the sheriff was not under the lien of the mortgage because it was not planted until after the execution of the instrument. The respondent makes no comment upon this fugitive suggestion of the appellants, and we might assume from that fact that the corn seized was not in the ground until after the mortgage was made; but we have examined the record, and have ascertained as well from the undisputed evidence that it had not then been planted. This being so, it is manifest that the corn taken by the sheriff was not covered by respondent's mortgage.

The judgment is reversed.

STRATEN v. SPENCER et al. (Civ. 2272.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 27, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 26, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜1004(1)—Appellate court may set aside verdict on ground of excessive damages where passion or prejudice is shown.

The power of an appellate court to set aside a verdict on the ground of excessive damages exists only when the facts are such that the excess appears as a matter of law, or is such as to suggest at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury.

2. Damages ⊜132(1)—$5,000 held not excessive for permanent injury to elderly man.

A verdict for $5,000 to an old man with probably few years to live and with small earning capacity was not so great as to show prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury, where he was permanently disabled, suffered a great deal of pain, and incurred a liability of $750 for hospital and medical care.

3. Negligence ⊜82—Contributory negligence must be a "proximate" cause of injury.

The word "proximate," as used in definitions of contributory negligence, should be limited to a proximate cause or to a part of the proximate cause of the injury, since the negligence of plaintiff to bar recovery must concur and co-operate with that of the defendant; the accident being the result or consequence of two causes or elements, the negligence of plaintiff and the negligence of defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Proximate.]

4. Appeal and error ⊜1064(1)—Omission of proper qualifying expression in instruction held not prejudicial.

Plaintiff in negligence case could not be prejudiced by an instruction on contributory negligence which omitted to state that plaintiff's negligence to bar recovery must have been "proximate," where there was no evidence of any remote negligence on the part of plaintiff.

5. Municipal corporations ⊜705(10)—Duty of pedestrian to use ordinary care in crossing street.

It is the duty of a pedestrian to use ordinary care in crossing a street and to reasonably exercise his faculties for his personal safety, and if he fails to do so and is injured by such failure, he cannot recover on account of such injury.

6. Municipal corporations ⊜705(2)—Rights of pedestrians and automobilists at crossings equal.

While pedestrians and drivers of automobiles have equal rights at street crossings, a pedestrian is bound to anticipate that automobiles as well as other vehicles may be approaching the crossing, and, while his right is equal, yet he must not exercise his right recklessly, but must act with such degree of care as is commensurate with the existing danger.

7. Negligence ⊜141(3)—Instruction on contributory negligence held misleading.

An instruction, that plaintiff in negligence case could not recover unless he was free from negligence that contributed to the injury "and was proximate cause thereof," was not an erroneous principle of law, but it did not accurately present the theory of contributory negligence, since to declare negligence to be "proximate cause" necessarily implies that it is the only proximate cause.

8. Negligence ⊜97—Doctrine of comparative negligence not recognized.

In negligence cases, such as an action by a pedestrian against an automobilist for injuries, the law does not recognize the doctrine of comparative negligence.

9. Trial ⊜296(4, 5)—Error in instruction on contributory negligence held not cured by another instruction.

In an action by a pedestrian against an automobilist, an instruction, that a failure to comply with the law respecting the operation of an automobile upon the highway from which an injury results as proximate and direct cause of such failure gives to the injured person a cause of action if his own negligence, did not "materially" contribute to the injury and constitute a proximate cause thereof, was erroneous by reason of the introduction of the element of materiality, and did not cure error in another instruction consisting of omission of "a" before the qualifying expression "proximate cause."

10. Municipal corporations ⊜706(3)—Automobilist swinging to left side of street to avoid pedestrian not presumed guilty of negligence.

Where an automobilist, on seeing pedestrian at crossing starting to cross the street, checked his car to allow the pedestrian to pass, and the pedestrian instead of going on turned back, and the automobilist then proceeded on his way and pedestrian again started across, and, to avoid hitting him, the automobilist turned to the left side of the street, fact that the automobile was on the left side of the street at the time it struck the pedestrian raised no presumption that driver was guilty of negligence in being there.

11. Municipal corporations ⟸706(8)—Instruction as to justification for swinging car to left on street held erroneous.

An instruction, charging that presence of automobilist on left side of street where he went to avoid striking pedestrian raised no presumption of negligence, but put upon the automobilist the burden of justifying his position, was contradictory and erroneous.

12. Trial ⟸194(16)—Instruction that defendant must offer other evidence held to invade province of jury.

In an action by pedestrian against an automobilist for personal injuries, an instruction virtually stating that defendant must offer other evidence to justify position of automobile on left-hand side of street, defendant having testified that she turned to avoid striking plaintiff, invaded the province of the jury, since the law imposes upon the jurors the duty of determining the weight and effect of the evidence.

13. Municipal corporations ⟸706(6, 8)—Whether automobilist should have stopped machine rather than attempt to avoid pedestrian held a jury question; instruction.

A driver of an automobile should ordinarily stop his machine, rather than take any chances of injuring pedestrian by swinging to the left around him; but it is for the jury to determine in each particular case what the rule of reasonable care requires in that respect, and an instruction "that it is the duty of a person operating an automobile upon the public highway to use reasonable care in its operation, and to move at a rate of speed reasonable under the circumstances and to cause it to slow up or stop, if need be, when danger is imminent and could by the exercise of reasonable care be seen or known in time to avoid injury," although not fatally defective, lacked clearness and was liable to be misunderstood.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

14. Trial ⟸237(4), 261—Requested instruction that plaintiff must prove case by preponderance of evidence properly refused where not sufficiently clear, provided proper rule was given.

A requested instruction, in an action by a pedestrian against an automobilist, "where the evidence is as consistent with neglect of duty by the injured person as it is with neglect of duty or care on the part of the person charged with causing the injury, the injured party cannot recover in an action for damages for the injuries sustained," although correct in point of law, is not clear, and court could well refuse to give it, provided it gave the rule that plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, El Dorado County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Action by John H. Straten against George A. Spencer and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed in District Court of Appeal and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

J. W. S. Butler and B. F. Van Dyke, both of Sacramento, for appellants.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, and E. Fitzgerald, of Placerville, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligent driving of an automobile by defendant Elizabeth Spencer on the main street of Placerville on August 24, 1918. The machine collided with plaintiff while he was crossing the street on foot. The answer denied any negligence by said defendant, pleaded contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, and by way of cross-complaint said defendant asked damages from plaintiff for injuries suffered by her in consequence of his negligence. The verdict of a jury was in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $5,000, and the appeal from the judgment is under the alternative method.

Appellants state that the appeal "is based upon the errors made by the court in modifying and giving instructions, and because of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict and because of excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion and prejudice."

[1, 2] We may follow the example of appellants and consider first the last-mentioned assignment. There was no motion for a new trial, as is usually the case, and therefore the point was not presented to the trial judge. In considering the contention we must be guided by the rule announced in Bond v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 270, 113 Pac. 366, 48 L. R. A. (N. S.) 687, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 50, that the power of an appellate court to set aside a verdict on the ground of excessive damages exists only "when the facts are such that the excess appears as a matter of law, or is such as to suggest at first blush, passion, prejudice, or corruption on the part of the jury." Indeed, it is further said in that case that: "Practically, the trial court must bear the whole responsibility in every case." Within the contemplation of this rule it cannot be said that the jury was influenced or controlled by any improper consideration in fixing the amount of damages. We must assume that the verdict was the fair expression of an honest judgment that such amount was merely compensatory for the injury suffered by plaintiff. It is true that he was an old man with probably few years to live and with small earning capacity, but he was permanently disabled, suffered a great deal of pain, and incurred a liability of $750 for hospital and medical care. At any rate, it cannot be said that the award of $5,000 is so great as to shock the conscience or "to suggest at first blush, passion, prejudice or corruption on the part of the jury." Cases from other jurisdictions are cited by appellants wherein similar verdicts were reduced on appeal, but so much depends upon the peculiar circumstances of each case and upon the particular rule prevailing in the appellate practice therein, that we forego any specific notice of these decisions.

The defendants requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

(1) "The jury are instructed that in an action by a pedestrian to recover damages for an injury from an automobile, there can be no recovery unless the plaintiff was free from negligence which contributed to the injury.

"The law does not recognize degrees of negligence in actions for personal injuries and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff in this case failed to use that degree of care and prudence which the ordinary man, under similar circumstances, would have used in this case, and that such negligence on his part contributed in any degree to the accident, the plaintiff cannot recover and your verdict should be for the defendant."

(2) "It is the duty of a pedestrian traveling in or crossing a public street to use ordinary care and to reasonably exercise for his personal safety the faculties with which he is endowed by nature for self-protection; and if he fails to do so and is injured by reason of such failure, he cannot recover on account of such injury.

"And if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff by the reasonable use of the faculties given him by nature for his self-protection could have avoided the accident and that his failure to do so contributed toward the accident then your verdict should be for the defendant."

(3) "You are charged that, while pedestrians and the drivers of automobiles have equal rights at street crossings, a pedestrian seeking to cross a street at such crossing is bound to anticipate that automobiles as well as other vehicles may be approaching the crossing, and while his right at the crossing is equal to that of any other class of travelers, yet he must not exercise his right recklessly, but must act with such degree of care as is commensurate with the existing dangers, and if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff failed to act with the degree of care which the circumstances of the case demanded and that such action upon his part contributed to the accident, your verdict should be for the defendants."

The court gave the first two of these instructions as modified by the expressions which we have italicized as follows:

(1) "The jury are instructed that in an action by a pedestrian to recover damages for an injury from an automobile there can be no recovery unless the plaintiff was free from negligence that contributed to the injury and was proximate cause thereof.

"The law does not recognize degrees of negligence in actions for personal injuries, and if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff in this case failed to use that degree of care and prudence which the ordinary man, under similar circumstances would have used in this case, and that such negligence on his part contributed in any degree to the injury and was proximate cause thereof, the plaintiff cannot recover and your verdict should be for the defendants."

(2) "It is the duty of a pedestrian traveling in or crossing a public street to use ordinary care and to reasonably exercise for his personal safety the faculties with which he is endowed by nature for self-protection; and if he fails to do so and is injured by reason of such failure, and, further, if such failure is proximate cause of injury, he cannot recover on account of such injury.

"And if you believe from the evidence that plaintiff by the reasonable use of the faculties given him by nature for his self-protection could have avoided the injury and that his failure to do so contributed toward the injury and was proximate cause thereof, then your verdict should be for the defendants."

The third was given with a similar modification.

Thus is presented a very important question relating to a prominent feature of the case. One claim of defendants was that, even if the driver of the automobile was not free from blame, plaintiff could not recover by reason of his own negligence; in other words, that it was a proper case for the application of the doctrine of "contributory negligence," as it is known to the law. It will not be doubted that, if there was any substantial basis in the evidence for this theory, the defendants were entitled to a correct instruction as to what conduct on the part of plaintiff would debar him from recovery.

That there was a substantial showing of the want of ordinary care on the part of plaintiff, which might be deemed contributory to the injury, is not disputed, and therefore we need not quote from the testimony.

The question then arises whether said instructions as proposed by appellants presented correctly the legal aspect of "contributory negligence." The doctrine presupposes, of course, negligence of the other party, but precludes recovery on the ground that the injury was partly the result of his own negligence; in other words, that the accident was occasioned by his own carelessness cooperating with that of the other party. Somewhat different phraseology in defining the term is used by different authors, but if it can be seen that the injured party's want of ordinary care was an important element in the occurrence, and that the injury may be attributed to such want of care as well as to the negligence of the other party, then, no doubt, a case of contributory negligence is found. In this connection we may refer to Thompson's Law of Negligence, vol. 1, p. 210, wherein it is said:

"In order, then, to prevent a recovery by reason of contributory negligence, the plaintiff or person injured must have been guilty of a want of ordinary care; and we shall now see that this want of ordinary care must have been a proximate cause of the injury, and not a remote cause or mere condition. If the negligence of the plaintiff was only remotely connected with the injury the plaintiff may recover damages, if notwithstanding such remote negligence of the plaintiff the defendant might have avoided the injury by the exercise of ordinary care. But if a want of ordinary care on the part of the person injured concurs as a proximate cause in producing the injury, the defendant is not liable, although in fault. This doctrine is involved in the meaning of the words we employ to express the negligence on the part of the plaintiff which will bar a recovery—contributory negligence. The negligence of the plaintiff which will bar a recovery of damages for an injury sustained by the defendant's negligence must be such as contributes to the injury complained of; that is, as expressed by a learned and philosophic writer, it 'must be such, that by the usual course of events, it would result, unless independent disturbing moral agencies intervened, in the particular injury.'"

[3] From the various sources, which he has consulted, respondent educes this definition:

"Contributory negligence is the negligence of a person on account of whose injury a suit is brought amounting to a want of ordinary care and prominently contributing to cause said injury."

The only question about this definition arises from the use of the term prominently. That is somewhat confusing. If the negligence of the injured party directly contributes to the cause of the injury, it matters not whether that negligence is prominent or not. Of course, his want of care might be of such trifling importance as to be properly disregarded; but in such case it could not be said that it has contributed to the cause of the injury. It is to be observed that in many of the definitions the term "proximate cause" is used, and this has led to some misunderstanding. The word "proximate," though, is intended to mean direct or immediate as opposed to "remote" and, of course, the negligence of the plaintiff must have a causal connection with the injury in order to constitute a case of "contributory negligence." As thus understood, there can be no serious objection to the use of said expression, but manifestly it should be limited to a proximate cause or to a part of the proximate cause of the injury.

Since the negligence of the plaintiff must concur and co-operate with that of the defendant in order to constitute contributory negligence, it is apparent that in such cases the accident is the result or consequence of two causes or elements, the negligence of plaintiff and the negligence of defendant.

[4] Examining the proposed instructions in the light of these familiar principles, we find the first is open to the criticism that it does not require the negligence of plaintiff to be a proximate or immediate cause of the injury in order to relieve the defendant. But as to this, however, it must be said that under the evidence any negligence of plaintiff must have been proximate and not remote. There being no evidence of any remote negligence on the part of plaintiff, the omission of the proper qualifying expression could not have been prejudicial to him.

[5] The second proposed instruction seems unobjectionable. It is certainly the duty of the pedestrian to use "ordinary care in crossing a street and to reasonably exercise his faculties for his personal safety and if he fails to do so and is injured by reason of such failure he cannot recover on account of such injury." If he is injured by reason of such failure, it, of course, must be a cause of the injury and makes him responsible for it. Furthermore, if the plaintiff by the reasonable use of his faculties "could have avoided the accident and his failure to do so contributed toward the accident," then this conduct reached the full measure of "contributory negligence."

[6, 7] The third proposed instruction also contained a correct principle of law and presented a proper standard of conduct under the circumstances therein detailed.

The trial judge by the modification of these instructions did not erroneously state a principle of law, but the criticism is that he did not accurately present the theory of contributory negligence. The instructions, as modified, amount to this: That if plaintiff was guilty of negligence and that negligence was the sole cause of the injury, then he could not recover. Of course, that is true, but defendants desired to have the court instruct the jury that, if plaintiff's negligence contributed to and was therefore a proximate cause of the injury, he could not recover. True, the court did not use the definite article, but to declare negligence to be "proximate cause" necessarily implies that it is the only proximate cause.

[8, 9] The question then arises whether this action of the court constituted prejudicial error. The answer manifestly depends upon whether the principle was covered by other instructions. The only one which might possibly be so considered is the following:

"A failure to comply with the law respecting the operation of an automobile upon the highway from which an injury results as proximate and direct cause of such failure gives to the injured person a cause of action if his own negligence did not materially contribute to the injury and constitute a proximate cause thereof."

If it had not introduced the element of materiality, this might be deemed a sufficient instruction that plaintiff could not recover

if his own negligence contributed proximately to the injury. But in this state, in actions like this, the law does not recognize the doctrine of comparative negligence. Sego v. Southern Pacific Co., 137 Cal. 405, 70 Pac. 279. The instruction left the jury to speculate as to what extent in comparison with that of defendant the negligence of plaintiff may have contributed to the injury, and they may have concluded that plaintiff was proximately negligent, but that his negligence was not so material as that of defendant and hence he was not entitled to recover. However, the rule is as stated in Needham v. S. F. & S. J. R. Co., 37 Cal. 409, as follows:

"That a plaintiff cannot recover for the negligence of the defendant, if his own want of care or negligence has in any degree contributed to the result complained of—there can be no dispute."

The court therein states the reason of the rule to be that since both parties are in fault there can be no apportionment of damages. So in Maumus v. Champion, 40 Cal. 121, it is held to be sufficient to absolve the defendant if the negligence of the plaintiff "contributed proximately to the injury complained of."

Respondent, in support of his position that the error was cured, cites Squier v. Davis Standard Bread Co., 185 Pac. 391, wherein the lower court had used the expression "the proximate cause" in defining contributory negligence, but the Supreme Court calls attention to the fact that the sentence containing the objectionable words was immediately preceded by a sentence urging the jury to determine whether plaintiff's negligence, if any, was "a proximate cause" of the injuries, and that elsewhere the jury was fully and correctly instructed on the law of contributory negligence. The Supreme Court therefore held that from the whole charge the jury could not have been misled. Upon an examination of the record in that case we find that the trial court gave this instruction:

"The defendants in their answer allege that the plaintiff himself was guilty of negligence which proximately caused his injuries, and in that regard the court instructs you that if you find that both the plaintiff and the defendants were guilty of negligence proximately causing or contributing to the injury in question, then the plaintiff cannot recover, because his own contributory negligence, if any you find, is a complete defense on the part of the defendants."

We have no such situation here.

[10, 11] The defendants requested an instruction which was modified by the court by inserting the words in italics, and was given as follows:

"If you believe from the evidence that Mrs. Spencer, upon seeing the plaintiff at the crossing starting to cross the street, check her car to allow plaintiff to pass, and that plaintiff instead of going on turned back, and that Mrs. Spencer then proceeded on her way, that plaintiff then again started across, and that to avoid hitting the plaintiff Mrs. Spencer turned to the left-hand side of the street, then I charge you that the fact that she was on the left-hand side of the street at the time her car struck the plaintiff raises no presumption that she was guilty of negligence in being there, but puts upon her the burden of justifying her position, and it is for you to determine from all the evidence before you whether or not Mrs. Spencer used that degree of care and prudence which would be expected of a woman so placed as she was, and called upon to act suddenly in an emergency in an attempt to avoid a collision, and if, after a consideration of all the facts and circumstances, you are satisfied that she did use such care and prudence to avoid such collision as might reasonably be expected of a woman so placed as she was, then your verdict should be for the defendants."

The first part of the instruction, concluding with the "presumption," is undoubtedly correct. In other words, if the jury believed the facts to exist as therein recited, they must conclude that Mrs. Spencer was not guilty of negligence in being on the left-hand side of the street; that is, that she was justified in being there. Nevertheless, the court proceeds to tell the jury that she has cast upon her "the burden of justifying her position." This necessarily required of her proof to overcome a presumption in her favor. In other words, although certain facts showed her to be in the right, she must introduce evidence to prove that she was not in the wrong.

[12] In virtually stating that she must offer other evidence to justify her position in the street the court by said instruction also invaded the province of the jury, since the law imposes upon the jurors the duty of determining the weight and effect of the evidence.

In further explanation of her position, it may be added that where the accident occurred the street is very narrow, only about 23 feet wide; hence it was necessary to travel only a few feet to carry the machine to the "left-hand side of the street."

The court might well have given this instruction proposed by defendants:

"I instruct you that where the evidence is as consistent with a neglect of duty on the part of the injured person as it is with a neglect of duty or care on the part of the person charged with causing the injury, the injured party cannot recover in an action for damages for the injuries sustained."

This instruction was approved by the Supreme Court in Sheldon v. James, 175 Cal. 474, 166 Pac. 8, 2 A. L. R. 1493. While this omission would not of itself justify a reversal, yet in view of the strikingly conflicting character of the evidence it was quite appropriate to the situation.

[13] Appellants criticize the following instruction given by request of plaintiff:

"You are instructed that it is the duty of a person operating an automobile upon the public highway to use reasonable care in its operation, and to move at a rate of speed reasonable under the circumstances and to cause it to slow up or stop, if need be, when danger is imminent and could by the exercise of reasonable care be seen or known in time to avoid injury."

Appellants declare:

"This took from the jury the right of determining whether or not, in this case, the defendant was justified in seeking to avoid the accident by turning to the left instead of stopping."

There is some force in the criticism, as the test is what would a reasonable person do under the circumstances, and not what subsequent events may have shown to be necessary to avoid the injury. Of course, a driver should ordinarily stop his machine rather than take any chances of injuring a pedestrian; but it is for the jury to determine in each particular case what the rule of reasonable care requires in that respect. We do not say that the instruction is fatally defective, but we think it lacks clearness and was liable to be misunderstood.

We find nothing else in reference to the instructions subject to criticism.

For the reason, no doubt, that they see no merit in the contention, appellants do not argue the point that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of negligence on the part of Mrs. Spencer. As the record contains such evidence, we are reluctant to reverse the cause; but the defendants equally with the plaintiff, are entitled to a full and fair trial with the right to demand that their theory of the case, as legally sanctioned, be properly presented to the jury.

We think it just that a new trial be had, and the judgment is therefore reversed.

We concur: PREWETT, Presiding Judge pro tem.; HART, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank, denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for rehearing in the Supreme Court is denied.

[14] With regard to the instruction relating to the rule where the evidence is as consistent with neglect of duty by the injured person as it is with neglect of duty by the person charged with causing the injury, which instruction the District Court states "might well have been given," we desire to say that while the instruction is correct in point of law, if thoroughly understood, and therefore that it is not error to give it, we are not of the opinion that a court errs if it refuses the same. All that the instruction means is that where the plaintiff must prove his case by a preponderance of the evidence and the evidence on a material point in issue is equally balanced, the plaintiff cannot prevail. This rule should be stated in clearer language than is contained in the instruction copied in the opinion of the District Court, and the court may well refuse it provided it gives the rule as it should be stated.

All concur, except LAWLOR, J., who voted for the granting of the application, and WILBUR, J., absent.

ENGEBRETSON v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO. (L. A. 6145.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 2, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜1002—Statutory provision necessary in order to recover interest on amount due from municipality.

In order to recover interest against a municipality, there must be some statutory provision authorizing it.

2. Municipal corporations ⊜1002 — Statute held not to give right to recover interest as against municipality.

Civ. Code, §§ 1915, 1917, do not give one having a claim against a municipality a right to recover interest; such statutes not applying to the state or any of its subdivisions.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜1002—Contractor not entitled to interest on claim against city.

Neither under Vrooman's Act, § 10, as amended by section 3, St. 1913, p. 407, nor the city charter of San Diego, was a contractor on roadwork entitled to recover interest from the city in an action on a claim based on the contract which provided that the city should pay for one-half of the work.

4. Municipal corporations ⊜1002—Approval of auditor and treasurer of San Diego essential to securing payment of money from city treasury under statute relating to interest "due on any settlement of account."

Under Charter of San Diego, article 6, c. 2, § 7, article 2, c. 2, § 15, article 6, c. 2, § 12, and article 10, § 9, the approval of the city auditor is not only essential to the securing of a payment from the city treasury, but the auditor is specially charged with the duty of passing upon the question as to the validity of any claim against the city, and is not bound by the determination of the common council as to the validity of such a claim, and such is also true of the treasurer, and it cannot be said that money due from the city to a claimant is "due on any settlement of account from the day on which the balance is ascertained" within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 1917, relating to interest, until the account is acted upon by both auditor and treasurer, even if such statute be construed as applying to municipal corporations.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Settlement of Account.]

5. Municipal corporations ⊜1015 — Approval of claim by common council does not preclude claimant from maintaining action upon claim.

Approval by the common council of the city of San Diego of a claim against the city does not preclude the claimant from maintaining an action against the city upon the claim for the amount due, where the claimant has failed to secure payment solely by reason of the unauthorized refusal of the auditor to issue proper warrants, and it is not necessary that he proceed by mandamus to compel the auditor to issue the warrants, although he may so proceed, in view of Code Civ. Proc. §§ 581, 581a, 582.

Angellotti, C. J., and Sloane, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by John Engebretson against the City of San Diego. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

The following is the opinion of Waste, J., in District Court of Appeals, First District, Division 1, rendered June 24, 1920, and concurred in by Welch, Justice pro tem., and Richards, J.:

Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant, after demurrer to the complaint sustained, without leave to amend. The action was brought to recover of the defendant the aggregate sum of $19,937.09 alleged to be due from defendant for work done upon one of the streets of the city of San Diego.

The plaintiff and the defendant entered into two written contracts, on the 22d day of August, 1917, by the terms of which the former agreed to grade, pave and otherwise improve two different sections of Linda Vista road. The city covenanted to pay plaintiff, in warrants drawn upon the general fund of the city, the sums provided for in said contracts, for doing the work, as the same should be ascertained upon final estimates by the city engineer. Each of the contracts provided that upon the completion of the first half of the work, and its acceptance by the city engineer being reported to the auditing committee of the city, plaintiff should be paid 75 per cent. of the agreed price for that proportion of the improvement, the remaining 25 per cent. of the estimated cost not to be paid until the expiration of 35 days after the completion of the contract and the acceptance of the work by the city. The same provisions as to payment were applied to the second half of the work contracted for.

The plaintiff completed the first half of the work required to be done under both contracts, and received from the city a payment of 75 per cent. of the price for doing the same, according to the estimates made by the city engineer. On July 8, 1918, the plaintiff having fully performed both of his contracts, the city of San Diego, by a resolution of its common council, which recited that the city engineer and the manager of operation of the city, had filed their certificates showing that the work was fully completed, in all respects as provided for by the specifications, approved and accepted the work, and discharged plaintiff and his bondsmen from any future obligation in reference thereto. Thereupon the city engineer and the manager of operation made their final estimates of the cost of the work done, and the common council, by another resolution, authorized the payment to plaintiff "out of the general fund" of the sum of $29,086.74, the 75 per cent. payment due under the contracts. A certified copy of the resolution ordering this payment was duly served by the city clerk upon the auditor. When the plaintiff, immediately thereafter, applied to that official for a warrant for the amount ordered paid by the resolution, the auditor would not permit him to make and verify and declined to accept any claim for the amount due, and refused to issue a warrant for the amount upon the ground, as stated by him, "that plaintiff was required to look solely for payment of his claim to any collections that should be made by said city (of San Diego) from the delinquent taxes levied by said city for the year 1917 not otherwise appropriated, and on the further grounds that there were not sufficient funds derived from said delinquent taxes for 1917 in the city treasury to meet the said claim."

Thereafter the auditor, claiming that certain sums had been from time to time collected for delinquent taxes for the year 1917 and were available for payment upon plaintiff's claims, issued warrants to plaintiff which were paid until all but $724.14 of the final 75 per cent. payment for work on the contracts has been paid.

The city retained 25 per cent. of the entire price for doing the work under both contracts, which aggregated the sum of $19,212.95, to await the expiration of 35 days from the completion of the work and its acceptance by the common council. When that time arrived, no unpaid claims for labor or materials being presented, the council, by resolution, directed that that amount be paid to plaintiff "out of the general fund of said city, and as specified in said contracts." The auditor declined to issue a warrant to the plaintiff for this last installment, basing his refusal upon the same grounds as in the first instance. Thereafter plaintiff duly made and filed his verified claim against the city of San Diego for the amounts remaining at the time unpaid upon the two installments due for the work done and for interest thereon. The auditing committee of the city considered the claim, and rejected the demand for interest. With the exception of one payment of $2,996, the entire amount still remains unpaid, although it appears from the complaint that there has been at all times sufficient money in the treasury to pay the claim.

Appellant's position is that the city of San Diego, by the action of its common council, fully adjudicated and determined the amount due to him, and that he was, and is now, entitled to be paid the full amount without further auditing. He claims that it was not necessary to file any claim or claims against the city for the work, inasmuch as the auditor was duly notified of the action of the common council by receipt of the certified copy of the resolution accepting the work and ordering payment therefor out of the general fund, and that his filing such claims would only amount to an idle act. He contends that, while he might have sought a writ of mandate, as suggested by respondent, to compel the auditor to audit his claim and issue a warrant therefor, an acknowledged contract debt of a city, payment of which is withheld on demand, gives a general right of action against the municipality, and that mandamus is not the exclusive remedy. In making this contention the appellant is mistaken.

It appears from the complaint that the inability of the plaintiff to collect his money arose, in the first instance, from the effort of the auditor to restrict all payments for the work done by him to the taxes collected for the fiscal year 1917, that being the year in which the contract was executed. The city extended the time for doing the work, however, under the permissive terms of the contract, and it was not fully completed until in the next fiscal year, 1918. Under the situation disclosed by the complaint, and the settled law of this state, the position of the auditor was untenable. Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 176, 181–183, 76 Pac. 958; McBean v. City of Fresno, 112 Cal. 166, 44 Pac. 358, 31 L. R. A. 794, 53 Am. St. Rep. 191; Smilie v. Fresno County, 112 Cal. 311, 44 Pac. 556. In fact, we may assume that he and the city, if it at all accepted his theory, realized the error and abandoned the position. At any rate the city tendered the full amount of the last installment, less plaintiff's demand for interest, after this action was brought, and now resists plaintiff's action upon an entirely different theory. Its sole defense is concisely stated by it as follows: "In our case the council is the real auditing body, and did duly determine by proper resolution what constituted the liabilities of the city regarding plaintiff's claim, and the auditor had no right to avoid the council's action, and, since he has apparently done so, mandamus was the proper remedy to be pursued by plaintiff." In support of its contention the respondent relies upon the provisions of the charter of the city, which, in brief, provide that the auditor shall draw all warrants upon the treasury of the city for all demands allowed, and ordered paid in the proper manner. Charter of San Diego, § 5, c. 2, article 6. Its position is that, while the city contracted to pay appellant for the work performed by him, it had power to pay only in the manner provided by its charter, that is, through the medium of proper warrants drawn on the treasury, that any alleged failure to perform its contract arises through the default of an administrative officer, the auditor, and that, in the absence of any provision of the charter binding the city to respond for such default, the appellant was bound to seek his remedy by compelling the delinquent official to perform his duty. Such is the effect of the authorities in this jurisdiction. Union Trust Co. v. State, 154 Cal. 726, 729, 99 Pac. 183, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1111; Hunt v. Broderick, 104 Cal. 313, 315, 37 Pac. 1040; Raisch v. Board of Education, 81 Cal. 542, 546, 22 Pac. 890; Babcock v. Goodrich, 47 Cal. 488, 514.

The act of the auditor was purely one of misfeasance, and did not constitute a breach of contract on the part of the city. The city, through its common council, had fully performed its contract. The common council acted within its jurisdiction in ordering the amount due appellant to be paid. The duty of the auditor to draw warrants for the bills ordered paid by the common council was merely a ministerial one, and no discretion as to their payment or nonpayment was vested in him. Babcock v. Goodrich, supra. Since there was no breach of the contract by the city, which has exhausted its powers to perform the terms of that instrument, no interest was due to plaintiff from it, and he could have no claim against the city for the remissness or dereliction of one of its officers in failing to perform a duty that was imposed upon him by the laws of the municipality. In this latter connection it was said in Perkins v. Blauth, 163 Cal. 782, 789, 127 Pac. 50, 53: "The principles to be deduced from the decisions in this state are that municipal corporations are not liable for dereliction or remissness of municipal officers or agents in the performance of public or governmental functions of the city, or in the performance of duties imposed upon those officers which are prescribed and limited by express law; and when an injury results from the wrongful act or omission of a municipal officer charged with duty prescribed and limited by law, the doctrine of respondeat superior is inapplicable." Sievers v. San Francisco, 115 Cal. 648, 654–655, 47 Pac. 687, 56 Am. St. Rep. 153. Appellant argues that "the contention on the part of the city" that plaintiff was limited to the delinquent resources of the year 1917 was "not abandoned by it until after this suit was brought." As a matter of fact, this contention was not made by the city, but was merely another feature of the dereliction of the auditor, in that it was the excuse which he gave for the nonperformance of his duty, after the city had fully performed its part of the contracts with appellant.

The judgment is affirmed.

Haines & Haines, of San Diego, for appellant.

T. B. Cosgrove, of Los Angeles, M. R. Thorp, of San Diego, Arthur F. H. Wright, of Bisbee, Ariz., and S. J. Higgins, of San Diego, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The plaintiff on August 22, 1917, entered into two contracts with the city of San Diego for the improvement of a portion of the Linda Vista road. The work was to commence within 5 days and to be completed within 200 days. The contracts provided that the city should pay for one-half of the work, and this provision was in pursuance of section 26 of the Vrooman Act (Statutes of 1889, p. 170). The time for the completion of the work was extended to July 8, 1918, on which date the work was completed. On July 29, 1918, the common council of the city of San Diego authorized the payment from the general fund of the completion payment amounting to $29,086.74. $24,366.61 has been paid of this amount, and further installment of the contract price due 35 days after completion amounted to $19,212.95. The common council by resolution adopted August 30, 1918, authorized payment thereof out of the general fund of said city. On August 20, 1918, plaintiff filed his claim with the secretary of the auditing committee of said defendant for the balance due thereon with interest at 7 per cent. from July 8, 1918, on $29,086.74, less partial payments and interest on such payments and for $19,212.95, with interest from and after August 13, 1918, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. On July 8, 1918, there were unappropriated revenues of the city of San Diego, provided for the fiscal year 1918 and the fiscal year 1917 and previous years, more than sufficient to pay said amounts at that date unpaid upon said contracts. On July 29, 1918, plaintiff applied at the office of the auditor of the defendant city for the proper printed blank upon which to make his verified claim for the amount specified in the resolution of the common council. The auditor refused to comply with the request upon the ground that the plaintiff was required to look solely to the revenues of the year 1917 not otherwise appropriated for payment of his claim and on the ground that there was no sufficient funds derived from delinquent taxes for 1917 in the said city treasury to meet said claim. Thereupon the contractor made a written demand upon the common council for payment, and the city attorney rendered an opinion sustaining the position of the auditor and holding that plaintiff was not entitled to interest upon his claim. On November 20, 1918, plaintiff filed a duly verified claim for all amounts unpaid, together with interest thereon at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from the respective dates when said amounts fell due under the terms of the contract. The foregoing facts are alleged in the complaint filed by the plaintiff herein November 30, 1918, and in amendments thereto filed February 17, 1919. Plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint January 8, 1919, alleging the payment of an additional sum upon the completion payment due plaintiff under the contract, and that on December 24, 1918, the defendant tendered plaintiff the amount of the payment due 35 days after completion, to wit, $19,212.95. The demurrer of the defendant to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereon rendered, and plaintiff appeals. The respondent concedes that the plaintiff is entitled to the payment of the amounts due under the contracts without interest, but claims that the remedy for recovery thereof, in view of the allowance of the claim by the common council of San Diego, is by mandamus directed to the auditor and treasurer, and that neither in this case nor in a mandamus proceeding is the plaintiff entitled to recover interest. While the plaintiff demanded judgment for interest from the date when the payments under the contracts were due, namely, July 8th and August 12th, in his brief he claims interest on the completion payment of $29,086.74 from the date of the resolution of the common council authorizing the payment of said amounts from the general fund and upon the sum of $19,212.95, the 35-day payment, from August 30, 1918, the date of the resolution of the common council authorizing this payment from the general fund. The respondent contends that the city is not liable for interest, that when the common council authorized the payment of the moneys due the plaintiff it was the duty of the auditor to make such payment, and that the city cannot be compelled to pay interest because of the default of the auditor in failing to perform his duty.

In Higgins v. City of San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 50 Pac. 670, it was sought to recover money due under a contract where the validity of the contract was attacked as violating section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution, as being in excess of the revenue provided for the fiscal year in which the contract was executed. The court held that the contract was valid, but that the moneys due thereunder could only be paid from the revenues of the respective years in which the obligation accrued and originally directed a judgment in that form. On rehearing, however, which was ordered principally on the question as to the proper form of judgment, it was determined that the water company should have "an ordinary general judgment for whatever amount shall be found due it, without any direction as to the revenues out of which the judgment shall be satisfied." The reason for this determination is thus expressed by the court:

"Future provision might be made for the payment of a debt, although there might be no revenues of the fiscal year in which the debt was incurred out of which it could be satisfied, as, for instance, by the adoption by the people of a proposal to pay it, or by other methods that might possibly be suggested; and a direction in a judgment that it should be paid only out of the revenues of a certain year might be held to preclude its payment in any other way. Merely putting a demand in the form of a general judgment would not in any way take it out of the general rule that the ordinary revenues of a future year cannot be applied to the payment of a liability in a previous year, as held in Smith v. Broderick, 107 Cal. 644, 48 Am. St. Rep. 167. We think, therefore, that in a case like the one at bar there should be a general judgment in the usual form without any direction as to the method of its payment."

See, also, Arthur v. Petaluma, 175 Cal. 216, 221, 165 Pac. 698.

It is evident then that this action is not adapted to determine the question at issue between the auditor of the city of San Diego and the plaintiff, for the appropriate judgment herein would be for the amount of plaintiff's claim, and the question of whether or not there were funds to pay the claim would be still undetermined. The only effect of the judgment would be to determine that the plaintiff had a valid claim against the city for the amount of the judgment. Arthur v. Petaluma, supra; Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Rolph, 194 Pac. 1005. The appellant recognizes mandamus as an appropriate remedy, but points out that in such an action no interest could be allowed plaintiff as claimed (Barber v. Mulford, 117 Cal. 356, 360; Howe v. Southrey, 144 Cal. 767, 769, 78 Pac. 259; Hewel v. Hogin, 3 Cal. App. 248, 255, 84 Pac. 1002), and for that reason claims that mandamus is not an adequate remedy. Appellant claims that this case is differentiated from Higgins v. City of San Diego, supra, by reason of the fact that the complaint is framed for the very purpose of submitting the constitutional questions for judicial determination, and says:

"For this reason the substance of the contracts and the date of the completion and acceptance of the work was pleaded, and the allegation of paragraph IX of the complaint, relating to the sufficiency of the revenue, was made."

But the prayer of the complaint was for a general judgment for the full amount of plaintiff's claims with interest, and does not pray that said judgment should be paid from the revenue of the years 1917 and 1918.

The questions thus presented for consideration are: First. Does the approval by the common council of the city of San Diego of plaintiff's claim preclude the plaintiff from maintaining an action against the city upon the claim for the amount due, where the plaintiff has failed to secure payment solely by reason of the unauthorized refusal of the auditor to issue proper warrants? Second. Does the approval of plaintiff's claim by the common council entitle the plaintiff to recover interest from the date of such approval?

The appellate court held that the sole remedy of the plaintiff was mandamus. We will, however, consider the question of interest first.

[1] In order to recover interest against a municipality there must be some statutory provision authorizing it. The rule is thus stated in Ruling Case Law (15 R. C. L. § 14, p. 17; section 15, p. 18):

"It is well settled, both on principle and authority, that a state cannot be held to the payment of interest on its debts unless bound by an act of the Legislature or by a lawful contract of its executive officers made within the scope of its duly constituted authority. The principle applies to bonds, claims, judgments and warrants. The theory upon which the rule is based is that, whenever interest is allowed either by statute or common law, except in cases where there has been a contract to pay interest, it is allowed for delay or default of the debtor. But delay or default cannot be attributed to government. It is presumed to be always ready to pay what it owes. The apparently favored position of the government has been declared to be demanded by public policy." (Italics ours.)

The same reasons apply with equal force to a municipal corporation, although the authorities are not uniform on this subject. 15 R. C. L. § 15, p. 18.

[2] Appellant relies upon sections 1915 and 1917, Civil Code, to establish his right to recover interest, but in Savings, etc., Society v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 356, 363, 63 Pac. 665, 667, it was held that these sections do not apply to the state or any of its subdivisions. The court there stated:

"The Code sections cited relate to interest as compensation or damage between parties to an action, and the language of the statute is general and does not include the state or any of its political subdivisions. The state is not bound by general words of a statute which would operate to establish a right of action against it. Mayrhofer v. Board of Education, 89 Cal. 110; Whittaker v. County of Tuolumne, 96 Cal. 100. The action here is brought under a new section of the Political Code (3819) in which no provision is made for the payment of interest. Stats. 1895, p. 335."

[3] This case was followed in Columbia Savings Bank v. Los Angeles, 137 Cal. 471, 70 Pac. 308, in Miller v. Kern Co., 150 Cal. 797, 90 Pac. 119, and in Spencer v. Los Angeles, 180 Cal. 103, 115, 179 Pac. 163. In the first two cases the actions were under section 3819, Political Code, to recover money upon void assessments, and in the latter to recover moneys paid to the city of Los Angeles upon void assessments for the opening of a street. Section 26 of the Vrooman Act, as amended by section 8, Statutes 1891, p. 206, under which the city undertook to pay plaintiff for the work done under his contracts, makes no provision whatever for the payment of interest to a contractor by a municipality. That act does provide for the payment of 10 per cent. interest for that portion of the contract price assessed upon the lots benefiting by the work done, from and after the return of the warrant after demand, if then unpaid (section 10, Vrooman Act, as amended by section 3, Stats. 1913, p. 407), nor is there any provision in the charter of San Diego for the payment of interest upon such claims.

Appellant contends that his claim bears interest from the day it was audited and ordered paid by the common council.

[4] We have only to consider the method of auditing and paying accounts of a city to observe how difficult of application the rule contended for by the appellant would be. There would always be an interval between the date of the approval of claims by the common council and the date of the drawing and issuance of the warrant by the auditor. This delay may result because of the time necessary to prepare the many warrants drawn by the auditor, or it may result from the delay of the claimant or from the determination of the auditor that the city is not liable for the indebtedness. The auditor of the city of San Diego is charged with the duty of determining, before issuing a warrant, whether or not the contracts for the performance of which the warrants are demanded create obligations in excess of the revenues properly applicable to their payment, and, if for that reason they are void, to refuse to issue such warrants, failing in which duty the auditor and his bondsmen are "jointly, severally, and personally responsible and liable for any damage resulting to the city on account of any illegal or fraudulent claim for which a warrant may be issued." Charter of San Diego, art. 6, c. 2, § 7. The auditor as well as the common council is directly chargeable with the responsibility of determining whether or not a claim against the city is valid. Article 2, c. 2, § 15, provides as follows:

"Neither the common council, nor any officer, board, department, or authority shall allow, make valid, or in any manner recognize any demand against the city which was not at the time of its creation a valid claim against the same, nor shall they or any of them ever allow or authorize to be paid any demand which, without such action, would be invalid, or which shall then be barred by any statute of limitation, or for which said city was never liable."

The charter makes the same provisions as the Constitution of the state with reference to the contracting of debts and liabilities in excess of revenues and that "all officers of said city are charged with notice of the condition of the city treasury, and extent of the claims against the same." Article 6, c. 2, § 12. Article 10, § 9, would make both auditor and treasurer liable upon their official bond for the payment of an invalid claim. This section is as follows:

"Every officer who shall approve, allow or pay any demand on the treasury not authorized by law, ordinance, or this charter, shall be liable to the city individually, and on his official bond, for the amount of the demand so illegally approved, allowed or paid."

Under these provisions of the charter the approval of the auditor is not only essential to the securing of payment from the treasury, but the auditor is not only bound by the determination of the common council as to the validity of the claim, but he is specially charged with the duty of passing upon that question, as is also the treasurer. It follows that the appellant is in error in claiming that the amount due from the city is conclusively established by the action of the common council. Nor can it be said that the money due from the city to the claimant is "due on any settlement of account from the day on which the balance is ascertained" within the meaning of section 1917, Civil Code, for the balance is not effectively ascertained nor the account settled until acted upon by both auditor and treasurer. Although these sections, as we have said, have no application to a municipality, it may be further observed that, if interest began on all accounts when they are audited by the common council, the delay of the claimant in applying for his warrant or payment thereof would entitle him to recover 7 per cent. interest during the period of such delay, a fact which alone indicates the inapplicability of these sections to municipalities or governmental agencies where the creditor cannot tender payment to the debtor, but can only pay in the manner and form provided by law, and is presumed to be always ready and able to do so. 15 R. C. L. § 14, supra.

[5] We conclude, therefore, that the plaintiff is not entitled to recover interest, and that his remedy to avoid delay was by mandamus to compel the auditor to issue the warrants and thus secure payment.

It remains for us to determine whether or not, having failed to do so, he is entitled to any relief in this action. It is clear from the complaint that the plaintiff is entitled to the principal amount claimed. The money is due to him and has not been paid. This is admitted by the demurrer. There seems to be no good reason why he should not have judgment for the principal amount claimed, notwithstanding the fact that the claim has already been favorably passed upon by the common council, and that a judgment has no additional force except to conclusively establish the validity of the contract and of the indebtedness against the city and all its officers.

The judgment would bear interest from its date (Spencer v. Los Angeles, supra) and thus secure the plaintiff in his interest pending an appeal, in the event of a favorable decision in the lower court, and thus be more advantageous to the claimant than a mandamus suit where the validity of the indebtedness is in issue rather than the availability of funds to meet a valid claim. (Higgins v. San Diego, supra).

It seems a curious disposition of a case, where a creditor sues a debtor to recover on an acknowledged indebtedness, to deny him any relief on the ground that the debtor, or its board of directors, or its common council has admitted the claim of the creditor to be a just and valid one, even if it be found that the creditor has another remedy to secure payment of such indebtedness.

The Code of Civil Procedure declares that—

"In all cases other than those mentioned in the last two sections [581, 581a] judgment must be rendered on the merits." Section 582, Code Civ. Proc.

Sections 581 and 581a, Code of Civil Procedure, referred to, provide for a dismissal of the action, or the granting of a nonsuit, and do not include a case such as the one at bar. The trial court, upon sustaining the demurrer to the amended complaint, rendered a judgment "that the complaint, as so amended, be, and the same is hereby, dismissed," and awarded costs to the city. This is either not a judgment on the merits as required by section 582, supra, where the plaintiff alleged and the defendants admit an indebtedness of nearly $50,000, or it is a judgment on the merits which would bar the plaintiff from recovering his claim by a subsequent mandamus. In either event it is erroneous.

Judgment reversed, and the court directed to overrule the demurrer to the complaint.

We concur: SHAW, J.; OLNEY, J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. I dissent from the judgment of reversal. To my mind, in view of our conclusion on the question of plaintiff's right to interest, in which I entirely concur, the complaint did not state a cause of action against the city of San Diego. I think that upon the facts alleged plaintiff's sole remedy for the collection of his claim which had been duly allowed by the council of the city was by mandate against the auditor, as was decided by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division 1.

I concur: SLOANE, J.

BENT v. SECOND EXTENSION WATER CO. et al. (Civ. 2226.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 2, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸238—Sale of property by mutual water company is subject to nonconsenting stockholder's right to receive water.

Where a mutual water corporation had complied with Civ. Code § 324, so as to make the right of its shareholders to receive water from the corporation an appurtenance to the land which could be transferred only with the land, a sale by the corporation of all its property under the provisions of section 361a conveys the property subject to the vested right of nonconsenting stockholder to continue to receive the water represented by his shares of stock.

2. Constitutional law ⟸93(1)—Waters and water courses ⟸238—Mutual water company cannot be authorized to deprive nonconsenting stockholder of vested right to water.

If Civ. Code, § 361a, authorizing sale by a corporation of all its property with the consent of two-thirds of its stockholders, authorized a mutual water company, by the sale of its property, to deprive a nonconsenting stockholder of his vested right to receive water for his lands, that statute would be invalid.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Arthur S. Bent against the Second Extension Water Company and Alpaugh Irrigation District. Judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendant irrigation district appeals. Affirmed.

D. E. Perkins, of Visalia, for appellant.

Farnsworth, McClure & Burke, of Visalia, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is on the judgment roll. The decree of the court required defendant Alpaugh Irrigation District, "upon payment of reasonable cost of furnishing and delivering the same to furnish and deliver to plaintiff, or his successors, upon said land mentioned, and described in the complaint in this action, for irrigation purposes from the water supply and water system formerly owned by said Second Extension Water Company" a certain quantity of water designated and described therein; it also adjudged that said quantity of water is appurtenant to all the real property described in the complaint and belonging to plaintiff, and ordered and directed that plaintiff recover from said defendant the sum of $1,625.60 for failure and neglect to furnish water on said land for irrigation purposes during the irrigation season of 1917.

The defendant, Second Extension Water Company, a mutual water corporation, was incorporated in January, 1906, in accordance with the provision of section 324 of the Civil Code. The by-laws provided that the water should be supplied only to the owners of the stock, and that such stock should be appurtenant to certain lands described in the certificates issued therefor. One hundred and twenty shares of such stock were issued to plaintiff, and in the certificate thereof 120 acres of land belonging to plaintiff were described, and a certified copy of the by-laws of the corporation was recorded with the county recorder of Tulare county wherein the land was situated. It is not disputed that the Second Extension Water Company complied with the provisions of said section 324, and that said shares of stock owned by respondent were and are appurtenant to said 120 acres of land, and it is admitted that, as a stockholder in said corporation, respondent has paid all assessments, calls, and demands thereon.

At a meeting of the stockholders of said corporation held on December 21, 1915, the holders of two-thirds of the issued capital stock authorized, by resolution, the board of directors to sell the water, water rights, and all physical property of the corporation to the Alpaugh Irrigation District, and thereafter, for a valuable consideration, the sale was consummated, and on March 3, 1917, said district entered into actual and exclusive possession and control of all of said physical properties. The respondent did not consent to such transfer and has at all times vigorously opposed the same.

It is admitted by appellant that—

Prior to March 3, 1917, "the Second Extension Water Company had regularly furnished respondent the amount of water called for in his certificate of stock for the irrigation of the land described in said certificate, but from and after the date of said transfer neither defendants would furnish him with any water, though he demanded it from both."

Said section 324 of the Civil Code provides that—

"Any corporation organized for, or engaged in the business of selling, distributing, supplying, or delivering water for irrigation purposes or for domestic use, may in its by-laws provide that water shall only be sold, distributed, supplied, or delivered to owners of its capital stock, and that such stock shall be appurtenant to certain lands when the same are described in the certificate issued therefor; and when such certificate shall be so issued, and a certified copy of such by-law recorded in the office of the county recorder in the county where such lands are situated, the shares of stock so located on any land shall only be transferred with said lands, and shall pass as an appurtenance thereto."

Section 361a of said Code provides how a valid sale may be made of the business, franchise and property as a whole of any corporation in the state, and it is not disputed that the sale herein was made in compliance with said statutory authority.

[1] The question, then, to be determined is whether respondent, owning certain stock in a mutual water corporation, such stock being appurtenant to certain land and therefore real property, lost his right to demand water when the corporation, without his consent, sold all its water rights and physical property, or whether the vendee must continue furnishing water to respondent. The question has been decisively answered by the Supreme Court in favor of respondent's contention, and extended consideration would therefore seem to be unnecessary.

In South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal 579, 93 Pac. 490, the question arose in reference to a corporation engaged in supplying water for public use, and the Supreme Court held that such water company, by complying with the provisions of said section 361a, could transfer "its business, franchise and property as a whole." but that "the transferee would take the franchise and property pertaining to it subject to all its burdens, and so long as it held it would be obliged to continue the performance of the public service to which it had been dedicated, and that all the persons to whose use the water is appropriated or dedicated are vested with a right to have the supply continued by whosoever may be in control thereof, and may enforce such right by a proceeding in mandamus against the person in control of the supply and the works by which it is distributed, regardless of the title, to compel the continuance of the distribution, in the usual and proper manner, to those entitled."

In that case the water was a public utility, and appellant seeks to distinguish it from this upon the ground that herein only a private right of property is involved.

But in Orcutt v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., 152 Cal. 599, 93 Pac. 497, it is held that the rule is the same where the water is appurtenant to the land and is a private right of property. Therein it is said:

"The plaintiffs are residents of the portion of South Pasadena supplied with water by the defendant company, and owners of land therein, and it is alleged that a certain share of said water is appurtenant to the respective tracts of land, for irrigation and domestic use thereon. They sue on behalf of themselves and of others having similar rights. The fact that the right to receive the water is appurtenant to the land and is a private right of property, and not a mere right as one of a class entitled to share in a public use, does not in any way materially distinguish the case from South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Company."

[2] This view is not in conflict with said section 361a of the Civil Code. While the section authorizes the sale of the business, franchise, and property of the corporation as a whole, it does not, nor does it purport to, relieve the system of the burden of a vested interest in a portion of the water belonging to a nonconsenting stockholder. In fact he could not legally be thus deprived of such real property. This right of property does not belong to the corporation, and the owner of it could be divested of it "only by operation of law, or by an instrument in writing, subscribed by the party disposing of the same, or by his agent thereunto authorized by writing." Section 1091, Civ. Code. The sale by the corporation was manifestly in its individual capacity, and not as an agent or instrumentality of the government. Hence the sale was not by operation of law. Klauber v. San Diego St. Car Co., 95 Cal. 353, 30 Pac. 555. The owner himself could have transferred his right to the water, and thus have severed the appurtenance from the land itself (Estate of Thomas, 147 Cal. 236, 81 Pac. 539, but that is, clearly, not this case.

The fault of appellant seems to be principally in assuming that the interest of the stockholder, as in the ordinary corporation, is confined to the right to participate in the profits of the business, and the distribution of the assets. Such was the situation in the cases cited by appellant. Wright v. Oroville Gold, etc., Co., 40 Cal. 20; Kohl v. Lilienthal, 81 Cal. 378, 20 Pac. 401, 22 Pac. 689, 6 L. R. A. 520; Hobbs v. Tom Reed, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 497, 129 Pac. 781, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112. They involved mining corporations, and the shares of stock therein did not represent a vested interest that was appurtenant to land.

In the first of these it was said:

"The mere legal title to this mining property is undoubtedly vested in the corporation itself, and not in the stockholders as such. The board of trustees may therefore control the property, provided that, in doing so, it do not act beyond the limit which the law has assigned to the exercise of corporate authority."

So in Kohl v. Lilienthal it is said:

"Stockholders have no legal title to the property of the corporation. That remains in the corporation, and the shares simply represent the right of the shareholders to share in the distribution of the profits of the corporation, and in the final distribution of its estate when it shall cease to exist and its estate shall have been finally administered."

Likewise, in the Hobbs Case the declaration is:

"A corporation is the agent and trustee of its stockholders, in their behalf and for their use and benefit, holding, controlling, and managing the corporate property and business."

Herein there can be no objection to the sale of the business or of the assets of the corporation, but the stock represents an additional element, an interest in real property, which constitutes a private vested right that the owner may continue to assert, notwithstanding the property of the corporation has been sold. He is bound by the sale to the extent of the ordinary incidents of stock in a corporation, and he must accept service of the water from the vendee, but the law does not place in the hands of any number of his fellow stockholders the power to take away at their will this property right, which the stockholders by their own contract have made appurtenant to plaintiff's land.

Indeed, the decision of the Supreme Court is a necessary conclusion from the language of section 324 providing that—

"The shares of stock so located on any land shall only be transferred with said lands, and shall pass as an appurtenance thereto."

We may add that in section 1473 of Kinney on Irrigation and Water Rights (2d Ed.) the learned author says:

"Not only may a corporation purchase from individuals or other corporations certain portions of their property and rights, but an incorporated water company has the power to purchase from another corporation, and the latter corporation has the power, with the assent of the requisite number of stockholders required by the law, to legally sell and convey to another corporation all of its property, including its water rights, rights of way, diverting and carrying works, franchises, and business, and all other personal and real property of whatsoever kind or nature, if the same is done in good faith, and not for the purpose of delaying or defrauding creditors.

"But the rights of consumers which vested under the operations of the selling corporation are not affected by the transfer to another company, but they have the right to have the water supply 'continued by whomsoever may be in control thereof.' "

We conclude that respondent's water right is his vested private property appurtenant to his land, of which he cannot be divested except by his own conveyance, or by operation of law; that no such transfer has been made; that the purchaser took the property of the Second Extension Water Company subject to this vested right of plaintiff; and that he is entitled to a continued service of water from the system.

The judgment is affirmed.

ABRAHAM et al. v. KING et al. (Civ. 3496.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1921.)

1. Venue ⊂=80—Transferred action properly dismissed where plaintiff did not pay fees within year.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 581b, in an action in claim and delivery originally commenced in the superior court of the county of Sacramento where defendants appeared and moved for change of venue to the city and county of San Francisco on the ground of the residence of a defendant in such city and county, and it appeared from the affidavit filed in support of the motion that the defendant named as a company was not a legal entity, and that the name had been used by the individual defendant as a trade-name in carrying out one contract, so that it appeared that such individual defendant was the only defendant, and the transfer fees were not paid by plaintiff within one year from the time of the receipt of the papers by the clerk at San Francisco, the court properly dismissed the action.

2. Venue ⊂=80—Trial court without jurisdiction except to dismiss action begun in wrong court where fees of transfer not paid.

The trial court is without jurisdiction to do anything in an action except dismiss it under the conditions set forth in Code Civ. Proc. § 581b, providing that no action where not originally commenced in the proper county shall be further prosecuted, where the costs and fees of transmission of the pleadings and papers to the clerk of the court to which it is transferred have not been paid.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by N. Abraham and another, copartners doing business under the name and style of Abraham & Davidson, against L. C. King and another. From judgment dismissing the action, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment modified, and as modified affirmed.

Rose & Silverstein, of Oakland, for appellants.

Nowlin, Fassett & Little, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The judgment was for the dismissal of an action in claim and delivery, and for the return of certain personal property or the value thereof in the sum of $1,500, and for damages for the detention thereof in the sum of $148 and for costs.

The action was originally commenced in the superior court of the county of Sacramento. The defendants appeared and moved for a change of venue to the city and county of San Francisco on the ground of the residence of the defendant L. C. King in said city and county. It appeared from the affidavit filed in support of this motion that the defendant Pacific Wrecking Company was not a legal entity, and that that name had been used by the defendant King as a trade-name in carrying on one contract. It appeared, therefore, that said King was the only defendant in the action. The motion for the change of venue was duly granted and the papers in the case transmitted to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, where they were received on October 4, 1918. On October 5, 1919, the superior court rendered the judgment of dismissal under section 581b, Code of Civil Procedure, and further recited in said judgment that the action was for the recovery of the possession of personal property and that the personal property described in the complaint herein was in said action taken from the defendant L. C. King and delivered to the plaintiffs. It was then adjudged and decreed:

"That the defendant L. C. King do have and recover of and from the plaintiffs, N. Abraham and M. Davidson, that certain lot of secondhand machinery, iron, and junk more fully described in plaintiffs' complaint herein, or the value thereof, to wit, the sum of $1,500 in case a return cannot be had, together with $148 damages for the detention thereof by the plaintiff, together also with defendant's costs and disbursements incurred in said action, amounting to the sum of $5.50."

The appellant contends that under the facts of this case the trial court has no power or jurisdiction to enter a dismissal of the action, and that, assuming that the court had the power to dismiss the action, it had no power or jurisdiction to enter an alternative judgment, and the power of the court was limited to a dismissal only.

The judgment was entered under the provisions of section 581b, Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows:

"No action heretofore or hereafter commenced, where the same was not originally commenced in the proper county, shall be further prosecuted, and no further proceedings shall be had therein, and all such actions heretofore and hereafter commenced must be dismissed by the court to which the same shall have been transferred, on its own motion, or on the motion of any party interested therein, whether named in the complaint as a party or not, where the costs and fees of transmission of the pleadings and papers therein to the clerk or justice of the court to which it is transferred or of filing the papers anew, have not been paid by the plaintiff for one year after the time when such pleadings or papers shall have arrived in the custody of such clerk or justice. * * *"

[1, 2] It is admitted that the fees were not paid by the plaintiff within one year from the time of the receipt of the papers by the clerk at San Francisco. It is unnecessary to discuss the argument of the appellant upon the question of the power of the court to order a dismissal of the action. Our Supreme Court, in the recent case of Davis v. Superior Court, 195 Pac. 390, has foreclosed all argument on this question. It is there held under facts analogous to the facts in the present case that the court must dismiss the action under the provisions of section 581b, Code of Civil Procedure. This case is also authority upon the second point urged by appellant, which is that under the provisions of section 581b, Code of Civil Procedure, the trial court had no jurisdiction to do more than dismiss the action; that it could not enter an alternative judgment nor any judgment except one of dismissal of the action. In the case of Davis v. Superior Court, supra, we have a direct ruling that the trial court is without jurisdiction to do anything in an action except dismiss it, under the conditions set forth in section 581b, Code of Civil Procedure.

The judgment is modified by striking therefrom all portions thereof except the portion dismissing the action. As thus modified, the judgment is affirmed.

MALONEY v. HOUSTON et al. (Civ. 3481.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. Feb. 26, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1921.)

1. Sales ⊂=135 — Vendor and purchaser ⊂=144(2)—Lack of title in seller prior to time of performance no ground for rescission.

Want of title furnishes no ground for rescission of a contract of sale of land or personalty unless on tender seller is unable to comply with the agreement.

2. Sales ⊂=137—Provision in contract as to personal obligations held intended to apply only to such as would be a lien on property.

A provision in a contract of sale of an interest in concessions, a partnership contract to be executed on payment of purchase price, that no party to the agreement had any personal obligations nor would contract any obligations that would be a lien on the business, held intended to apply only to obligations which would be a lien on the property.

3. Sales ⊂=137—Existence of liens on property held not ground for rescission of contract of sale.

That seller of beach concessions had personal obligations that were a lien upon property contracted to be sold, contrary to the provision in the contract that there should be no personal obligations which would be a lien on the property, was no ground for rescission of the contract by the prosecuting purchaser who had not tendered the balance due on the purchase price, which would give him the right under the contract to possession of the property.

4. Sales ⊂=384(1)—Seller held not entitled to damages by reason of purchaser's failure to complete purchase.

In an action wherein sellers of interest in property sought recovery of damages for breach of contract by purchaser and attempted rescission, sellers were not entitled to recover by reason of the fact that on account of purchaser's default one of them was unable to pay balance of purchase price upon his automobile, the want of the use of which prevented him from reaching the place of his employment on time as the result of which he lost his position, and that other parties had replied to an advertisement of sale of the property in question and manifested some interest therein, but with whom, on account of purchaser's agreement to purchase, they did not enter into negotiations, and that they were compelled to borrow money to carry on the business, and were not treated with the same consideration as they had been heretofore treated by land company that had given them a concession, as seller's right to recover damage for purchaser's refusal to complete his purchase, whether personal or real property, is fixed by Civ. Code, §§ 3307, 3311.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by E. M. Maloney against Carl T. Houston and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment that plaintiff take nothing affirmed, and judgment for defendants on cross-complaint reversed.

John Clarkson and S. M. Davis, both of Santa Ana, for appellant.

H. C. Head, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment entered in favor of defendants. On September 6, 1918, defendants, who were in possession of two certain concessions at Seal Beach, Cal., known as "Auto Parking Station" and "Tent City and Delicatessen Store," of which they claimed to be owners, entered into a written contract with plaintiff whereby, for the sum of $2,000, to be by him paid, they agreed to sell an undivided one-half interest in the property. Of the consideration so specified, $700 was paid by plaintiff at the time of the execution of the contract, and it was provided therein that the balance of $1,300 was to be paid on or before September 26, 1918, at which time a written contract of copartnership was to be executed for the conduct of the business. The contract contained a clause as follows:

"It is further agreed by the parties hereto that no party to this agreement has any personal obligations or otherwise, nor will they contract any obligations that would be a lien on said concessions without the written consent of all parties hereto without forfeiting their rights in this agreement and in said concessions, current running expenses and necessities of life excepted."

Plaintiff made default in the payment of the $1,300 called for by the contract, and on November 22, 1918, filed an amended complaint containing three counts, one of which was to recover for 26 days' services alleged to have been performed by plaintiff at the special instance and request of defendants, another to recover in assumpsit for $700, money had and received by defendants for and on account of plaintiff, and the other for a rescission of the contract.

In addition to their answer, defendants filed a cross-complaint, alleging the execution of the agreement and plaintiff's default in the making of the payment, as agreed therein, by reason whereof they were damaged in the sum of $750.

At the trial the court made findings adverse to plaintiff, and as to the matters alleged in the cross-complaint found in favor of defendants, as a result of which it was adjudged that plaintiff take nothing by reason of the action, and that the defendants have judgment against him for the sum of $500.

As to the cause of action based upon the alleged services rendered by plaintiff to defendants, the adverse finding of the court thereon is clearly sustained by the testimony of defendants to the effect that plaintiff was never employed by them, nor did he, at their instance and request, perform any services, but pending the consummation of the deal in accordance with the contract made his home at the Tent City, and of his own accord and without any authority so to do occasionally participated in the performance of some slight service required around the place.

[1] The right to a rescission is based upon the fact that at the time of executing the agreement defendants were subject to personal obligations for the payment of money, and further that defendants did not have title to the property which they agreed to sell. It appears that the Bayside Land Company was the grantor of the concessions, and that E. B. De Garmo and defendant S. J. Houston were the grantees thereof, and that under the terms of the grant or lease the grantees were prohibited from assigning the same without the consent of the grantor; that some time prior to the entering into of the contract in question De Garmo sold his interest therein to defendants, depositing with the Bayside Land Company an assignment, which was approved by the said company and held by it under instructions of the assignor to deliver it to the assignees upon payment of a balance of $230, unpaid to De Garmo upon this assignment. He also owed something upon an automobile purchased by him, but which was no part of the property sold and upon which the vendor held a lien, and was likewise indebted to his father.

In our opinion, none of these conceded facts constitute ground for rescission of the agreement to sell the property, a transfer of which plaintiff was not entitled to until he paid the balance of the purchase price; and, since he never paid or offered to pay the same, the fact that defendants did not have title to the property was not a subject of concern to him. That one may lawfully agree to to sell either personal or real property to which at the time he has no title cannot be questioned, and the want of title furnishes no ground for rescission unless, upon tender, defendant is unable to comply with the agreement; and hence, until he complied with his part of the contract by tendering the balance of the purchase price, plaintiff could not demand a conveyance, and was in no position to complain of defendants' default. When the purchaser is in default of the payment of the purchase price he cannot, against the will of the seller, repudiate such contract. Bradford v. Parkhurst, 96 Cal. 102, 30 Pac. 1106, 31 Am. St. Rep. 189; Glock v. Howard, 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17.

[2, 3] The provision in the contract that none of the parties thereto had any personal obligations appears by the context to have been intended to apply to obligations which would be a lien on the property. The agreement is that they have no personal obligations, nor will they contract any such that would be a lien on said concessions. We construe this provision as intended to apply to obligations only which were a lien upon the property agreed to be transferred. As appears from the evidence, there were none, and even if, as claimed by appellant, such liens did exist at the time of making the agreement, nevertheless, as stated, appellant was not affected thereby, since he never paid nor tendered payment.

Under this view of the case it is apparent that plaintiff was not entitled to recover for money had and received on account of the $700 paid upon the purchase price, in accordance with the terms of the contract.

While appellant predicates error upon a number of rulings made by the court in admitting and excluding evidence, he suggests no reason for such claim, and, as presented in his brief, we cannot say that any of the rulings were erroneous.

[4] As stated, the defendants filed a cross-complaint alleging that, by reason of plaintiff's failure to comply with the terms of the contract, they were damaged in the sum of $750, and as to which the court found that plaintiff's refusal to perform the agreement on his part injured the business, plans and arrangements of defendants, and who, but for his acts, might have negotiated a sale to other parties, all to their damage in the sum of $500, for which a judgment was rendered against plaintiff. This finding is without sufficient support in the evidence, which in effect shows that by reason of plaintiff's default the defendant C. T. Houston was unable to pay the balance of the purchase price upon his automobile, the want of the use of which prevented him from reaching his place of employment on time, as a result of which he lost his position at the shipyards; that other parties had replied to an advertisement of sale of the concessions and manifested some interest therein, but with whom, on account of plaintiff's agreement to purchase, they did not enter into negotiations; and, further, that they were compelled to borrow money to carry on their business and were not treated with the same consideration by the Bayside Land Company as they had theretofore been treated. It thus appears that the damage, if any, was due to causes entirely too remote from plaintiff's default and cannot be attributable thereto. Moreover, whether the subject of the agreement be deemed personal or real property, defendants' right to recover damages for plaintiff's refusal to complete the purchase, is fixed by the provisions of the Code. See sections 3311 and 3307, Civ. Code.

The judgment that plaintiff take nothing by the action is affirmed; and the judgment rendered in favor of defendants upon the cross-complaint for $500 is reversed.

CRANE et al. v. BLATT. (Civ. 3141.)

Sales ⊂=66—Contract construed to obligate buyer to pay particular amount.

Where contract of sale of goods provided that buyer "does hereby agree to buy the above goods as stated above and does agree to pay for same as follows: $300 to be paid upon the taking of the invoice and $1,000 to be paid by E. (third person not a party to the contract) the balance to be paid by notes to be payable $200 or over each month from date of sale," the buyer was liable for the $1,000; E. not being a promisor under the contract.

Action by W. H. Crane and another against S. Blatt. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

J. F. Keogh and C. C. Mishler, both of Los Angeles (Frank H. Snyder, of Glendale, of counsel), for appellants.

Harry Lyons, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The parties to this action entered into a contract whereby appellants agreed to sell to respondent, the party of the second part therein, certain fixtures and other articles and a certain stock of merchandise. The sum of $1,200 was to be paid for the fixtures and the other articles mentioned. The following part of the agreement related to the merchandise:

"Said party of the second part does hereby agree to buy the above goods as stated above and does agree to pay for same as follows: $300.00 to be paid upon the taking of the invoice and $1,000.00 to be paid by E. L. Weaver, the balance to be paid by notes to be payable $200.00 or over each month from date of sale."

Respondent paid all the amounts mentioned in the agreement except the thousand dollars, and this action was commenced to enforce a collection of that sum. Judgment went for the defendant, and the plaintiffs appeal.

The trial court made several findings of fact based upon the view that the agreement contained no promise on the part of respondent to pay the thousand dollars, and it is insisted by appellant that those findings are not supported by the evidence.

The paragraph which we have above quoted commences with the statement that respondent agrees to buy the goods and agrees to pay for them "as follows." The items thus agreed to be paid were $300, $1,000, and certain notes. The fact that it was also stated that the thousand dollars was to be paid by Weaver is of no consequence. Weaver was not a party to the contract and therefore not a promisor under it; but respondent was. The mention of the thousand dollars in the paper is entirely out of place, except upon the theory that respondent was to pay it. Moreover, to conclude where we began, it is listed under respondent's express promise to pay. The clause in question is, in effect, only this:

"I agree to pay you one thousand dollars, to be handed to you for me by E. L. Weaver."

The findings in question are not supported by the evidence.

The judgment is reversed.

GALLOWAY v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3703.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. Feb. 26, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court April 27, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⊂=383—Evidence held to justify inference that motorman's purpose was to assist in ejecting passenger, so that whether he was acting within scope of employment was for jury.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son, a passenger on a car, when assaulted and struck on the head by the motorman, evidence held to justify an inference that it was the purpose of the motorman to assist the conductor in ejecting from the car a passenger who had become boisterous and beyond control, in carrying out which purpose both would have been acting within the scope of their employment, so that whether the motorman was so acting was a question of fact for the jury.

2. Carriers ⊂=365(1)—If conductor and motorman act within scope of employment in ejecting a passenger, company is not liable if unreasonable force is not used.

In carrying out the purpose of ejecting from the car a passenger who had become boisterous and beyond control, both the conductor and the motorman would have been acting within the scope of their employment, and, if they did not use unreasonable or unnecessary force, the street car company would have been free from liability for damage for the resulting injury to the passenger.

3. Carriers ⊂=365(2)—Plaintiff suing for death of son did not need to establish passenger relation.

It was not a prerequisite to right of plaintiff to recover of defendant street railroad for death of her minor son when struck on the head by the motorman of a car when being ejected that plaintiff should establish that the passenger relation existed between her son and the street railroad.

4. Carriers ⊂=381(1)—Prima facie case held to cast burden on defendant street railroad to show motorman's act was not committed in course of agency.

Plaintiff, suing defendant street railroad company for death of her minor son when struck on the head by the motorman of a car when being ejected, having made out a prima facie case of injury resulting either from the negligence of the motorman within the scope of his employment or from wrongful acts committed by him as agent for the company in and as a part of the transaction of the company's business, there was established a prima facie liability on the company, and the burden was then placed on it to show that act was not committed in the business of the agency within the meaning of Civ. Code, § 2338.

5. Carriers ⊂=384(2)—Instruction clearly stating law as to one phase of case not erroneous.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when struck on the head by the motorman of the car on which he was or had been riding, an instruction that, if the injury occurred while deceased was passenger through the negligence or reckless act of the motorman acting in the course of his employment, the company was liable, was not in itself erroneous, clearly stating the law as to one phase of the case.

6. Carriers ⊂=365(2)—All persons, including motorman, must refrain from assaulting others.

It is the duty of every one, whether a motorman on a street car or not, to refrain from committing any assault on any person, whether such person be a passenger or not.

7. Carriers ⊂=384(1)—Instruction stated law of case in so far as liability of defendant street railroad attached, irrespective of passenger relation.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when assaulted by the motorman on the car on which he was or had been riding, instruction, so far as it went, held to have presented the law of the case to the jury in so far as the liability of defendant company attached, irrespective of the passenger relation.

8. Carriers ⊂=384(1) — Instructions confining liability of street railroad to showing of passenger relation erroneous and prejudicial.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when struck on the head by the motorman of the car on which he was or had been riding, instruction tying the liability of defendant to a showing of a passenger relation of plaintiff's deceased son, from which the jury must have drawn the conclusion that the trial court entertained the view that without such a showing plaintiff could not recover, held erroneous and prejudicial to plaintiff.

9. Trial ⊂=237(3)—Instruction held erroneous as requiring jury to be satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when assaulted by the motorman of the car on which he was or had been riding, instruction that the evidence must satisfy the jury's mind to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of the whole evidence was erroneous, as it clearly required satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, which is not necessary in such a case.

10. Trial ⊂=296(8)—Erroneous instruction as to measure of proof required not cured.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when struck on the head by the motorman of a car on which he was or had been riding, instruction that, if any of the facts mentioned had not been proved by a preponderance of the evidence, verdict must be in favor of defendant, held not to have cured the first portion of the charge which advised the jury that satisfaction to a moral certainty and by a preponderance was necessary.

11. Appeal and error ⊂=882(12)—Error in instruction on degree of proof required not invited.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when assaulted by a motorman, error in the instruction advising the jury that both satisfaction to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of the evidence was required for verdict for plaintiff held not invited by the instruction requested by plaintiff that moral certainty only was required of plaintiff, defining it; the language being followed immediately by admonition that the rule in criminal cases had no application.

12. Appeal and error ⊂=1064(1)—Instruction plaintiff must prove case to a moral certainty prejudicial.

In an action against a street railroad company for death of plaintiff's minor son when assaulted by a motorman, erroneous instruction that plaintiff must prove her case to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of the evidence held prejudicial to plaintiff.

Action by Mary K. Galloway against the United Railroads of San Francisco. From judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

F. H. Dam, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. M. Cannon, Wm. M. Abbott, and Kingsley Cannon, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment after verdict in favor of defendant in an action for damages for the death of her minor son. Death was alleged to have been caused by a blow on the head inflicted by defendant's motorman with the controller bar or gate handle of a street car upon which deceased had been a passenger, and from which he had alighted just prior to receiving the injury.

The facts in evidence, without substantial conflict, are that the deceased—a young boy of about 18 years of age—with three other companions, was traveling upon a Valencia street car in the city and county of San Francisco when an altercation arose between the conductor of the car and the deceased over the request of the latter for transfers, to which it is conceded he was lawfully entitled. As a result of the altercation blows were exchanged between the conductor and the deceased, and the conductor gave the motorman an emergency signal to stop the car immediately after it had passed Twenty-Third street. The parties were then separated, and the conductor gave the signal to go ahead. Thereafter the altercation was resumed, and a passenger gave the emergency signal, whereupon the motorman brought the car to a stop about 100 feet north of the intersection of Twenty-Fourth street. The motorman immediately opened his gate, and, taking the gate handle, stepped down upon the street from the front platform and ran to the rear of the car to give aid to the conductor. At the same time the deceased left the car and was standing in the street when the motorman approached the rear step. The deceased took two or three steps toward the motorman, who thereupon struck him violently on the head with the gate handle, causing a concussion of the brain which resulted in almost instant death.

The appeal is based upon alleged errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to by plaintiff in the giving, modifying, and refusing of certain instructions. Appellant's principal contention is that the instructions given made the test of liability depend upon the question whether or not decedent was a passenger at the time of receiving his fatal injury, and that this was erroneous because he would be entitled to recover, even though the passenger relation had terminated, if his death was caused by a tortious act of defendant's motorman acting in the course and within the scope of his employment. Respondent concedes this principle, and that the relationship of passenger and carrier is not per se determinative of the issue as to whether or not the tort complained of was committed within the scope of the employment. It argues, however, that appellant limited her cause of action to the passenger theory by alleging in her complaint that decedent was a passenger, and that therefore she was not entitled to have the jury instructed on the question of defendant's liability for injuries to one not a passenger. The authorities cited by respondent to support this position hold that one may not plead one relation and prove another, but in each instance the complaint was based exclusively on the theory of the passenger relation, and it was neither alleged nor proved that the act was done in the course of or within the scope of employment, so that on failure of proof of the passenger relation no cause of action was stated. It is said in Raming v. Metropolitan Street Railway Co., 157 Mo. 477, 509, 57 S. W. 268, 273, cited by respondent:

"If plaintiff was not a passenger, then the defendant company could only become liable by reason of the fact that the alleged acts of the gripman were within the scope of his duties. * * * But there was no such allegation in the petition, and no evidence on the point. This being the case, no recovery could be had on such ground, absent such allegation and absent such evidence."

In the instant case, if the allegation of the passenger relation is eliminated, the complaint still states a good cause of action for damages for a wanton assault. It is alleged with great care that the "motorman, then and there acting in the course and within the scope of his said employment as such motorman, * * * negligently, wantonly, recklessly, and tortiously struck the said Lucian A. Galloway upon the head with said controller bar." This allegation is supported by the uncontradicted evidence that during the altercation between the conductor and the deceased on the rear platform of the car the conductor gave the motorman the emergency signal of three bells, and that the latter immediately brought the car to a stop. Having ascertained that the trouble was over, he started his car toward Twenty-Fourth street, when he again received the emergency signal and was told by passengers that something was wrong on the rear of the car, and that the conductor needed his assistance. Acting upon the signal given and urged by these passengers, he opened the front gate, and, taking the gate handle in his right hand, stepped out upon the street and ran to the rear of the car to give what assistance was needed to the conductor. When he arrived there both the deceased and his companion had left the car, while the conductor was still standing in his position on the rear platform.

[1, 2] From the facts in evidence the inference might well have been drawn that it was the purpose of the motorman to assist the conductor in ejecting from the car a passenger who had become boisterous and beyond control. In carrying out this purpose both the conductor and the motorman would have been acting within the scope of their employment, and so long as they did not use unreasonable or unnecessary force the company would have been free from liability for damage for the resulting injury. Wasserman v. L. A. Ry. Corporation (Sup.) 193 Pac. 130. Whether the motorman was acting within the scope of his employment was a question of fact for the jury to determine.

[3, 4] It was not a prerequisite to the right to recover that the passenger relation should be established. Appellant made out a prima facie case of injury resulting either from the negligence of the motorman within the scope of his employment or from the wrongful acts committed by him as agent for respondent in and as a part of the transaction of respondent's business. There was thus established a prima facie liability upon respondent within the rule of Otis Elevator Co. v. First National Bank, 163 Cal. 31, 39, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529, and Johnson v. Monson (Sup.) 190 Pac. 635. The burden was then placed upon the respondent to show that the act was not committed "in the transaction of the business of the agency" within the meaning of section 2338, Civil Code. Chamberlain v. Cal. Edison Co., 167 Cal. 500, 505, 506, 140 Pac. 25; Barmore v. Vicksburg, etc., Ry. Co., 85 Miss. 426, 38 South. 210, 70 L. R. A. 627, 3 Ann. Cas. 594; Cleveland v. Newsom, 45 Mich. 62, 7 N. W. 222.

The trial court at some stages of the proceedings took the view that there could be no recovery unless the injury resulted while plaintiff was a passenger on the car. This is shown by the modifications which were made in the instructions proposed by plaintiff and in the action of the trial court in denying a new trial "upon the sole ground that, while the death of the decedent was caused by the act of the defendant's motorman, the relation of passenger and carrier did not exist between the defendant and the decedent at the time said motorman inflicted upon the decedent the fatal blow."

[5, 6] Specific objection is made to the action of the trial court in modifying plaintiff's proposed instruction No. 6 by adding the words "while he was a passenger on the car." The instruction as modified, however, correctly stated the law as to one phase of the case. As the jury was thereby instructed that, if the injury occurred while the deceased was a passenger on the car through the negligence or reckless act of the motorman while acting in the course of his employment, then the employer was liable, it cannot be said that the instruction in itself was erroneous. Objection is also made to instruction No. 28, which reads:

"While it is the duty of a motorman and conductor of a street car to refrain from committing any wrongful assault upon persons riding upon said car as passengers, such duty ends when such persons cease to be passengers."

This instruction was clearly erroneous, as it is the duty of every one, whether he is a motorman on the street car or not, to refrain from committing any assault upon any person, whether such person be a passenger or not.

[7] Respondent, though not conceding any error in these instructions argues that, taking them all together, the instructions fully and fairly presented the issues to the jury. Reference is made particularly to the following instruction:

"If you find that before the car in question reached his destination the decedent, Galloway, and the conductor of said car became and were engaged in an affray on or near the rear of the car, and if you find that before or in the course of said affray the motorman of said car received the emergency bell, and if you find that the motorman was then informed of said affray, and thereupon, with the purpose and with the design of engaging in the affray and assisting the conductor, he stopped the car, and if you find that after stepping from the car he took in his hand the controller bar or gate bar of the car, and thereupon left his place in the front of the car and went to or near the rear of said car, in pursuance of his said purpose and design, and struck Galloway with the controller bar or gate bar a blow which caused his death, and if you further find that the affray in question at that time continued or threatened to continue, then the defendant is liable."

This instruction, so far as it went, presented the law of the case to the jury in so far as the liability of the defendant attached irrespective of the passenger relation.

[8] But the injury was done by those instructions which tied the liability of defendant to a showing of a passenger relation of the deceased from which the jury must necessarily have drawn the conclusion that the trial court entertained the view that without such a showing plaintiff could not recover.

Other and equally prejudicial instructions were those numbered 30 and 31. No. 30 reads in part as follows:

"Before you can render a verdict against the defendant, the evidence must satisfy your minds to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of the whole evidence: * * * Second, that in committing such act the motorman was acting within the scope of his employment by the defendant. * * *"

No. 31 used similar language relating to the proof necessary to show that the blow was the proximate cause of the death of the deceased, the court saying:

"If, therefore, the evidence upon this point is equally balanced or if it does not satisfy your minds to a moral certainty and by a preponderance, * * * your verdict must be in favor of the defendant."

[9] It was not incumbent upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury to a moral certainty and by a preponderance of evidence that the motorman was acting within the scope of his employment when he struck the fatal blow or that the blow was the proximate cause of the death of deceased. Sufficient evidence had been produced by plaintiff to warrant the inference that the motorman was so acting within the scope of his employment when the fatal blow was struck, and the burden of proving that he was not so acting was cast upon the defendant. To instruct the jury, therefore, that the evidence must satisfy their minds to a moral certainty and by a preponderance was error, as it clearly required satisfaction beyond a reasonable doubt, which is not necessary in a case of this nature. People v. Miller, 171 Cal. 649, 651, 154 Pac. 468; People v. Preciado, 31 Cal. App. 519, 525, 160 Pac. 1090; Boa v. S. F. Oakland Terminal Railways (Sup.) 187 Pac. 2.

The rule as to the measure of proof required in civil cases as distinguished from the measure required in criminal cases is ably discussed in Cooper v. Spring Valley Water Co., 16 Cal. App. 17, 116 Pac. 298. That was an action for conversion of corporate stock where the plaintiff alleged and endeavored to prove that the certificates of stock had been stolen from his testator by one who transferred it to a bank, and that the water company over plaintiff's protest had transferred the stock on its books. The trial court instructed the jury:

That "plaintiff must produce satisfactory evidence" to establish the theft of the stock; that "suspicion will not warrant a verdict of theft; it must be established by such positive proof of actual theft or circumstances as to preclude any other inference so as to convince the mind of a reasonable man. Innocence is always presumed, and the presumption cannot be overcome except by satisfactory proof to the contrary." 16 Cal. App. 21, 116 Pac. 300.

In reversing the case, Mr. Justice Lennon, after quoting from subdivision 5 of section 2061, Code of Civil Procedure, providing that "in civil cases the affirmative * * * must be proved, and when the evidence is contradictory the decision must be made according to the preponderance of evidence," said:

"In other words, 'the result should follow the preponderance of the evidence' (2 Wharton on Criminal Evidence, 1246), and this rule applies to all civil cases alike, even though the theory of the case involves, as it does here, an accusation of felony."

And again (16 Cal. App. 22, 116 Pac. 301):

"The reason for the rule limiting the burden of a plaintiff's proof in such cases to a preponderance of evidence is founded largely 'in the importance of preserving the distinction between civil and criminal cases with the growth of the criminal law. Almost every tortious act is by statute made indictable if done willfully or maliciously; and the courts should be reluctant to adopt, in civil cases, the rules peculiar to criminal law, lest wrongdoers be enabled to avoid civil liability, as well as escape criminal responsibility, under cover of the rules of criminal prosecution, the object of which is punishment only.' Kane v. Hibernia Ins. Co., 39 N. J. L. 697, 23 Am. Rep. 239."

The rule of the Cooper case is supported by a long line of authorities such as New York & Brooklyn Ferry Co. v. Moore, 102 N. Y. 667, 6 N. E. 293; United States Exp. Co. v. Jenkins, 73 Wis. 471, 41 N. W. 957; State ex rel. Detroit, etc., Ins. Co. v. Ellison, 268 Mo. 239, 187 S. W. 23; Brothers v. Horne, 140 Ga. 617, 79 S. E. 468; Brinser v. Fid. Tr. Co., 1 Boyce (Del.) 220, 75 Atl. 792; and many others which might be cited. Its application to the present case is that the complaint alleged that the motorman, while acting in the course and within the scope of his employment, wantonly, recklessly, and tortiously struck the fatal blow. The effect of these allegations is to charge the liability of defendant to the criminal acts of its motorman amounting to manslaughter as well as assault with a deadly weapon. In such a case the above rule as to the measure of proof required should control. As such a crime could be proved for the purposes of this case by a mere preponderance of the evidence, the jury might well have drawn the inference that the act was committed within the scope of the motorman's employment. To require the plaintiff to prove that fact by satisfying the minds of the jury to a moral certainty imposed upon the plaintiff a burden greater than the law required.

[10] Respondent's only defense of these instructions is that they were cured by the further instruction that preponderance was all that was required, that the error was invited by plaintiff's requested instructions, and that they were nonprejudicial. It is true that in instruction No. 30 the court concluded with the words:

"If any one of these facts has not been proved by a preponderance of the evidence, your verdict must be in favor of the United Railroads."

But this language clearly does not remove the harm done by the first portion of the instruction, which advised the jury that both satisfaction to a moral certainty and by a preponderance was necessary. Then in instruction No. 31 no attempt was made to cure the error.

[11] The statement that the error was invited by plaintiff is not supported by the record. In instruction No 4, requested by plaintiff, the expression "moral certainty" was used in this way:

"Moral certainty only is required of plaintiff. Moral certainty is defined as that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind."

However, this language was followed immediately by the admonition that—

"The rule which applies in criminal cases that the guilt of the defendant must be established beyond a reasonable doubt has no application to this case. In other words, the plaintiff is not required to establish her case by more than a preponderance of the evidence. If, after weighing all the evidence in the case, the minds of the jurors shall be satisfied that the scales tip by ever so little in favor of the plaintiff, then the plaintiff has sustained her burden of proof and has established her case by a preponderance of the evidence."

The court adopted that portion of the proposed instruction referring to moral certainty, but the language last quoted was stricken out and was not given to the jury in any other form. Instructions numbered 30 and 31 were given on the request of defendant.

[12] That prejudice resulted from this error cannot be doubted. The court did not define what was meant by a preponderance of the evidence and did not at any time advise the jury that a preponderance of the evidence alone would be sufficient to justify a finding in favor of the party having the burden of proof. As that phase of the case most strongly relied upon by appellant depended upon the question whether the fatal blow had been struck by the motorman while acting within the scope of his employment, and as the burden of proving that he was not so acting had been cast upon the respondent, the instructions complained of were clearly prejudicial to appellant's case. "In such case it is impossible to determine which of the conflicting rules presented to them was followed by the jury, and the error in any of the instructions must be deemed prejudicial." Rathbun v. White, 157 Cal. 248, 253, 107 Pac. 309, 311.

The judgment is reversed.

In re SIELCKEN.

SIELCKEN v. GARVAN, Alien Property Custodian.

(Civ. No. 3804.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 24, 1921. Rehearing Denied March 25, 1921.)

1. Records ⇐17(8)—Judgment restoring records under statute held appealable.

An appeal will lie from a judgment granting an application for restoration of court records under St. 1906, p. 73, although no provision for an appeal is embraced in the statute.

2. Appeal and error ⇐870(3)—Right to appeal not questionable in absence of appeal from order making appellant a party.

Court in proceeding under St. 1906, p. 73, to have naturalization records restored, having by an order made the Alien Property Custodian of the United States a party, and no appeal having been taken from such order, it cannot be claimed on appeal that such Alien Property Custodian had no interest in the result of the proceeding and was not entitled to take and prosecute an appeal.

3. Trial ⇐105(2)—Hearsay evidence admitted without objection may be considered.

When hearsay evidence has been admitted in the trial court without objection, the trial court and also the appellate court may properly consider the same in order to determine whether the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain findings and a judgment or order of the trial court.

4. Aliens ⇐69—Records ⇐17(7)—Evidence sustaining finding of naturalization in proceeding to restore record thereof.

In a proceeding under St. 1906, p. 73, to restore an alleged record of naturalization of the petitioner's deceased husband, evidence held sufficient to support a finding of the trial court that decedent had been naturalized, and that there was a record thereof which had been destroyed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

In the matter of the naturalization of August Hermann Sielcken, also commonly known as Hermann Sielcken. Petition by Clara Sielcken, as widow of August Hermann Sielcken, praying for an order restoring the records of the district court of the Fourth judicial district in the matter. Francis P. Garvan, as Alien Property Custodian of the United States, intervened. From a decree restoring the record of naturalization, the intervener appeals. Affirmed.

Knight, Boland, Hutchinson & Christin, of San Francisco, for appellant.

John Francis Neylan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This proceeding was instituted by the petition of one Clara Sielcken, as the widow of one August Hermann Sielcken, directed to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, praying for an order restoring the records of the district court of the Fourth judicial district of the state of California in the matter of the naturalization of said August Hermann Sielcken, alleged in her amended petition to have occurred in said court. The jurisdiction of said superior court to entertain said petition arises out of the fact that it became the successor of the jurisdiction and custodian of the records of said former district court under the provisions of the Constitution creating said superior court and of the statutes expressly providing for such succession. St. 1880, p. 23. The proceeding itself was instituted under and in accordance with the provisions of section 2 of an act of the Legislature approved June 16, 1906, entitled "An act relating to the restoration of court records which have been lost, injured or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity." Stats. 1906, p. 73. The petitioner's application was filed in said superior court on October 20, 1920, and came on for hearing on October 23d of that year. At the inception of said hearing no person appeared to oppose said petition, and thereupon considerable evidence was presented to the court in support thereof without objection; but at a later session of said court held on November 3, 1920, one Francis P. Garvan, Alien Property Custodian of the United States, appeared, alleging that as such official he had an interest in the determination of said matter, and he therefore at said time presented a complaint in intervention and asked leave to file the same. The further hearing of the matter was then continued until December 1, 1920, at which time the respective parties appeared, the petitioner to object to the filing of said complaint in intervention upon the ground that the said complainant as such official was not a party in interest in said proceeding, and the said complainant in intervention to move to strike out all of the evidence theretofore presented by the petitioner upon the ground that the petition did not state facts sufficient to entitle the applicant to the relief prayed for. In making said motion the complainant in intervention expressly disclaimed making any objection to the competency of the evidence thus far presented, or to the fact that it was in a large measure hearsay. The petitioner at this point amended her original petition in certain respects, and thereupon the court took under advisement both matters. The hearing then proceeded with the further submission of evidence both in support of the original and amended petition and in opposition thereto, to none of which evidence was any objection urged upon the ground of competency; and, the cause having been submitted to the court for decision, it made an order permitting the complaint in intervention to be filed, and also made a further order denying the motion of the complainant to strike out the testimony on behalf of said petitioner, and thereupon made and entered its judgment granting the prayer of the petitioner for the desired relief. From such last-named judgment the complainant in intervention prosecutes this appeal.

[1] The first question presented upon this appeal is as to whether a right of appeal exists in a proceeding of this character. It is conceded that this is a special proceeding, and that it is one in which no provision for an appeal is embraced in the statute which provides for such proceeding. Notwithstanding this fact, we are of the opinion that the existence of a right of appeal in proceedings of this character has been conclusively determined, so far as this court is concerned, by the decision of the Supreme Court in the recent case of Application of Herman, 191 Pac. 934.

[2] The next question presented for discussion is as to whether, conceding that a right of appeals exists, the appellant, as the Alien Property Custodian of the United States, has such an interest in the result of this proceeding as to entitle him to take and prosecute such an appeal. We are of the opinion that this question has been determined, in so far as this court is concerned, by the action and order of the trial court in permitting the appellant to file and present proofs in support of his complaint in intervention. Having been thus made a party to the record in this proceeding by an order of the trial court from which no appeal has been taken, we think the appellant has acquired sufficient standing thereby to permit the prosecution by him of this appeal, particularly in view of the fact that throughout the entire record herein it is made apparent that the purpose of the petitioner in seeking to have the lost record of her deceased husband's admission to citizenship restored is in furtherance of her prior and continuing effort to wrest from the custody of the Alien Property Custodian of the United States that portion of the estate of her deceased husband which was taken over during the recent war by said official upon the theory that her said husband was an alien enemy.

This brings us to the only remaining question before this court for its determination upon this appeal. That question is whether there was sufficient evidence presented to the trial court to sustain its order granting the relief prayed for by the petitioner under the provisions of section 2 of the act of the Legislature approved June 16, 1906, relating to the restoration of court records lost, injured, or destroyed by conflagration or other public calamity.

It is conceded that the records of the district court of the state of California in and for the Fourth judicial district were destroyed in the conflagration of 1906, but it is contended by the appellant that there is no evidence in the record before us sufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court that there ever existed in the records and files of said court a record of a judicial proceeding wherein August Hermann Sielcken was made a naturalized citizen of the United States. Before entering upon the inquiry as to just what the record herein does contain touching more or less closely the question before us, it may be well to refer briefly to the statute which authorizes such proceeding. There are two sections in this statute relating to the restoration of lost or destroyed judicial records. By the first of these the record may be restored by the simple process of presenting to the court a duly certified copy of the original record. In the second section of the act, however, it was apparently realized by the lawmakers sitting in extra session within a brief space of time after the great conflagration of 1906 that cases might arise wherein it would be impossible to procure either certified copies of the original proceedings or any exact evidence as to what the original record did actually contain; and in the presence of such a possibility section 2 of said statute was enacted, permitting parties seeking the restoration of lost judicial records to present such competent evidence as they might be able to produce as to the substance or effect of the lost or destroyed judgment or order. This is such a case. It has relation to the judicial record of the naturalization of an individual occurring nearly 50 years ago, the individual himself being deceased, and, in all human probability, each and all of those who participated in the original proceeding as judge, clerk, witnesses, and spectators having likewise gone the way of all the earth. It is in the light of the situation which is thus presented that we approach a consideration of the evidence in the instant case.

[3] In so doing it is to be noted that the appellant has expressly waived any objection which he might have urged at the hearing in the trial court to the competency of any and all of the evidence produced on behalf of the petitioner, and to the fact that much of said evidence was hearsay. When evidence of this character has been admitted in the trial court without objection, it and also this court upon appeal may properly consider the same in order to determine whether the evidence as a whole is sufficient to sustain findings and a judgment or order of the trial court in the petitioner's favor. Smith v. Golden State Syndicate et al., 185 Pac. 209.

Having thus determined, we take up the entire record before us for the purpose of discovering and properly weighing what it may contain touching the matter of the date and place of the naturalization of August Hermann Sielcken. There are certain unquestioned facts which stand forth upon the threshold of this record having an important bearing upon the weight and effect of certain other proffered evidence. This initial evidence has reference to the character of the deceased August Hermann Sielcken and to his lifelong conduct touching the matter of American citizenship. The record teems with proof that August Hermann Sielcken, commonly known as Hermann Sielcken, was a man of the highest personal character and of a capacity approaching genius in the conduct of large, diversified, and widely extended business affairs. He came to the state of California a poor foreigner, almost an exile, from Hamburg, Germany, the place of his birth. He died in Baden Baden in 1917. Between these two dates he rose from a position of obscurity and poverty to be a merchant of international reputation, a several times millionaire, and a man of affairs, whose reputation for personal and business integrity extended to three continents. From a time dating back to the period of his early residence in California Hermann Sielcken began to deport himself as and to declare himself to be a naturalized citizen of the United States, and from that early date up to the hour of his death he consistently claimed and acted as a naturalized American citizen. He voted in national and local elections as such citizen while residing in the city of New York. He served upon juries for which citizenship was a prerequisite. He acted as a director of numerous corporations to which citizenship was an essential qualification. He traveled widely upon permits issued to him upon his declaration of his American citizenship. He was at his marriage and in the official records of each alliance certified to the fact that he was a citizen of the United States. He repeatedly asserted among his former friends and acquaintances, at home and abroad, that he was a naturalized American citizen. He was, in fact, very proud of his citizenship, even when a resident in Germany during the closing years of his life and when it would have been to his interest to have declared himself a citizen and subject of Germany. He acquired an extensive estate in Baden Baden, and, after having done so, being offered a title of nobility by the duchy of Baden, conditioned upon his becoming a German citizen, he refused such title upon the ground that he possessed a higher title of nobility in the fact of his American citizenship. Over the portals of his home in Baden Baden he constantly kept displayed the American flag, while he adorned its halls with portraits of American presidents and other distinguished citizens of the United States. Being in Germany at the time of the outbreak of the great war, and being detained there against his desires to return to America, he steadfastly and courageously maintained that he was an American citizen, and frequently caused his assertion in that regard to be entered in the official records of the German Empire. Upon the declaration of war between the United States and Germany he was listed by the latter as an alien enemy of Germany and as an American citizen, and his property in Germany was ordered seized by the German Alien Property Custodian. In the year 1910 he was called as a witness before a congressional committee at Washington, D. C., and there testified under oath to the fact that he was a citizen of the United States and had been so for 30 years. In addition to such sworn declaration, he frequently declared to numerous persons that he had been naturalized while living in California, but that he had lost his naturalization papers in the wreck of the steamer Parana off the coast of Brazil in the year 1877. In a word, there is not a scrap of evidence coming from his lips or pen in contradiction of this consistent course of conduct, oral statement, and recorded evidence tending to show that during the entire period of his life, from a time shortly after his arrival in California, Hermann Sielcken constantly and consistently acted as and asserted and believed himself to be a naturalized American citizen, and conducted himself uniformly as such in all the manifold relations of his active, extensive, and distinguished business career. From these evidences the inference is irresistible that Hermann Sielcken was in fact a naturalized American citizen, and that he had been such from early in the period of his residence in the United States and while he was living within the state of California.

This brings us to the question as to when and where and by the action and order of what tribunal Hermann Sielcken was made an American citizen by the process of naturalization. The fact is undisputed that he first entered the United States in the year 1869, being at that time 19 years of age, and arriving in California from Costa Rica, and that for the first two or three years thereafter he engaged in the business of traveling wool buyer through various portions of California. During this period he entered the employ of R. Feuerstein & Co., being a firm of wool buyers having their headquarters in San Francisco, and, according to his own statement, was required by said firm to become an American citizen as a condition of his remaining in their employ. He further states in writing, though not under oath, that he accordingly made an application for naturalization to the courts of either Mendocino or Sonoma county. This statement has reference evidently to his intention papers, which he would have been entitled to take out after a two-year residence in California and which, in accordance with the expressed wish of his employers, he would have executed during those early years and while traveling upon their business in those portions of the state. However, he took up his settled residence in California in about the year 1873, according to the San Francisco directory of that year, and kept such residence until some time in the year 1875, when he went East for the first time, to accept employment in the firm of importers of which he afterwards became and continued up to his death in 1917 to be a leading member. It was during this period of fixed abode in San Francisco that he would have arrived at his majority and would also have completed his five-year term of residence in the United States which would for the first time have entitled him to take out his final naturalization papers and receive from the court his order and certificate of naturalization. The record shows that he frequently thereafter asserted, both orally and in writing, that he was possessed of these naturalization papers, and that he lost the same in the wreck of the steamer Parana off the coast of Brazil in the year 1877. Notwithstanding the loss of these papers, he constantly and consistently thereafter, as we have seen, declared himself to be and conducted himself as an American citizen in all the affairs and relations of his business, social and personal life.

[4] From these undisputed facts, with which the record may fairly be said to be filled, but one reasonable and natural inference can be drawn, which is that August Hermann Sielcken was naturalized during the year 1874 or 1875 while residing in the city of San Francisco, and by the action of a court of record in said city having jurisdition to confer naturalization upon him. The statutes of the United States during that period required that persons seeking naturalization should make their final application therefor in the district in which they resided. The inference as thus fortified is aided by evidence of a fruitless examination of the records of Mendocino and Sonoma counties for the purpose of discovering a record of the first or final naturalization papers of Sielcken if such ever existed there, and is also aided by the report of one Becker, showing a like fruitless investigation of the records of the federal District Court of this district relating to naturalization. The district court of the state of California in and for the judicial district which embraced the city and county of San Francisco was the state court of record, which was invested by act of Congress with jurisdiction over the subject of naturalization. The trial court, by a rational process of elimination, and after a careful consideration of all of the evidence which this record contains, drew the inference and reached the conclusion that Hermann Sielcken had taken out his final naturalization papers in that court, and hence that a record thereof existed therein prior to the 18th day of April, 1906, which record, being destroyed by the conflagration of that day and year, might be restored as to its substance and effect under section 2 of the act of June 16, 1906, relating to the restoration of lost or destroyed judicial records. We are unable to say that the inference thus deduced and the order thus made are not sufficiently supported by the evidence in the case.

It follows that the judgment of the trial court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

GARVAN, Alien Property Custodian, v. FLOOD, Superior Court Judge.
(Civ. 3802.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. Feb. 24, 1921.)

Application by Francis P. Garvan, as Alien Property Custodian of the United States, for certiorari to review a decree of the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco, Bernard J. Flood, Judge, restoring a record of naturalization. Dismissed.

JAYNES v. WEICKMAN et al.
(Civ. No. 3454.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 8, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜488(2)—Appeal does not stay preventive or prohibitory injunction.

An appeal does not stay the operation of a preventive or prohibitory injunction.

2. Appeal and error ⊜488(2)—Appeal stays mandatory injunction.

An appeal stays the operation of a mandatory injunction.

3. Appeal and error ⊜488(2) — Order restraining continuance of condition not necessarily mandatory injunction stayed by appeal.

An order or decree restraining the further continuance of an existing condition does not take on the character of a mandatory injunction stayed by an appeal merely because it enjoins defendants from continuing to do the forbidden acts, as an injunction that restrains the continuance of an act or series of acts may be just as much a protective or prohibitory injunction as one that restrains the commission of an act.

4. Appeal and error ⊜488(2)—Order inhibiting defendants from continuing business under trade-name not mandatory to be stayed by appeal.

An injunction inhibiting defendants from carrying on their business of truckmen under a proscribed trade-name, necessarily requiring that they remove the forbidden trade name or names from their trucks, from the entrance to their place of business, etc., is not a mandatory injunction stayed by appeal, but a preventive or prohibitory injunction not stayed; injunction prohibiting the infringement of a right adjudged to belong to plaintiff not being mandatory merely because defendant may incidentally be compelled to perform some act.

Action by Maud E. Jaynes against Charles C. Weickman and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal and apply for supersedeas pending appeal to prevent punishment for contempt for violation of injunction. Order to show cause discharged.

A. G. Reily, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Collier & Labarere and Walter H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. The appellants in this case have asked this court to grant a supersedeas pending their appeal from the judgment. Pending the appeal, the superior court undertook to punish appellants for contempt of court. The alleged contempt consisted of appellants' continued use of a certain trade-name in violation of the terms of an injunction embodied in the judgment from which the appeal was taken. Appellants filed a petition for a writ of prohibition, but this court, being of the opinion that supersedeas, rather than prohibition, is the writ applicable to the case, made an order to show cause why the writ of supersedeas should not issue.

The facts pertinent to the inquiry, as disclosed by the judgment roll, briefly are these: For some time prior to the commencement of the action plaintiff, the respondent on the appeal, had conducted, under the trade-name "the Active Transfer Company," the business of transferring, for hire, baggage and luggage from place to place in the city of Los Angeles. The appealing defendants—that is, the defendants other than the telephone company—since some time prior to the action, have been engaged in a similar business in the same city, using in that business the trade-name "the Action Transfer Company." That name and other similar descriptive trade-names were displayed upon the trucks, stationery, and place of business of the appealing defendants, and likewise in certain display advertisements in the telephone directory of the defendant Southern California Telephone Company; that company having issued its latest telephone directory shortly prior to the entry of the judgment in the action. The superior court found that the trade-name adopted and used by the appealing defendants was calculated and intended to and did deceive the patrons of plaintiff and the public in general, and that its use by those defendants had damaged plaintiff's business.

The judgment adjudges and decrees, in substance and effect, that the appealing defendants be perpetually enjoined from advertising and carrying on their business as "the Action Transfer Company," and from using the words "Action Transfer Company" in any manner whatsoever. The judgment likewise decrees that the defendant Southern California Telephone Company change the telephone number that is listed in its telephone directory in connection with the name "the Action Transfer Company." The telephone company has not appealed from the judgment. Since the appealing defendants, the defendants who are asking for the writ of supersedeas, are not directed to change the number in the telephone directory, that injunctive part of the decree being directed solely to the telephone company, and since, therefore, the appealing defendants cannot properly be proceeded against for contempt by reason of any failure of the telephone company to comply with this part of the judgment, it will not be necessary to consider whether a writ of supersedeas should issue to stay proceedings thereon. It will be time enough to consider that question when, if ever, the superior court, by contempt proceedings initiated against the telephone company, shall attempt to enforce obedience to this particular part of the decree.

In the contempt proceedings initiated subsequently to the date when the appealing defendants took their appeal from the judgment and filed the $300 undertaking in due form, it was made to appear to the superior court, by affidavit, that each of the defendants by whom the appeal has been taken, subsequent to the receipt of notice of entry of the judgment, continued to allow the name "Action Transfer Company" to remain on the trucks and vehicles owned and driven by them, that their place of business is still conducted under the trade-name that they always have used, that of "the Action Transfer Company," and that they are carrying on their business without having made any change in their advertisement signs.

The motion for the writ of supersedeas is based upon the claim that those parts of the decree that, in effect, enjoin the appealing defendants from continuing to carry on their business under the name "the Action Transfer Company" were stayed by the appeal from the judgment. This claim is based upon that provision of section 949 of the Code of Civil Procedure whereby it is declared that in cases not provided for in sections 942 to 945, inclusive—and this is not one of them—the perfecting of an appeal by giving the $300 undertaking "stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from."

[1, 2] It is well settled, indeed conceded, that an appeal does not stay the operation of a preventive or prohibitory injunction. Merced Min. Co. v. Fremont, 7 Cal. 130; Heinlen v. Cross, 63 Cal. 44. Equally well settled is it that an appeal does stay the operation of a mandatory injunction; i. e., one that compels affirmative action. Schwartz v. Superior Court, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580; Clute v. Superior Court, 155 Cal. 15, 99 Pac. 362, 132 Am. St. Rep. 54. The reason for this distinction is found in the inherent nature of an order or decree which merely prohibits or restrains affirmative action. A stay of proceedings from its nature operates only on orders and decrees commanding some acts to be done; for the appeal operates only as a stay of any proceedings that may be had or taken upon the order or decree appealed from—i. e., proceedings to enforce the order or decree. A prohibitive injunction requires no execution for its enforcement. It acts "directly without process upon the defendant." Heinlen v. Cross, supra; Wolf v. Gall, 174 Cal. 140, 162 Pac. 115. The effect of a supersedeas is to restrain the respondent from taking affirmative action to enforce his decree; it does not authorize the appellant to do what the decree prohibits him from doing. The only effect of an appeal, when perfected, is to stay execution of, i. e., "proceedings upon," the judgment; and if the judgment acts directly upon the defendant without the necessity for any writ of execution or other proceeding for its enforcement, the appeal does not stay its operation.

[3] The injunctive features of the decree under consideration here enjoin the appealing defendants from continuing to do certain things. An order or decree restraining the further continuance of an existing condition does not take on the character of a mandatory injunction merely because it enjoins the defendants from continuing to do the forbidden act. An injunction that restrains the continuance of an act or series of acts may be just as much a preventive or prohibitory injunction as one that restrains the commission of an act. State v. Superior Court, 39 Wash. 115, 80 Pac. 1108, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 554, 109 Am. St. Rep. 867, 4 Ann. Cas. 229; United Railroads v. Superior Court, 172 Cal. 85–87, 155 Pac. 463, and cases there cited.

[4] Appellants, contrary to the injunctive inhibitions, are continuing to carry on their business under the proscribed trade-name. They are not enjoined from engaging in the transfer business in the city of Los Angeles or elsewhere. What they are enjoined from doing is to use in their business the interdicted trade-name. It is true that, in order to carry on their business in a manner conformable to the injunctive features of the judgment, they must remove the forbidden trade-name or names from their trucks, from the entrance to their place of business, and from their display advertising signs; and it also is true that these are affirmative acts. But the affirmative acts necessary to be done by defendants in order to continue the transaction of their business without disobeying the injunctive features of the judgment are but acts that are necessary to effectuate the principal purpose of the injunction, which is to forbid further infringement upon plaintiff's right to the exclusive use of the business name that she had adopted before the defendants entered the field of competition. The injunctive parts of the decree, therefore, only incidentally involve the doing of any affirmative act. And not only are the affirmative acts but incidental to the accomplishment of the principal purpose of the injunction; they are acts each one of which is within the power of the defendants lawfully to perform. This feature alone is sufficient to differentiate this from the Schwartz Case, 111 Cal. 106, 43 Pac. 580, so much relied on by these appellants in their application for the writ of supersedeas.

According to all the definitions, the injunction embodied in the decree is preventive or prohibitive. An injunction which prohibits the infringement of a right adjudged to belong to the plaintiff is not mandatory merely because the defendant may incidentally be compelled to perform some act; and the courts, as said by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the United Railroads Case, 172 Cal. 88, 155 Pac. 463, "have been swift in holding that the character of a prohibitive injunction was not transformed and made mandatory because it incidentally involved the doing of an affirmative act." The same learned jurist also says in that case that "the court will not destroy the relief granted by any excessive astuteness in selecting some minor mandatory feature of the injunction and holding that that should control the consideration of the nature of the relief awarded."

In Georgia the granting of a mandatory injunction is prohibited by statute. In Merchants' & Miners' Transp. Co. v. Granger, etc., 132 Ga. 167, 63 S. E. 700, the injunction restrained the defendant "from refusing to receive and carry the lumber of the plaintiff in the order in which it is duly tendered for shipment." It was contended that this was not a preventive injunction, but was strictly mandatory in character, since its effect was to compel the defendants to do the affirmative act of taking and receiving and shipping the lumber. The Supreme Court of Georgia declared:

"While under the Code * * * an injunction will not issue to compel a person to perform an act, yet the court may grant an order the essential feature of which is to restrain, although in yielding obedience to the restraint the defendant may incidentally be compelled to perform some act."

The same principle is announced in Falcon v. Boyer, 157 Iowa, 745, 142 N. W. 427, in the following language:

"While an injunction is issued primarily to restrain, and not to compel, an act, defendant may be required to do some affirmative act necessary to effectuate the principal purpose of the order."

In Fairfield Floral Co. v. Bradbury (C. C.) 87 Fed. 415, the postmaster had changed the usual course of business of his office. An injunction was sought to prevent the continuance of such interruption. It was argued that the injunction would be mandatory because it would compel the postmaster to do things other than those he was performing. The Circuit Court disposed of the contention in the single sentence:

"If, incidentally, this would compel the postmaster to perform some minor things which, in the ordinary course of business, he would perform, this would not render it a mandatory injunction."

What essentially are the features of the injunction embodied in the judgment in this case? The defendants are not compelled to surrender their business. They retain their business, and every lawful right to carry it on in the usual and customary manner. They are, however, forbidden to do that which the court below determined to be illegal and improper, namely, to use certain business names in the conduct of their business. If we take the injunctive words of this judgment in their ordinary sense, it is difficult to see that any affirmative action is required of these appealing defendants except that, in yielding obedience to the restraint they may incidentally be compelled to perform some acts. The judgment, in substance, merely prohibits the appealing defendants from carrying on their business as the Action Transfer Company. The fact that they had for some time been enjoying their asserted right to use that business name does not change the character of the injunction. If this were not so, almost any injunction against the doing of repeated acts would be mandatory if the performance of the acts had been begun and carried on for any considerable time prior to the commencement of the action. For example, an injunction against the continued operation of a cement plant to the injury of plaintiff's adjacent orange grove (Hulbert v. California Portland Cement Co., 161 Cal. 239, 118 Pac. 928, 38 L. R. A. [N. S.] 436), or against the operation of a ferry claimed to have been conducted in infringement of the plaintiff's franchise rights (Vallejo Ferry Co. v. Solano Aquatic Club, 165 Cal. 255, 131 Pac. 864, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 1197), or one restraining a smelting company from permitting fumes from its works to blow over and upon neighboring lands (People v. Selby Smelting & L. Co., 163 Cal. 84, 124 Pac. 692, 124 Pac. 1135, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 1267), could be regarded as mandatory. But, although in each of the cases just referred to the plaintiff's right to an injunction was bitterly contested, it does not appear to have occurred to the learned counsel representing the various defendants that the injunctions were mandatory, and that their effect could, for this reason, be stayed pending appeal.

The applicants for the writ of supersedeas tell us that the writ is necessary to preserve their status quo and to avoid the consequences of a mere "barren victory" should they be successful on their appeal from the judgment. But, to quote again from the opinion of Mr. Justice Henshaw in the United Railroads Case:

"There is no magic in the phrase 'maintaining the status quo' which transforms an injunction essentially prohibitive into an injunction essentially mandatory."

Probably most injunctions, especially those granted pendente lite, are necessary to the protection, declaration, or establishment of some disputed property right; but the operative effect of a strictly prohibitive injunction is not for that reason stayed by an appeal. Wolf v. Gall, supra.

Sufficient, we think, has been said to show that in its essence the injunction embodied in the judgment in this case is prohibitive and restrains continued acts of infringement upon a right which the decree adjudges to be plaintiff's exclusive property, namely, the right of plaintiff to the exclusive use of the business name "the Active Transfer Company." The case seems to fall squarely within the ruling in Morton v. Morton, 148 Cal. 142, 82 Pac. 664, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 660, where it was held that an injunction restraining the defendant, his agents and employees, from holding himself out as the representative of the plaintiffs, and from wearing on his hat, while engaged in the business of soliciting the transfer of baggage and luggage, a badge with the word "Morton's" written thereon, or any word similar thereto, is not mandatory but prohibitive.

The order to show cause is discharged.

GREENEBAUM v. SMITH. (Civ. 3556.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1921.)

1. Shipping ⊂⊃58(3)—Measure of damages for total breach of contract by charterer of ship.

In actions against the charterer of a ship for a total breach of his contract, the measure of damages is the net amount which would have been earned by the vessel under the charter, less the net amount earned, or which might, with reasonable diligence have been earned, by the vessel during the time required for the performance of the voyage named in such contract of charter.

2. Attachment ⊂⊃5—Action for breach of charter contract held "action on contract for direct payment of money."

Where defendant charterer agreed to ship cargo, of which freight would be $30,000, and totally failed to do so, and ship sailed empty, an action by the owner for breach of the contract for damages in the amount of $28,000, $2,000 being the cost of loading and unloading such a cargo, is one for the breach of a contract for the direct payment of money, and an attachment may issue under Code Civ. Proc. § 537, the damages being easily ascertainable according to fixed standards supplied by the contract or the law acting upon it.

3. Attachment ⊂⊃2—Constitutional law ⊂⊃249—Statute, permitting attachment by certain persons, not unconstitutional as conferring special rights on a class.

Code Civ. Proc. § 537, giving the right to an attachment to plaintiff in an action for the direct payment of money by reason of a breach of contract, is not unconstitutional, in that it denies one of the parties to a contract the equal protection of the law, since it operates uniformly in favor of persons damaged by the breach of a contract to pay them money, not being deprived of such uniformity because the remedy is not given against breaches of a different character.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; F. J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Alfred Greenebaum against C. Henry Smith. From an order denying his motion to discharge attachment, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Andros & Hengstler and F. Eldred Boland, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Wm. Denman, of San Francisco (J. F. Resleure, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to discharge an attachment. The action is for breach of a charter party. At the commencement of the action the plaintiff had a writ of attachment, and caused its levy upon property of the defendant. The defendant moved to quash the writ and vacate the attachment, upon two grounds: First, that the action is not one within section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure, i. e., it is not for the direct payment of money; second, that if the case is within said section, then defendant is deprived of the equal protection of the laws, because, in like case, if plaintiff had breached the contract, the defendant could not have secured an attachment. The defendant supported his motion with an affidavit that he was at all times pertinent to the action a resident of the state of California. His motion was denied, and he takes this appeal from the court's order in that behalf.

The plaintiff was the owner of the schooner Bangor, and chartered the vessel to the defendant under a written contract, made and payable within the state of California, for a voyage from Sidney, New South Wales, to San Francisco. Under this contract defendant agreed to load a full and complete under-deck cargo of copra in bulk, and a full and complete deck cargo of vegetable oil in barrels or drums, or general merchandise, and agreed to pay $40 per ton on the under-deck cargo, and $25 per ton on the deck cargo. The Bangor could have carried 500 tons of the agreed cargo under deck and 400 tons on deck, so that, had the defendant provided the cargo agreed upon by him, he would have been required to pay in all the sum of $30,000. Defendant failed to provide such cargo, and the "Bangor" was compelled to sail empty from Sidney to San Francisco. This action was brought to recover $30,000 freight money, less the sum of $2,000 which plaintiff would have been obliged to pay for loading and discharging at the ports of Sidney and San Francisco respectively. The plaintiff accordingly fixed his damage at the sum of $28,000.

[1, 2] The measure of damages in this class of cases seems to be well settled. In actions against the charterer of a ship for a total breach of his contract, such measure is the net amount which would have been earned by the vessel under the charter, less the net amount earned, or which might with reasonable diligence have been earned, by the vessel during the time required for the performance of the voyage named in such contract of charter. Cornwall v. Moore (D. C.) 132 Fed. 868; Utter v. Chapman, 43 Cal. 279; 7 Cyc. 294. This being an action for damages for the breach of an executory contract, defendant contends that it cannot be held to be an action on a contract for the direct payment of money. True, this is not an action for a debt in a technical sense, nor for a certain sum of money specified in the contract, but it is nevertheless an action for the breach of a contract for the direct payment of money, and merely because the amount is uncertain, consisting of damages to be proven at the trial, is no reason why an attachment may not issue where, as here, such damages are easily ascertainable according to fixed standards supplied by the contract or the law acting upon it. Dunn v. Mackey, 80 Cal. 104, 22 Pac. 64; Flagg v. Dare, 107 Cal. 482, 40 Pac. 804; 6 Corp. Jur. 81. In the first mentioned of these cases defendant sold certain real property to the plaintiff, agreeing to sell the property for plaintiff within 12 months, and guaranteed to pay over a specified amount therefor. The complaint alleged defendant's failure and refusal to sell the property, and alleged the damages to be the difference between the sum agreed and the highest market value of the property since the expiration of the year. It was held that while the action was for damages for the breach of a contract, nevertheless, since they could be ascertained with sufficient certainty so that plaintiff could aver the amount due in his affidavit, the attachment should issue. The court said:

"Our Code does not require that the amount due on the contract shall appear from the contract itself (Code Civ. Proc. § 537), but that the amount of the indebtedness shall be shown by affidavit (Code Civ. Proc. § 538). Attachment may issue in an action for damages for breach of a contract. Donnelly v. Strueven, 63 Cal. 182. And this, where proof is necessary at the trial to show the amount of damages. Drake on Attachment, §§ 13, 23."

In the case of De Leonis v. Etchepare, 120 Cal. 407, 52 Pac. 718, the court approves of the reasoning in Dunn v. Mackey in the following language:

"Nor is it necessary, in order to give a right of attachment, that the amount in which the defendant may be liable should appear upon the face of the contract or instrument by or from which the liability is to be determined. It often happens that the amount due under a contract does not appear from the contract itself. 'Our Code does not require that the amount due on the contract shall appear from the contract itself' * * *"

—quoting from the opinion the language above set out, and resumes:

"But there must exist a basis upon which the damages can be determined by proof."

[3] It is argued by the appellant that for a breach by either of the parties to a contract of the character under consideration the correlative remedy is an action for damages, but in the event that the breach is by the defendant the valuable right of attachment is given to the plaintiff for the reason that the undertaking of the defendant is to pay money, whereas were the situation reversed the defendant could not avail himself of the right of attachment, since the breach of which he complains is the plaintiff's failure to transport freight (Willett & Burr v. Alpert, 181 Cal. 652, 185 Pac. 976); that therefore section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional in that it denies to one of the parties to a contract the equal protection of the law. We may concede that a statute would be unconstitutional in this respect which conferred special rights and remedies on one class which others in the same class could not avail themselves of. We think, however, that the statute under consideration is not of this character, since it operates uniformly in favor of persons damaged by the breach of a contract to pay them money. That the remedy is not given against breaches of a different character, though it might be logical in such cases to give it, does not, in our opinion, deprive it of the uniformity of application which the constitutional provision here invoked has in view.

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. THOMAS. (Cr. 929.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 14, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 12, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 12, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊜366(4), 1169(1)—Evidence held admissible to show deceased's condition and purpose of visit to physician accused of abortion, and harmless to defendant.

In a prosecution for homicide resulting from a criminal abortion performed by accused, evidence of a conversation with deceased, out of the presence of accused, in which deceased stated she had made an appointment with accused, a doctor, that he wanted to operate on her forthwith, but she had preferred to wait until a later day, that he was going to charge her $50, that deceased said she was going to telegraph for money, and that on the day preceding the operation deceased stated she had received the money, and testimony of two employees of a telegraph company showing deceased's telegraphing and receipt of the money as requested, was competent for the limited purpose of showing the condition of deceased and the purpose of her visit to accused, although some of such testimony was merely narrative of occurrences, and therefore not within the res gestæ rule, but its admission for such limited purpose, if error, was merely technical and without injury to accused.

2. Witnesses ⊜379(3)—Contradicting testimony held proper.

In trial for murder resulting from abortion, where a doctor who was called in by accused to examine deceased shortly before her death was called as a witness by accused, and testified, in effect, among other things, that it had not occurred to him upon such examination that an illegal operation had been performed, it was proper to rebut this testimony to allow a police detective to testify that in a statement to him this witness, referring to the case, said: "This was a dirty mess."

3. Criminal law ⊜419, 420(11), 1169(1)—Admission of evidence as to conversation covering no disputed fact held error, but without prejudice to accused.

In prosecution for murder from abortion, the admission of testimony of a witness, detailing conversation between her and the nurse or attendant in accused's office, was error, but was not prejudicial, as it covered no disputed fact in the case.

4. Criminal law ⊜706, 1170½(6)—Admission of contradictory statement later stricken out held not error.

In a prosecution for murder from abortion, where it appeared that a friend of deceased had made two written statements which were inconsistent with each other, the first shortly after the death of deceased, and at a time when the friend was disposed to protect accused from prosecution and the family of deceased from notoriety, and the first statement was introduced by accused for the purpose of discrediting the witness, the action of the court in admitting the witness' second statement on redirect examination and later on motion striking it out was not error prejudicial to accused, nor did the conduct of the prosecuting attorney in this behalf constitute misconduct.

5. Criminal law ⊜1169(11)—Admission of evidence giving rise to inference of prior offense not reversible error, in view of convincing evidence of guilt.

In prosecution for murder from abortion, the admission of testimony of a detective concerning a conversation with accused, who said, in reply to a question why he displayed no physician's sign, "I haven't had any signs on my office since I got into trouble at the time I was on T. street," even if the testimony was inadmissible as affording the jury ground for inferring that accused had been charged with a prior and separate offense, and inadmissible to prove intent in this class of cases, was not reversible error, in view of the convincing character of the remaining evidence of accused's guilt.

6. Criminal law ⊜1186(4)—Misconduct of prosecution in asking objectionable questions held not reversible error.

In prosecution for murder from abortion, misconduct of the prosecuting officers in cross-examining accused as to whether or not he was accustomed to have patients like the deceased, whether he had any similar patients at his home before when miscarriage had taken place, which questions were answered in the negative, and asking him if he knew Myrtle D. or Myrtle H., which question after argument was withdrawn, and upon the cross-examination of a witness for accused asking him, for the purpose of showing his friendship for accused, if he was not on accused's bond, which question was not objected to and was answered affirmatively, upon which the witness was asked if he had not been upon accused's bond on several occasions, which question was in effect withdrawn and not answered, was not, under Const. art. 6, § 4½, reversible error, in view of the convincing character of the evidence of accused's guilt.

7. Homicide ⊜254—Evidence held to support conviction of murder resulting from abortion.

In prosecution for murder from abortion, evidence held to support conviction of murder in second degree.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Frank Thomas was convicted of murder in the second degree, and from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for new trial he appeals. Affirmed.

Leo Kaufmann and J. Mueller, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was convicted of murder in the second degree. This appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

The theory of the prosecution was that the homicide was the result of a criminal abortion performed by the defendant, who was a licensed physician. He had a fully equipped office, which was in his home on Franklin street, in San Francisco. Rose M. White, the deceased, was a young woman about 19 years of age, in good physical health. On Wednesday, November 20, 1919, she communicated to her intimate friend, Mrs. Blanch E. Clarke, that she was pregnant, mentioned the name of a man who, she said was responsible for her trouble. She also stated that she had been given the name of a doctor who would relieve her of her condition, and that she intended to make an appointment with him. Later that day she gave the doctor's name as Thomas, and informed her friend that the operation would cost her $50; also that the doctor desired to operate at once, but that she had put it off until the following Friday. Mrs. Clarke suggested to her friend that she should telegraph to the man whose name she had given, informing him of her condition and asking for assistance. To this Miss White demurred, but later informed Mrs. Clarke that she had followed her suggestion, and the records of the Western Union Telegraph Company which were introduced in evidence show that she did in fact telegraph to the person in question asking for $40, and that he sent her the money. On Thursday night Miss White remained with Mrs. Clarke, and the next morning, on leaving to keep her appointment with the defendant, requested Mrs. Clarke to communicate with her by telephone in case she did not hear from her by noontime, at the same time giving to Mrs. Clarke a paper on which was written a telephone number and also a street address, which was the telephone number and street address of the defendant. At the time indicated Mrs. Clarke called up the number; the call being answered by a woman, Mrs. Goffoller, the nurse or assistant of the defendant, who, in reply to Mrs. Clarke's inquiry after Miss White, said she knew no one by that name. Mrs. Clarke then recalled that her friend had told her to ask for Mrs. Stevens, and she accordingly did so, whereupon Mrs. Goffoller stated that Mrs. Stevens was resting easily, but wanted Mrs. Clarke to call for her after dinner that evening. She accordingly called at the office and residence of the defendant, and there saw the defendant, who stated to her that it had been necessary for him to give Miss White two treatments—one in the morning, which was unsuccessful, and a second in the afternoon. Mrs. Clarke found her friend in great pain. Shortly after Mrs. Clarke's arrival at the office Mrs. Goffoller left the house, saying she was going to a dinner party. Later the defendant answered the telephone, and Mrs. Clarke heard the voice of a woman at the other end of the line. The defendant asked the person on the line if Dr. Kremer had been told about the event and if he was coming down with her. The replies were in the affirmative, and shortly afterwards Mrs. Goffoller returned, followed by Dr. Kremer. The defendant told Dr. Kremer that he had treated the deceased about a year before, and that he had found it necessary on that occasion, as on this, to give her a second treatment. The defendant, in response to a query from Dr. Kremer, stated that the deceased was about three months pregnant. Thereupon Dr. Kremer wrote a prescription, and Mrs. Clarke went to have it filled. When she returned about half an hour later her friend was dead. Later Mrs. Goffoller said to Mrs. Clarke, "Will you stand by us?" The latter promising to do so. She also asked Mrs. Clarke if she would take the body to her apartment, but this was refused. Subsequently one Morris Weintraub, a friend of the defendant, arrived on the scene, and he, the defendant, and Mrs. Goffoller retired to another room, where they remained for a short time, when Mrs. Clarke was requested to join them. While there with them Weintraub remarked: "We will have to fix this up or the doctor will have to go to jail." He also suggested that Mrs. Clarke should say that she was walking along the street with the deceased, when the latter fell and was picked up by Mrs. Clarke and brought into the defendant's office. This she refused to do, and she also refused at about this time, in the presence of the defendant, to accept $40 offered to her by Mrs. Goffoller, who in doing so remarked: "This is the money the doctor got from the girl."

Miss White died about 10:30 p. m., and about two hours later the defendant, at the instance of Weintraub, reluctantly notified the coroner's office by telephone that a woman had died in his office; that she had come to his office unexpectedly and died suddenly; that he did not know the cause of her death; that he had failed to notify the coroner's office sooner for the reason that the telephone was out of order. Shortly thereafter a deputy coroner, accompanied by Detective Leo Bunner, arrived at the defendant's office. They found blood spots upon a bed, which the defendant in some confusion explained came from himself, he being a sufferer from piles, and, when it was pointed out to him that they were on the upper sheet, he stated that he sometimes slept on his stomach. Fresh blood clots were also found on the defendant's operating table, although he declared that he had not used it for three months. The telephone was found to be in good order. An examination of the body of the deceased showed that one stocking had been put on inside out, that the hooks and eyes of her dress were improperly fastened, and that her clothes appeared to have been hastily put on. A satchel containing obstetrical instruments was found in the doctor's office.

Dr. John R. Clark, the autopsy surgeon, testified that the death of the deceased was due to a hemorrhage resulting from the procurement of an abortion.

[1] Over the objection of the defendant, Mrs. Clarke was permitted to testify to a conversation with the deceased, out of the presence of the defendant, in which the deceased stated that she had made an appointment with Dr. Thomas, the defendant; that he wanted to operate on her forthwith, but she had preferred to wait till Friday; that he was going to charge her $50 to perform the operation. She also testified that her friend had told her that she was going to telegraph to the man responsible for her condition in New York, asking that he send her the sum of $40, and that on the day preceding the fatal operation her friend informed her that she had received the money. Covered by this objection is also the testimony of two witnesses, employees of the Western Union Telegraph Company, showing that the deceased, shortly after her conversation with Mrs. Clarke, had telegraphed to New York for $40, and that she had received said sum as requested. This testimony was not admitted for the purpose of showing the commission of the offense charged, but to show the condition of the deceased and the purpose of her visit to the defendant. For this limited purpose it was competent. People v. Wright, 167 Cal. 1, 138 Pac. 349; People v. Northcott, 189 Pac. 704. While this character of evidence is admissible when part of the res gestæ of a particular phase of the whole transaction (State v. Power, 24 Wash. 34, 63 Pac. 1112, 63 L. R. A. 902), some of the above testimony thus admitted over objection was merely narrative of occurrences, and therefore not within the rule making it competent; still, as the court instructed the jury that such testimony was not admitted generally, but only to show the condition of the deceased and the character of her visit to the defendant's office, it is clear that the error, if error it be, was merely technical and without injury to the defendant. As to that part of such testimony showing that the deceased had received by telegraph the sum of $40 from New York, this constituted part of the preparation for the visit, and was clearly admissible under the rule announced in People v. Wright, supra.

[2] Dr. Roy Kremer, the physician who was called in by the defendant to examine the deceased shortly before her death, was called as a witness in behalf of the defendant, and he testified, in effect, among other things, that it had not occurred to him upon the occasion of such examination that an illegal operation had been performed. To rebut this testimony Capt. Duncan Matheson, head of the detective force of the police department, was called, and testified that in a statement to him this witness, referring to the case, said: "This was a dirty mess." For the purpose offered this evidence was competent.

[3] The contention of the defendant that the testimony of Mrs. Clarke, detailing the conversation between her and the nurse or attendant in the defendant's office, was inadmissible, must be sustained, but it covered no disputed fact in the case, and was wholly without prejudice to the defendant.

[4] Objection was made to the reading of a statement made by Mrs. Clarke. It appears that she had made two written statements which were inconsistent one with the other. The first was made shortly after the death of her friend, and at a time when she was disposed to protect the defendant from prosecution and the family of her friend from humiliation and notoriety. It was contradictory of a written statement later made by her and of her testimony given at the trial. The first statement was introduced by the defendant for the purpose of discrediting the witness. On redirect examination her second statement was admitted, but later on motion it was stricken out. The court committed no error prejudicial to the defendant in so ruling, nor did the conduct of the prosecuting attorney in his behalf constitute misconduct.

[5] Complaint is made of the admission of the testimony of Miles Jackson, a detective, concerning a conversation had with the defendant, wherein the latter, in reply to a question as to why he displayed no physician's sign in connection with his office, replied: "I haven't had any signs on my office since I got into trouble at the time I was on Turk street." It is urged in support of the admission of this testimony that it was an explanation by the defendant of a suspicious circumstance in ths particular case and therefore competent; but assuming, as contended by the defendant, that the object and effect of this testimony was to afford the jury ground for the inference that the defendant had been charged with a prior offense separate from the charge on trial, and that it was inadmissible to prove intent in this class of cases, still, in view of the convincing character of the remaining evidence against the defendant, we would not be warranted in reversing the judgment on account of the admission of this somewhat ambiguous testimony.

[6] During the examination of the defendant as a witness upon the trial, and also of one of the witnesses called in his behalf, the defendant objected to certain questions asked by the deputy district attorney. He is not, however, in a position to complain of the rulings of the court upon them, for they were either withdrawn or they elicited nothing injurious to defendant's case. The defendant now in this court for the first time assigns the asking of such questions as misconduct. Upon this point the record shows that the prosecuting officers cross-examined the defendant as to whether or not he was accustomed to have patients like the deceased; whether he had any similar patients at his home before when miscarriage had taken place. These questions were answered in the negative. The witness was then asked if he knew Myrtle Dean or Myrtle Hanley, but this question, after argument, was withdrawn. Upon the cross-examination of a witness for the defendant the deputy district attorney, for the purpose of showing the witness' friendship for the defendant, asked him if he was not on the defendant's bond. This question was not objected to and was answered affirmatively; whereupon the prosecuting attorney asked him if he had not been upon the defendant's bond on several occasions. This question was, in effect, withdrawn and was not answered.

[7] The question put to the defendant last above quoted was not proper cross-examination, and, assuming that the question put to the other witness just detailed was not asked in good faith, still, as the asking of this question was not assigned as misconduct, nor the court requested to direct the jury to disregard it, and in view of the very strong case made by the people, we cannot regard these matters as justifying a reversal, although in a close case our conclusion might well be otherwise. The law contemplates that the defendant in a criminal case shall be tried according to the rules of law, and while in a given case an appellate court, in view of the convincing character of the evidence, may recognize that it is its duty to affirm the judgment of conviction, notwithstanding a disregard by the prosecuting officer of some of those rules, it would be a matter of serious regret if such officers should take advantage of the situation created by the adoption of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution to indulge in such infractions, more especially in view of the comparative helplessness of the defendant under such circumstances. In the present case the evidence, as we have said, is quite convincing of the defendant's guilt. It is admitted that he was a licensed physician; that the deceased was pregnant; that she had made two recent visits to his office, and had been given two treatments by him on the occasion of the second of those visits; that she died in his office as the result of an abortion. The evidence also shows that the defendant informed Dr. Kremer that deceased was three months pregnant; that he asked Dr. Kremer to sign the death certificate; that the defendant's assistant in his presence offered to return to Mrs. Clarke the money received by the defendant from the deceased, and requested Mrs. Clarke to stand by them and to take the body of her friend to her own apartment; that defendant's friend Weintraub in his presence remarked, "We must fix this up for the doctor or he will have to go to jail," and at the same conversation, with the same persons present, suggested that Mrs. Clarke should say to the authorities that the deceased was suddenly taken ill on the street in front of the doctor's office, and was conveyed into his office and died. In addition there are the suspicious circumstances of the blood clots on the bed and operating table, and the defendant's explanation concerning them; the delay in notifying the coroner's office of the death. In view of the evidence in the case we think it is plainly one that falls within the terms of the amendment to the Constitution above cited, requiring an affirmance of the judgment.

The instructions of the court were fair and fully covered every phase of the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

McCONNELL v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR ALAMEDA COUNTY et al.

(Civ. 3848.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 12, 1921.)

Certiorari ⟸29—Determination of motion for new trial without proper affidavits, etc., mere irregularity.

Though the lower court proceeded to determine motion for new trial without having before it proper affidavits and in the absence of proper specifications of errors of law occurring on trial and with no specifications of the evidence claimed to be insufficient to justify the decision, there was a mere irregularity in the proceedings of the lower court which did not affect its jurisdiction, conferred by Code Civ. Proc. § 657 et seq., to hear and determine motion for new trial, and the writ of certiorari is not available to attack such irregularity, lying only where an inferior court or tribunal has acted without, or in excess of, jurisdiction.

Application for certiorari by Emmett W. McConnell against the Superior Court of the State of California in and for the County of Alameda and Hon. J. J. Trabucco, Judge thereof, to require respondent judge to show cause why an order granting new trial should not be set aside, and judgment entered in favor of petitioner. Application denied.

Goldman & Altman, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. There has been filed in this matter what purports to be a verified petition for a writ of review. It appears therefrom that an action was heretofore commenced in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Sonoma, wherein Christian Schlake, Jr., was plaintiff and Emmett W. McConnell, petitioner herein, was defendant, which cause was thereafter transferred to the superior court of the state of California in and for Alameda county. After trial by the court, findings of fact and conclusions of law were duly made, and judgment was entered thereon for the defendant. The plaintiff in the action thereupon made a motion for a new trial upon all the statutory grounds, and served and filed his affidavits in support thereof. The defendant, petitioner herein, opposed said motion, and in support of his position likewise filed an affidavit. Motion for a new trial was granted.

Thereupon the defendant, this petitioner, made a motion to vacate the order granting a new trial and for an order re-entering judgment in his favor. This motion was denied.

Petitioner now files in this court what purports to be a petition for writ of review, but which, in reality, appears to be an application for an order directing the lower court to show cause why the order granting a motion for a new trial in the cause should not be set aside and the court directed to re-enter judgment in favor of the defendant in the action and against the plaintiff. The basis of the application appears to be that the lower court proceeded to determine the motion for a new trial without having before it proper affidavits and in the absence of proper specifications of errors of law occurring at the trial, and with no specifications of the evidence claimed to be insufficient to justify the court's decision.

Assuming this to be the fact, we think the only result was an irregularity in the proceedings of the court which did not affect the jurisdiction conferred by section 657, et seq., Code of Civil Procedure, to hear and determine the motion for a new trial.

"The writ of certiorari is not available to attack mere error; it lies only where an inferior court or tribunal has acted without, or in excess of, its jurisdiction. Pacific Tel. & Tel. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 694, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 822."

See, also, sections 1068 and 1074, Code Civ. Proc.

The application for writ of review is denied.

KENDRICK v. GOULD. (Civ. 3324.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 11, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Judgment for attorney's fees on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

In an attorney's action to recover fees where the issue arose as to whether defendant was liable personally or whether the estate of which he was executor was liable, a judgment for plaintiff will not be disturbed on conflicting evidence.

2. Appeal and error ⟸931(3)—Presumed that finding was made against defense not sustained by evidence.

Although a special defense may be set up in the answer, if there is not evidence to support it the appellate court must conclude that any finding which could have been made would have been adverse to defendant on that issue, so that, under such circumstances, the failure to find thereon does not require a reversal.

3. Trial ⟸395(3)—Special findings unnecessary where all denials in answer found untrue.

A finding that each and all of the denials set forth in the answer are untrue is full, definite, and certain, so as to obviate necessity of special findings.

4. Evidence ⟸571(7) — Court may pass on reasonableness of fees without regard to expert evidence.

In an attorney's action to recover fees, it is within the power of the court to pass on the reasonableness of the fee without regard to expert evidence.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by Wm. T. Kendrick against Will D. Gould to recover attorney's fees. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

James Donovan, Clara Shortridge Foltz, and Will D. Gould, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. It is hard to conceive of a case wherein the rule that, if a substantial conflict exists in the evidence, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed, applies more directly than in the one at bar. The principal question to be determined is, Was plaintiff employed as defendant's attorney, or for the defendant in his capacity as executor? The parties do not agree in their versions of what was said at the time the contract of employment was made, but, for the purpose of this appeal, the evidence given by plaintiff must be deemed to be true. He testified:

"Gould, the defendant, and James H. Blanchard, came into my office about the date I have mentioned, and after the usual greeting Gould says, 'We want you to help us,' or, 'We want your services in the contest that has been filed in the estate of Samuel F. Baker, deceased,' and I replied, 'All right,' or words to that effect I said 'All right.' * * * After the conversation had proceeded, and just before they left the office, Gould said, 'How about attorney's fees?' or 'What do you expect?' or words to that effect; and I said, 'Well, I only want a reasonable fee, and you and Blanchard are both lawyers; I would be willing to leave the amount of the fee to you gentlemen.' And my best recollection is that no reply was made to that. They went out."

From this it appears that the parties did not, in definite terms, specify the exact capacity of the employment. However, this conversation, standing alone, is surely more consistent with the theory of private employment, or at least personal responsibility, than that the plaintiff was to act for the defendant as executor, and to receive his fee from the estate. All of those concerned were lawyers, and it must be assumed from the fact that Gould asked Kendrick what about the fee, and Kendrick said he would leave it to Gould and Blanchard to fix the fee, that they did not have in mind the court's fixing the fee, as, of course, they knew the court only would have authority to do in case the employment was to be that of an attorney acting on behalf of the estate, and the fee to be a charge against it. If Gould had in mind that Kendrick was to look to the estate for his fee, when Kendrick said that he would leave the matter to Gould and Blanchard, the natural reply would have been, "No, we will have to let the court determine the matter."

The trial court would have been justified in concluding from the oral contract of employment that the parties intended to create a personal obligation upon the part of Gould. However, it considered further what was said and done by the parties subsequently. Appellant calls attention to the fact that plaintiff joined in a petition for the recovery of attorney's fees in the estate of Samuel F. Baker, and insists that this is evidence that he regarded the employment as merely one to represent the estate. On the other side, it is pointed out that the order for substitution of attorneys, made on motion of Blanchard, representing the defendant, was that "James H. Blanchard, William T. Kendrick and Will D. Gould, Esqs., be, and they are, hereby substituted as attorneys for said executor and Will D. Gould personally," etc., and that a motion to dismiss the contest was signed by these attorneys as "for executor and Will D. Gould personally."

[1] And we find other conflicting evidence, and evidence some of which is susceptible of being interpreted upon either theory. Under such circumstances, it is elementary that the decision of the trial court will not be disturbed.

One of the grounds relied upon by appellant is that the findings are incomplete. In support of this contention Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, and Warren v. Robinson, 71 Cal. 380, 12 Pac. 265, are cited. It is apparent that these—"were cases where the finding left something undetermined, so that the court could not ascertain precisely what facts had been found." Chatfield v. Continental Bldg., etc., Assn., 6 Cal. App. 668, 92 Pac. 1040.

The Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell is a fair example of others of this class in which findings have been held insufficient because uncertain and incomplete. The complaint included a cause of action for attorney's fees claimed for the foreclosure of a mortgage; the answer alleged that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant to perform legal services at a fixed salary, and not otherwise, and that the services rendered had been paid for by the payment of the plaintiff's salary, and the court merely found:

"That all the allegations of the complaint are true, and all the allegations and denials of the answer contradicting the complaint in any respect are untrue."

Clearly, the issue of the existence of the contract of employment and the plaintiff's payment thereunder, alleged in the answer, was one not tendered by the complaint, and yet one which, if true, would defeat plaintiff's cause of action. Consequently, the finding was insufficient. But in the case at bar it appears that, except in the counterclaim contained in the answer, but one statement is found the effect of which is to do more than contradict some allegation of the complaint. That allegation is as follows:

"And the plaintiff then and there stated to this defendant that it was not customary for one lawyer to charge another for professional services rendered, or to be rendered, and that he would make no charge in the matter unless the defense was successful, and in case the defense was successful he would leave the matter of his fees and compensation to said James H. Blanchard and Will D. Gould, and that in no case should the same exceed the amount which the court might allow him in the matter of the estate of Samuel F. Baker, deceased, as attorney's fees, in assisting in said defense, and that there should be no charge for attorney's fees against Will D. Gould personally. * * *"

An analysis of this affirmative allegation discloses that it contains five propositions: First, one to the effect that a contract of employment was entered into by which defendant employed plaintiff to represent him in the defense of the will of Samuel F. Baker against a certain contest. This fact is also alleged in the complaint. Second, interpreting the language most favorably to appellant it may be construed to say, inferentially, that plaintiff was not to represent defendant personally. This allegation is no more than a denial of an allegation of the complaint "that plaintiff was employed by defendant," etc., and other similar statements therein contained; consequently, a finding "That each and all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's amended complaint and the amendment thereto are true," disposes of this mere denial, whether affirmative or negative in form, of such allegation. Third, that under no circumstances was any charge to be made against defendant personally. This is only a denial of the allegation in the complaint that plaintiff was to receive a reasonable fee to be suggested by Blanchard and Gould. It, therefore, required no special finding. Fourth, it is indirectly alleged that plaintiff was employed by defendant to represent defendant as executor. This allegation requires no finding, because, even if true, it would not contradict any part of finding one above quoted or refute the allegation of the complaint that a contract to represent Gould personally was made, as it is obvious that plaintiff may have been employed to represent defendant, both personally and as executor, since defendant was interested in the outcome of the contest as a beneficiary under the will, as well as being the executor. Fifth, the allegation under examination contains the assertion that the contract of employment provided that the plaintiff's claim to any fees should be contingent upon the successful outcome of the litigation.

This statement in the answer presents an issue which, if found to be true, would defeat plaintiff's cause of action, and its truth might not be regarded as definitely determined by a general finding "that each and all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's amended complaint and the amendment thereto are true," since such an allegation as to the contract of employment might be true, and yet an additional agreement as to the fee being contingent would avoid liability if the defense in which the parties were engaged was unsuccessful. But the record of testimony given at the trial discloses that no witness testified in support of the allegation in the answer to the effect that the fee was to be contingent. On the contrary, Gould in his testimony states that Kendrick, replying to the question, "How about fees?" said:

"It was not the custom of one lawyer to charge another personally, and that he never did, and there would be no charge against the estate except as fees would be allowed, and that, as Blanchard and I were both attorneys in the case in the matter of the division of those fees, he would leave that to us."

[2] This is the only testimony which contradicts Kendrick's version of the conversation which constituted the contract of employment, and Gould makes no mention of anything being said abut the fee being contingent. Hence, no finding is required upon this last part of the affirmative allegation quoted from the answer; for, although a special defense may be set up in the answer, if there is no evidence to support it, we must conclude that any finding which could have been made would have been adverse to the defendant upon that issue. Under such circumstances, the failure to find thereon does not require a reversal. Haight v. Costanich, 31 Cal. App. Dec. 237; [1] Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309.

As to the allegations of the counterclaim, finding III is full and complete. It reads in part "that all the allegations set forth in paragraph 2 of defendant's counterclaim are untrue except," and then follows a specific finding entirely consistent with the allegations of the complaint.

[3] In Williams v. Hill, 54 Cal. 390, it is held that a general finding, "that all the facts set forth in the complaint were true" is full, definite, and certain as to the issues tendered by the complaint. See, also, Johnson v. Klein, 70 Cal. 186, 11 Pac. 606; Alameda County v. Crocker, 125 Cal. 101, 57 Pac. 766. It follows that a finding that "each and all of the denials set forth in defendant's answer to plaintiff's amended complaint and amendment thereto are untrue" is full, definite, and certain. This finding was probably unnecessary, in view of the second finding that "each and all the allegations set forth in plaintiff's complaint and the amendment thereto are true."

Numerous other points argued are determined by the conclusions already reached. For example, if the original contract of employment was one to represent the defendant individually, it follows that the provisions of sections 1616 and 1619, Code of Civil Procedure, have no application. Again, there is no finding that plaintiff was employed to represent the defendant in a dual capacity, but only in a personal one; consequently no question arises as to the segregation of fees.

[4] The court found that $2,500 was a reasonable fee for the services rendered. This finding was supported by the testimony of several lawyers. The court might have passed upon the matter without regard to the expert evidence. Zimmer v. Kilborn, 165 Cal. 523, 132 Pac. 1026, Ann. Cas. 1914D, 368.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

51 Cal. App. 654

FLOYD v. TIERRA GRANDE DEVELOPMENT CO. (Civ. 3613.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 4, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⊜434(9)—Escrow instructions and documents prior to final written contract held admissible on issue of fraud.

Escrow instructions and other papers prepared by parties to a transaction defining the obligations and duties of the parties executed prior to the final written agreement, whereby plaintiff was to be paid for services in procuring an exchange of property, were admissible on the issue of fraud.

2. Corporations ⊜426(6)—Resolution held to ratify contract, though parties present were ignorant of contents.

The force of a resolution ratifying a contract cannot be avoided on the ground that all the parties present were ignorant of the contents of the contract which they assembled to ratify.

3. Corporations ⊜399(1)—Bound same as individual by apparent authority given officers or agents.

A corporation is bound by the same rules of law concerning apparent authority of officers and agents that govern individuals, and no concealed resolution, however artfully worded, may give a corporation an advantage that does not belong to an individual.

4. Corporations ⊜425(2)—Bound by apparent authority given agent.

Where corporation officers had knowledge of the fact that the name of the general manager appeared in the body of a contract as owner of properties which she offered in exchange, and made no objection to her claim of ownership, they are estopped by failure to deny and also by affirmative action in ratifying the contract.

5. Corporations ⊜426(10)—Acceptance of fruits of transaction a ratification thereof.

Where a corporation accepts the fruits of a transaction carried out by its general manager and has never explicitly repudiated it, it cannot relieve itself of the obligations imposed by the contract.

6. Trial ⊜391—Finding should be expressly made on fraud issue.

In an action by a broker against a corporation on a note and an agreement to pay a commission for an exchange of property, where defense included allegations of fraud in obtaining the note and also the agreement, plaintiff was entitled to a specific finding on the issue of fraud as framed by the second cause of action relating to the alleged fraudulent obtaining of the agreement, for the reason that the court may have found that the note was fraudulently obtained, and also have found against a fraudulent procurement of the agreement, since, allegations of fraud being serious in their effect, a finding should ordinarily be expressly made by the court, fraud never being presumed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by J. C. Floyd against the Tierra Grande Development Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. J. Ford and Ford & Bodkin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SEAWELL, Presiding Justice pro tem. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment rendered in favor of defendant. The complaint contains two causes of action. The first is laid on a one-year promissory note bearing date October 19, 1915, for the sum of $2,000 with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum and for attorney's fees should suit be necessary to enforce collection. The second cause is based on an agreement in writing executed September 30, 1915, by defendant's agent and general manager, Mrs. C. A. Lovell, by the terms of which said defendant bound itself to pay the plaintiff the sum of $2,000 as a commission for services rendered in promoting an exchange of real properties owned by defendant corporation and one Dr. E. D. Stoddard, respectively. Said causes of action sprang from the same real estate transaction.

Defendant corporation was organized September 23, 1912. Mrs. C. A. Lovell, who appears in her business transactions as C. A. Lovell, is the mother of Edward J. Fleischer and Mrs. Gertrude K. Hurley. The son and daughter were the owners of several parcels of land situate in the counties of Los Angeles and Orange. To suit a family, or other purpose, not apparent, a corporation was formed, and said properties were taken over by it. While Mrs. C. A. Lovell was quite active in its management, she insists that she did not have at any time a financial interest in said corporation's affairs. The officers of said corporation as originally organized consisted of Mrs. C. A. Lovell, president, her daughter, Gertrude K. Hurley, secretary, and her son, Edward J. Fleischer, presumably vice president. Miss A. M. Brown, a resident of New York City, had for a brief time an official connection with said corporation, but was eventually dropped from membership. Her relations with it are not material to a consideration of the issues of the cause. The stock was owned by the son and daughter, who also constituted the entire board of directors. After serving as president for several months Mrs. Lovell resigned, and on November 7, 1914, she was, by resolution of the board of directors, made general manager, which position she held throughout the transaction of negotiation and exchange.

The properties owned by said corporation were heavily mortgaged, and it was in arrears in the payment of interest. The Stoddard holdings consisted of 800 acres of land situate in Tulare county, together with live stock and farming equipment of considerable value. It was likewise heavily incumbered.

The mortgage and other indebtedness of each owner respectively amounted to upwards of $35,000. There is no controversy as to disparity of values.

Plaintiff Floyd, referred to by Mrs. C. A. Lovell as an elderly gentleman, was and had been for 20 years past a real estate dealer or broker located in the city of Los Angeles. He and Mrs. Lovell had been acquaintances for a period of several years prior to this transaction. The respective owners of said properties having listed them with plaintiff for sale, he undertook to effect an exchange of said properties between said respective parties. Accordingly an agreement was prepared and executed. The parts thereof material to the issues presented are as follows:

"This agreement witnesseth: That Dr. E. D. Stoddard, owner of the following described piece of property situate, lying, and being in the county of Tulare, state of California, particularly described as follows, to wit:—[Description follows]—which I agree to exchange for the following described piece of properties owned by Mr. C. A. Lovell of Los Angeles, California, and particularly described as follows, to wit: [Description follows.] * * *

"It is further agreed and understood that if for any reason whatsoever either or all principals to this agreement shall fail to comply with same, and in consequence this exchange shall fail consummation, then the party or parties at fault agree to pay J. C. Floyd the full commission for both sides, together with attorney and escrow charges.

"It is further agreed with J. C. Floyd that, when he has received an acceptance to exchange the above properties on above terms, I will pay to him the sum of two thousand five hundred dollars ($2,500) as commission for such service irrespective of any commission paid by any other party. I will allow the second party fifteen (15) days' time to furnish certificate of title or abstract and deed conveying the second described property.

"Dated this thirtieth day of September, 1915.

"Dr. E. D. Stoddard.
"Ellen Stoddard."

Reverse side reads as follows:

"This agreement witnesseth: That I, C. A. Lovell, of Los Angeles, California, owner of the second piece of property herein described, hereby accept the proposition of the exchange made herein and upon terms herein stated, and agree to furnish a certificate of title or abstract from a competent searcher of title within fifteen (15) days, showing property vested as deeded, and to furnish a good and sufficient deed of conveyance as directed. I agree to pay to J. C. Floyd the sum of $2,000 commission for services rendered.

"Dated this 18th day of September, 1915.

"C. A. Lovell, Mgr."

It is admitted that said agreement was executed by C. A. Lovell on the 30th day of September, 1915, and not on the 18th day of said month, as appears at the bottom of said agreement. The presence of the name C. A. Lovell in the body of the agreement as owner of the property offered by her in exchange is accounted for by plaintiff on the theory that she represented herself to be the true owner of all of the stock and property of the corporation.

Dr. Stoddard, being an elderly gentleman, was represented in the transaction by his nephew, Frank W. Ford.

[1] On October 5, 1915, certain escrow instructions or papers were prepared by the parties to the transaction, defining the obligations and duties of said parties including an obligation on the part of said corporation to pay to plaintiff a commission in the sum of $2,000 for services rendered in effecting said exchange. The escrow papers were excluded from evidence, and the contents thereof are left in an uncertain state. We are permitted only to conjecture as to what they contained by scant references occasionally made to them. Said documents, nevertheless, constituted a part of the transaction in which false and fraudulent representations are relied upon to avoid an agreement. Such evidence was material to the main issues, to wit, fraud or no fraud. Said offer was not made with a purpose to vary the terms of a written contract, nor could such evidence have been properly excluded on the theory that all of the agreements of the parties were merged in the final written agreement. This evidence was offered for no such purpose. It was pertinent, however, to the question of whether or not deceit or fraudulent practices had been employed. In other words, it was admissible as evidence bearing upon the vital subject of inquiry, to wit, fraud. In the investigation of fraudulent conduct a very generous rule obtains.

Returning to the chronological order of events, it is shown by the record kept by the secretary of said corporation that on October 9, 1915, a meeting of all of the officers and stockholders, to wit, President Edward J. Fleischer and Secretary Gertrude K. Hurley, was held, after notice regularly given, for the purpose of ratifying the contract and agreement entered into on the 30th day of September, 1915, between Dr. Stoddard, his wife, and C. A. Lovell.

Mrs. C. A. Lovell, general manager, and attorney H. H. Hahn, a member of the law firm of Hahn & Hahn, attorney for said corporation, were also in attendance at said meeting. In fact, H. H. Hahn, Esq., outlined and directed the legal procedure for the occasion and dictated the draft of the minutes of the meeting. With the contract dated September 30, 1915, before them, which contract or agreement had been in the possession of the agents and officers of said corporation for nine consecutive days, a resolution was adopted, of which the following is a part:

"This corporation does hereby approve of and ratify a certain agreement entered into in writing between C. A. Lovell and Dr. E. D. Stoddard, and dated September 30, 1915, for the exchange of the above-described properties, and in the effecting of such exchange the president and secretary of this corporation are hereby authorized to modify or change the terms above set forth in such manner and to such extent as they in their judgment may deem beneficial to this corporation."

The authority given to the president and secretary by the above resolution to modify or change the terms "above set forth in such manner and to such extent as they in their judgment may deem beneficial to this corporation" has no reference to the commission of $2,000 to be paid to plaintiff, as this matter is not one of the things set forth or mentioned in said resolution of ratification.

In fact, it is the claim of Mrs. C. A. Lovell that she did not tell her son or daughter until October 12 or 15, 1915, anything about the contract containing a provision to pay said commission to plaintiff. The son and daughter contend that neither had any knowledge at the time the ratifying resolution was passed that the agreement contained a provision for the payment of a commission. Indeed, H. H. Hahn, the attorney who prepared the minutes of ratification, upon making answer at the trial to a question as to whether he had examined the agreement of September 30, 1915, which had been submitted to him for examination and inspection, said:

"I examined only the front page, at the bottom of which appears the signatures Dr. E. D. Stoddard and Ellen Stoddard.

"Q. Did you see the reverse side? A. I did not; it was not called to my attention or discussed in my presence."

That all of said parties except Mrs. C. A. Lovell, who remained silent, under the circumstances of the situation, were informed as to all other portions of said agreement except that portion or particular part which obligated said corporation to pay a commission, seems highly improbable. Such a statement amounts almost to a challenge to credulity. Without the portion which provided for said commission there would have been no acceptance, no contract, and therefore nothing to ratify.

Mrs. C. A. Lovell represented herself as being unable to immediately pay the $2,000 commission, and it was agreed that she should give a note payable one year after date. Shortly prior to the close of the transaction, and at a time when the agreements of exchange were about to be released from escrow, in response to the demand of plaintiff upon Mrs. C. A. Lovell that she execute and deliver to him the promissory note agreed upon, she caused to be executed and delivered the note here sued upon, which is in words and figures as follows:

"2,000. Los Angeles, Cal. Oct. 19, 1915.

"One year after date without grace I promise to pay to the order of J. C. Floyd two thousand dollars payable at Los Angeles for value received, with interest from date at the rate of seven per cent. per annum until paid. Principal and interest payable in U. S. gold coin at Los Angeles, and in case suit is instituted to collect this note or any portion thereof I promise to pay such additional sum as the court may adjudge reasonable as attorney's fees in said suit.

"[Signed] Tierra Grande Dev. Co.,
"By C. A. Lovell, Mgr.

"No. ———. Due October 19, 1916."

As a defense to the first cause of action defendant variously sets out in his answer that said note was signed and delivered by Mrs. C. A. Lovell without authority from the defendant to so do; that it was given without any consideration whatever; that Dr. Stoddard had criticized plaintiff, and charged him with favoring defendant in several controversies that had arisen affecting said exchange of properties; that plaintiff obtained said note by falsely stating that he wished to show it to Dr. Stoddard so as to convince him that both he and the corporation were receiving the same treatment; that plaintiff also represented that he wished to place said note with the escrow papers so that the trust officer of the title insurance and trust company would think plaintiff was doing a good business; that defendant did not owe plaintiff anything on account of commissions, and that it was agreed that said note after it had served the purpose of its procurement would be destroyed; that said representations were false and fraudulent; that said C. A. Lovell did not sign said note as defendant's corporate act, and that she had no authority to do so; that said defendant corporation did not discover the execution of said note until November 1, 1915; that the use said note was intended to serve was contrary to public policy.

The answer to the second cause of action repeats much of the matter heretofore set out, and in addition denies that defendant entered into an agreement requesting or empowering plaintiff to negotiate any exchange of said properties. It affirmatively alleges, however, that plaintiff was engaged in attempting to bring about an exchange of real properties between Dr. Stoddard and defendant, and that Mrs. C. A. Lovell assisted therein, but that it was expressly agreed that defendant, in the event that said exchange should be effected, would not be obligated to pay plaintiff any commission for his services. The execution of the agreement of September 30, 1915, is admitted, but it is denied that a commission was in fact to be paid. It is averred that the purposes of signing said agreement was to enable plaintiff to satisfy Dr. Stoddard that defendant had also agreed to pay plaintiff a commission. It is denied that defendant was a party to said commission agreement or that it authorized Mrs. Lovell to execute the same. Denial is made that her act or acts were ratified by the corporation. It is further denied that plaintiff performed services and labor in bringing about said exchange. A fraudulent design and purpose is charged against plaintiff in obtaining the signature of Mrs. Lovell to both note and agreement.

The findings of the trial court substantially follow the allegations of the defendant's answer except that there is no specific finding of fraud on the issue that the agreement was obtained by fraudulent representations.

Because of a failure, in our opinion, of the sufficiency of the evidence to support the finding based on fraud, no special notice will be taken of the question whether or not the facts relied upon to establish the separate causes of action are so related as to make a finding on one decisive of the other, except to observe that such a finding made in reference to the second cause of action would render it unnecessary to find on the issue presented in the first; while the converse of the proposition would not be true.

The findings of the court that plaintiff requested the execution and delivery of said note "so that said trust officer would think that he, plaintiff, was transacting a good piece of business" stands without a scintilla of evidence to support it. The same may be said of the finding that defendant corporation did not discover the execution of said note until on or about November 1, 1915. It was admitted at the trial that its existence was known as early as October 19, 1915. Mrs. C. A. Lovell testified that she told her attorney of the existence of the note at about that time.

The reasons given in justification or by way of excusing the execution of the note and commission agreement are too trivial and futile to require extended consideration. It is nowhere explained in what manner Dr. Stoddard or his nephew, Frank W. Ford, who solely represented him in the transaction, could have been interested or could in any way have profited by the payment of a commission to plaintiff.

All the parties to the action appear to possess more than ordinary intelligence. Mrs. C. A. Lovell had for several years past been the manager of defendant corporation. In fact, she organized it. She was well experienced in business affairs. She had also been engaged in the brokerage and mining business. Her son, Edward J. Fleischer, had also been engaged as a real estate broker, and was a man of business experience. Mrs. Hurley was the secretary of the corporation and doubtless understood ordinary business transactions. It appears, therefore, that none were without business training and experience. The negotiations extended over a period of four or five months, and every member of the family took an active interest in consummating the exchange.

It was the claim of Mrs. Lovell that Mr. Ford, representing his uncle, insisted that defendant should pay a commission, and objected to the delivery of the escrow instructions because they contained no provision requiring defendant to pay a commission to plaintiff, and that in order to placate him she executed and delivered the note in controversy. Mr. Ford absolutely denies her statement. He testified that neither Dr. Stoddard nor himself had any interest whatever or concern in the question of a commission to be paid by defendant to plaintiff or any one else. His testimony is that it was a matter of absolute indifference to him whether the escrow papers contained a provision for the payment of a commission by defendant or were silent on the subject. Mrs. Lovell is also contradicted in this particular by the escrow holder, Ralph R. Johnson. The only person who insisted on the execution of the note before the transaction should be closed was plaintiff. He instructed escrow holder Johnson to include the note among the escrow papers.

That Mrs. C. A. Lovell regarded herself or the corporation liable for the payment of a commission in connection with the exchange appears from the testimony of another apparently disinterested witness, E. R. Corson, a stockholder of a corporation that held a mortgage on the defendant's real property. His testimony is that pending negotiations for said exchange Mrs. Lovell made the statement that she would have to pay a commission "if this deal does not go through." There was a provision in the agreement to the effect that, should either party fail to comply with the terms of said contract, such party so failing should pay the full commission for both sides to said J. C. Floyd.

The documentary evidence received at the trial is decidedly, if not indeed conclusively, in favor of plaintiff's claim. His testimony was in essential parts at least corroborated by all of the disinterested witnesses who testified in the case. The facts contended for by defendant take such a wide departure from ordinary rules of human conduct and experience under the circumstances of the situation as to raise the question of improbability as to their existence. The reasons urged in explanation of damaging conduct are far from satisfactory.

[2] That the resolution adopted October 9, 1915, was a ratification of the whole contract, including the agreement for commissions, cannot admit of doubt. The force of the resolution cannot be avoided on the ground that all the parties present were ignorant of the contents of the agreement which they had assembled to ratify. If such a practice is to prevail, the most solemn forms prescribed by the law by which man may pledge faith with man will become but a mock ceremony.

[3, 4] As to the binding consequence of Mrs. Lovell's acts there can be no serious doubt. By the resolution dated November, 1914, she was appointed general manager of said corporation, with full power to sign checks, pay bills, negotiate purchases and sales of property for the corporation, subject to the approval of the board of directors. Said resolution provided, however, that she was "not authorized to create any indebtedness or sign anything in writing unless first authorized to do so by resolution of the board of directors." A corporation, however, is bound by the same rules of law that govern individuals, and no concealed resolution, however artfully worded, may give a corporation an advantage that does not belong to an individual. We are of the opinion that under the authorities her active participation in the transaction, assuming that she did have full authority to deal with said property, doubtless with the consent and knowledge of her children, is sufficient without recourse to the positive ratification made by said corporation on October 9, 1915, to hold her acts to be the acts of the corporation. There is no denial of the fact that the corporation officers had knowledge of the fact that C. A. Lovell appeared in the body of the agreement which was ratified October 9, 1915, as owner of the properties which she offered in exchange. No objection was made to her claim of ownership. The corporation officers are unquestionably estopped by a failure to deny and also by their affirmative action in ratifying the agreement.

Sufficient to illustrate the principle of law as here announced, see Dover v. Pittsburg Oil Co., 143 Cal. 501, 77 Pac. 405, and Wisp v. Hazard, 66 Cal. 459, 6 Pac. 91. The case first cited also makes citation to sections of the Code applicable to the questions presented.

[5] Defendant accepted the fruits of the transaction and has never since explicitly repudiated it. This it must do if it would relieve itself of the obligations which the law will otherwise cast upon it. Pope v. Armsby Co., 111 Cal. 159, 43 Pac. 589; Ballard v. Nye, 138 Cal. 588, 72 Pac. 156.

It is not necessary to multiply authorities in support of well-recognized principles of substantive law.

[6] We are satisfied that, if the general finding may be construed as a sufficient finding applicable to plaintiff's second cause of action, said finding would still stand unsupported by the evidence. Plaintiff was entitled to a specific finding on the issue as framed by the second cause of action, for the reason that the court may have found said note to have been fraudulently obtained, if the evidence so warranted, and also to have found against a fraudulent procurement of said agreement. Allegations of fraud being serious in their effect, a finding should ordinarily be expressly made by the court on each issue presented. Fraud is never presumed. It must be satisfactorily proved.

The issue of fraud not being sustained by the evidence, the judgment appealed from is reversed.

READ, Ex'x, v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (L. A. 6397.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜867(2), 933(4)—Scope of review on appeal from order granting new trial in general terms stated.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, as amended by St. 1919, p. 142, providing that, if grant of new trial is for insufficiency of the evidence, that fact must be specified in order on appeal from order granting in general terms a new trial, the Supreme Court cannot consider whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict unless it is insufficient in law and without conflict on any material point, but, if the court finds any other ground on which the motion might have been granted, the order granting new trial should be affirmed.

2. Street railroads ⊜103(1) — "Last clear chance" doctrine stated.

The substance of the doctrine of the last clear chance, as applied to an accident on a street railway's tracks, is that, although it appears that the contributory negligence of decedent was one of the proximate causes of his death, yet, if defendant railway's agents, having charge of the instrumentality which caused the death, perceived that decedent had placed himself in a position of peril from which he probably could not escape, and, after perceiving his perilous position, failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid injuring decedent, and such negligence was also a proximate cause of his death, his representative can recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Last clear chance.]

3. Street railroads ⊜118(15)—Evidence insufficient to justify instruction on last clear chance.

In an action against a street railway for a death when its car collided with the automobile driven by decedent, evidence showing that the motorman on observing the peril had less than a second of time to set the brakes held insufficient to justify the giving of an instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance, so that new trial was properly granted for the giving of such an instruction.

4. Street railroads ⊜99(10)—Automobile driver crossing ahead of car negligent.

An automobile driver was guilty of contributory negligence in trying to cross ahead of a rapidly moving street car at a street intersection where he could have seen the car approaching had he taken the trouble to look when he was 60 feet from the track.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by Mary Ella Read, executrix of the estate of George Gilbert Read, deceased, against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Verdict for plaintiff. From grant of new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George Clark, of San Francisco, and Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, and E. E. Morris, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the executrix of the estate of George Gilbert Read, deceased, to recover damages on account of his death, which, so it is alleged, was caused by the negligence of the defendant. The cause was tried by a jury, and a verdict was given in favor of the plaintiff, upon which judgment was duly entered. Thereupon, on motion of the defendant, the court ordered a new trial. The plaintiff appeals from the order granting said motion. The notice of intention to move for a new trial stated, among other things, that it would be made upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, that the verdict was against law, and that errors were made by the court in its rulings at the trial. The order granting a new trial was general in terms. It was made in December, 1919, and it did not specify any particular ground as the basis upon which it was made.

[1] The last clause of section 657 of the Code of Civil Procdure as amended in 1919, which took effect on July 22, 1919, provides that—

"When a new trial is granted upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, the order shall so specify; otherwise, on appeal from such order, it will be presumed that the order was not based upon that ground." Stats. 1919, p. 142.

Because of this provision, the rule stated in Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 277, 29 Pac. 481, and other cases following it, applies, and we are precluded from considering whether or not the evidence is sufficient to sustain the verdict, unless it is insufficient in law and without conflict on any material point. Under the doctrine of that case, however, if we find any other ground upon which the motion might have been granted, the order should be affirmed.

[2-4] It appears that the court gave the jury an instruction upon what is known as the doctrine of "the last clear chance." The substance of the doctrine as applied to such cases is that, although it appears that the contributory negligence of the decedent was one of the proximate causes of his death, yet, if the defendant's agents having charge of the instrumentality which caused the death perceived that the decedent, by his own negligence, had placed himself in a position of peril from which he probably could not escape, and after perceiving his perilous position failed to exercise ordinary care and prudence to avoid injuring the decedent, and such neglect was also a proximate cause of his death, the plaintiff could recover. From an examination of the evidence on the subject we are satisfied that there was no evidence in the case which would justify the giving of an instruction upon this point. The death of the decedent was caused by a collision between a street car operated by the defendant upon its railroad tracks on Santa Monica avenue where the same crosses Vermont avenue in the city of Los Angeles. The decedent was approaching said crossing on Vermont avenue in an automobile. The plaintiff contends that the car was approaching the crossing at a speed of from 30 to 50 miles an hour. There is some evidence to support this contention. A city ordinance in force at the time prohibited a street car from crossing an intersecting street at a speed greater than 20 miles an hour. The excessive speed was therefore negligence upon the part of the defendant. The uncontradicted testimony, and the only testimony on the subject, is that the motorman operating the defendant's car observed the decedent driving the automobile toward the crossing; that when the decedent reached a point 60 feet from the track he could have seen the car approaching the crossing if he had taken the trouble to look; that the motorman supposed that decedent intended to stop before reaching the track or to turn down Santa Monica avenue, and did not perceive that the decedent intended to cross the track ahead of the car until the car reached the curb of Vermont avenue, which point was 40 feet distant from the place of the collision, which occurred at the intersection of the two streets. Under the doctrine of the last clear chance, when the motorman thus perceived that the decedent would probably endeavor to cross in front of him instead of turning to the right down Santa Monica avenue, it became his duty immediately to do all that he could, under the circumstances, to avoid a collision. The evidence of the defendant's witnesses, including the motorman and several of the passengers, was to the effect that the moment he perceived this intention on the part of the decedent the motorman put on the emergency air brakes to stop the car, that a light rain had just begun to fall, so that the rails were wet, and that the immediate result was that the wheels locked, and the car skidded for some 250 feet before stopping, and that it struck the decedent at the intersection some 40 feet away from the point where the motorman started to apply the brakes. On behalf of the plaintiff there was some testimony of persons observing the collision that the speed of the car did not slacken until after it had struck the automobile. One witness testified that, although the car was going from 30 to 35 miles an hour, it did not slow up until "about 25 feet from where it stopped." This, of course, must have been a mistake. The car weighed 34 tons. From this evidence it is argued that the motorman did not set the brake as the witness had testified, and therefore that he did not use reasonable diligence to avoid a collision after perceiving the danger of the decedent. It will be perceived that the motorman had less than a second of time up to the moment of the collision in which to apply the brakes and get them into full operation on the car. If the car was going at 30 miles an hour, it would traverse a distance of 44 feet in one second of time. If it were going faster, of course it would go farther in one second. It is obvious that there was no time for the operation of the doctrine of the last clear chance. The 40 feet would have been passed before the brakes could have been fully set, so as to check the speed of the car, and the best efforts of the motorman would have been unavailing. We think the court was justified in its decision granting the new trial, upon the ground that the evidence did not justify the application of this doctrine to the case. The decedent was clearly guilty of contributory negligence in trying to cross ahead of the street car, and therefore, unless the doctine of the last clear chance applied, the plaintiff could not recover. Hence the court in its discretion might readily have concluded that the verdict of the jury was based upon that doctrine, and that it was rendered because the court instructed them upon that subject.

The order is affirmed.

SHANLEY v. AMERICAN OLIVE CO. (L. A. 6347.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 20, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⟸32(1)—Owner not bound to keep premises absolutely safe for invitee.

One invited to do work upon the premises of another may recover from the owner for injuries received owing to the dangerous condition of the premises known to the owner, but not known to the person so invited, but such owner is not bound to keep his premises absolutely safe, and is only required to use ordinary care.

2. Negligence ⟸52—Warning invitee of obvious danger unnecessary.

If there is danger attending the work which an invitee is to do on the premises of another, and the danger is not readily apparent to the eye, it is the owner's duty to give reasonable notice or warning thereof, but owner may assume that the invitee will perceive that which would be obvious to him upon the ordinary use of his own senses, and need not warn of obvious danger.

3. Negligence ⟸111(1)—Complaint held insufficient for failure to show conditions requiring owner of premises to warn switchman.

In an action against the owner of premises by a railway switchman, crushed between a building and a gravel car, which he was climbing, a complaint, showing that the danger from the proximity of the building to the track was apparent to ordinary observation, except under unusual conditions, with no averment as to existence of such conditions, held insufficient to charge negligence in failing to give warning.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by John M. Shanley against the American Olive Company for personal injuries. Judgment on the pleadings for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff sues to recover damages arising from bodily injuries to himself, alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant. After the filing of its answer, the defendant moved for judgment in its favor on the pleadings. This motion was sustained by the court, and judgment was entered accordingly. The plaintiff appeals.

The effect of such motion by defendant was to admit the truth of all the allegations of the complaint. The answer must be disregarded. The sole question is whether or not the facts stated in the complaint constitute a cause of action against the defendant. We proceed to state the facts alleged.

The defendant was the owner of land near the railroad of the Pacific Electric Railway Company, on which land it maintained a plant for the buying and selling of olive oils and other products. At the request of the defendant, the Pacific Electric Railway Company had constructed a spur track for the use of the defendant in its business, from the main track of the railroad to and upon the said land. Thereafter the defendant built as a part of its plant a building 40 feet high, 15 feet wide, and 38 feet long. The plaintiff was employed by the Pacific Electric Railway Company as a switchman assisting in the operation of its cars. The Pacific Electric Railway Company agreed to switch a carload of gravel and sand for the defendant onto said spur track. The plaintiff was one of the crew of the railway company engaged in the said switching operation. On the side of said car was a ladder for the use of the crew in climbing upon it. The said building was so near to said spur track that when such a car passed it on the track the clearance between the ladder on the car and the side of the building was "only about 4 to 6 inches." While engaged in switching said gravel car as aforesaid, and while attempting to climb upon the side of the car as it was moving along the spur track, the plaintiff was caught between the car and the side of said building, and was crushed and injured. The defendant knew of the situation of the spur track when it erected said building, and by the exercise of ordinary care could have known of the danger in making such a switching movement of cars thereon. The plaintiff had not been upon the spur track, nor had he been engaged in any work in relation thereto after the erection of said building, and he did not know that the building was there until after said accident and injury.

It is alleged that the accident to plaintiff "was caused alone by the negligence of the defendant in erecting and maintaining the said building in too close proximity to the said railroad spur track and necessary switching thereon as aforesaid," and "by the negligence of the defendant * * * in failing to give notice or warning to the plaintiff of the danger of making the switching movement as aforesaid with the said building so near thereto."

[1, 2] From the facts alleged it appears that the plaintiff, as a member of the crew switching the car, was invited by the defendant to enter its premises for the purpose of switching said car to the spur. A person so invited upon the premises of another may recover from such owner "for any injuries received owing to the dangerous condition of the premises known" to the owner and not known to the person so invited; but such owner "is not bound to keep his premises absolutely safe." 29 Cyc. 453. The responsibility of such owner for the safety of such person in such a case is not absolute; he is only required to use ordinary care for the safety of the persons he invites to come upon the premises. If there is a danger attending upon such entry, or upon the work which the person invited is to do thereon, and such danger arises from causes or conditions not readily apparent to the eye, it is the duty of the owner to give such person reasonable notice or warning of such danger. But such owner is entitled to assume that such invitee will perceive that which would be obvious to him upon the ordinary use of his own senses. He is not required to give to the invitee notice or warning of an obvious danger. 29 Cyc. 471, 474; 26 Cyc. 1213.

[3] It cannot be disputed that a building 40 feet high, 38 feet long, and 15 feet wide, situated alongside of a spur track and within 37 inches of the nearest rail thereof, would be obvious to the sight of any person approaching it under any ordinary circumstances or conditions. Even in the nighttime, unless the night was unusually dark, it would be easily perceived. In the daytime one would have to shut his eyes, or fail to look in that direction, to avoid seeing it. The complaint does not aver that it was nighttime when the accident occurred, or that the building was in any manner obscured or concealed from view, or that the work in which plaintiff was engaged prevented him from looking ahead or from observing his surroundings. Certainly the climbing of the ladder on the side of the car would not prevent him from doing so. The owner, so far as appears, had no reason to apprehend that the plaintiff would not see the building and perceive its proximity to the track. Unless there was some reason for apprehending this, he was under no duty to notify the plaintiff thereof. Where a plaintiff's cause of action rests upon the negligence of the defendant, the complaint must show such negligence. When the facts alleged show that the plaintiff and defendant stand in such relation to each other that the defendant is not chargeable with negligence toward the plaintiff, unless unusual conditions coexist with the conditions alleged, such unusual conditions will not be presumed to exist in favor of the plaintiff, but must be alleged by the plaintiff. Since under the circumstances appearing in the complaint the defendant was not chargeable with negligence toward plaintiff, as one invited upon the premises and standing in no other relation to the defendant, unless the building and the danger therefrom to one engaged in switching cars upon the spur track were not apparent to ordinary observation, and since they would be so apparent, except under extraordinary and unusual conditions, it was necessary for the plaintiff to allege the facts, if any existed, which required of defendant the exercise of the unusual precaution of giving plaintiff warning of the existence of the building and its proximity to the spur track.

The complaint fails to aver such conditions, and hence it shows no negligence on the part of the defendant. The court below did not err in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings.

RAPFOGEL v. KLASSEN. (L. A. 6451.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 18, 1921.)

Costs ⊜22—Courts ⊜90(4)—Attorney's fee not recoverable in slander action where damages are less than $300; construction of statute long followed not disturbed.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, authorizing recovery of costs where plaintiff recovers $300 or over, the attorney's fee allowed to successful plaintiff in an action for libel or slander cannot be allowed where plaintiff recovered only $250 damages, since that construction of the statute was adopted more than 40 years ago, and since that time it has been followed by the courts, and not questioned by the Legislature.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action for slander by Charles N. Rapfogel against Jacob H. Klassen. From an order striking out plaintiff's cost bill after judgment for the plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Janeway & Beach and Lester W. Roth, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Charles M. Ackerman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff recovered a judgment for $250 in an action for slander, begun in the superior court. In due time thereafter he filed a cost bill, claiming only the sum of $100 as counsel fees allowed as costs, under the act of March 23, 1872 (Stats. 1871–72, p. 533). On motion of the defendant, the court below made an order striking out said cost bill. The plaintiff appeals from this order.

Section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that when, in an action in the superior court for the recovery of money or damages, the plaintiff recovers $300 or over, he is also allowed to recover his costs. Since costs are not allowed in any case except where it is so provided by statute, it follows that the plaintiff in such an action is not entitled to recover costs where he recovers less than $300 of his demand.

Section 7 of the act of 1872, above mentioned, provides that in an action for libel or slander, "in case plaintiff recovers judgment, he shall be allowed as costs one hundred (100) dollars, to cover counsel fees, in addition to the other costs." The claim of the plaintiff is that, notwithstanding the general provisions of section 1022 of the Code, under which costs are not to be allowed unless the plaintiff recovers $300 or over, the effect of the act of 1872 is that the plaintiff may recover the $100 as counsel fees, in an action for slander or libel, as costs, regardless of the amount of his recovery for damages. This precise question was presented and decided in Jacobi v. Baur, 55 Cal. 554. It was held in that case that the act of 1872 did not have the effect of allowing costs to the plaintiff in any case where it was not allowed by the general law, as provided in the Code of Civil Procedure, referring to section 1022 aforesaid, and, hence, that the plaintiff was entitled to recover no costs whatever, in an action for slander, where his recovery of damages was less than $300. The plaintiff attacks this decision, and asks that we should overrule it. Inasmuch as it was decided in 1880 and has been followed ever since as the law of the state without question by the courts or amendment by the Legislature, we are not disposed to disturb the law as thus settled and followed. Reasons may be given on either side, of course, but we must presume that they were all considered and determined by the court in the decision of that case. No sufficient reason for overruling the case has been presented, and we therefore adhere to the doctrine.

The judgment is affirmed.

185 Cal. 526

WOOD et al. v. NIEMEYER et al. (L. A. 6427.)

1. Fraud ⊜58(1)—Finding of fraud in exchange of property justified.

In action for fraud, inducing plaintiffs to exchange a ranch for a moving picture theater building, where it was claimed that defendant owner and other defendant, purporting to have possession under assignment of lease, made fraudulent representations as to existence of lease and as to the condition of the moving picture business, evidence held to sustain findings that the lease and the assignment were fictitious and arranged for the purpose of enabling defendant owner to secure a purchaser, and that plaintiffs relied on such representations.

2. Fraud ⊜13(1)—Representations as to lease not bona fide held actionable, regardless of its terms.

Where plaintiffs were induced to exchange their ranch for a building containing a moving picture theater by representations that the building was leased, when, in fact, the lease was not bona fide, but was executed as part of a conspiracy to enable the owner to dispose of the building, such representations were actionable, regardless of the fact that the representations as to the terms of the lease were true.

3. Fraud ⊜59(2) — Measure of damages stated.

In action for fraudulent representations, inducing plaintiffs to exchange their ranch for defendant's property, the measure of damages was the difference between the actual value of the property received by the plaintiffs and the value which it would have had if the defendant's representations as to the value thereof had been true.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1033(9)—That finding of value was not supported by the evidence is harmless, where appellee was entitled to more than he received.

In action for fraud, inducing plaintiffs to exchange their ranch for defendant's city property, insufficiency of evidence to support finding as to actual value of plaintiff's property held immaterial on defendant's appeal from judgment awarding damages on the mistaken theory that the measure of damages was the difference between the actual value of the exchanged properties, where the difference between the actual value received by plaintiffs and the value which it would have had if the representations had been true, the proper measure of damages in such case, was greater than the amount of such judgment.

5. Evidence ⟸113(20)—Land exchange contract, giving valuation of property, admissible as some evidence of its value.

In action for fraud, inducing execution of land exchange contract, the memorandum of the agreement concerning the property to be conveyed, giving the valuation placed upon the property, held admissible as some evidence of its value.

6. Fraud ⟸60—Cost of alterations of building recoverable as damages.

In an action for fraud inducing plaintiffs to exchange their ranch for a moving picture theater building, where it appeared that defendants misrepresented the existence of a lease and the condition of the lessee's moving picture business, when, in fact, the building could not be successfully rented as a moving picture theater, the cost of making alterations to make the building suitable for other purposes was recoverable as an element of damages.

Department 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine, Judge.

Action by Jeanette Kirkham Wood and another against Linus J. Niemeyer and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

James S. Bennett and Harold E. Thomas, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Loewenthal, Loeb, & Walker and Loeb, Walker & Loeb, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LENNON, J. In the month of December, 1917, plaintiff I. A. Wood was the owner of a ranch consisting of 63 acres of land, part in vineyard, part in alfalfa, and the rest unimproved, and defendant Niemeyer owned a building in the city of Los Angeles which contained two small stores and an auditorium and lobby, designed and constructed for use as a moving picture theater. Being desirous of disposing of their respective holdings, each had listed his property with a real estate broker in Los Angeles. By this broker the two parties were brought together, and, after each had inspected the property of the other, an exchange was finally effected, whereby the said plaintiff transferred to defendant Niemeyer his ranch, together with certain horses, cattle, tools, and implements thereon, and received from said defendant the lot and building above mentioned and certain additional property which need not be described. The exchange was made by means of an escrow proceeding, which was completed in January, 1918.

In the latter part of the year 1918, plaintiff I. A. Wood and his wife brought the present action against defendants Niemeyer and Dones for damages for fraud in the transaction above outlined. It appears from the allegations of the complaint that, during the negotiations for the exchange and for the purpose of inducing plaintiffs to consent to and consummate said exchange, defendant Niemeyer represented that the moving picture theater in the building owned by him was rented to a reliable tenant named Dones, who was in possession of the theater under a written assignment of a lease executed by defendant Niemeyer, as lessor, and one Fred Ford, as lessee, on May 31, 1917. The said defendant further stated that the theater was being conducted at a profit by said Dones, and that the latter was paying a monthly rental of $175 under the lease, which would not expire until June 1, 1920. The complaint states that, upon plaintiffs communicating with defendant Dones, informing him of their contemplated purchase and inquiring as to the truth of these statements, defendant Dones stated to plaintiffs that the lease was in full force and effect, and that he was conducting the theater at a profit and doing very well. Plaintiffs believed the statements and representations of defendants, made the exchange in reliance thereon, and were deceived thereby. On January 19, 1918, at the time of the completion of the escrow, defendant Niemeyer paid to plaintiffs the sum of $105, purporting to be a part of the rent of the theater for the month of January, paid to defendant Niemeyer by defendant Dones. Thereafter defendant Dones never paid any rent for the theater, and, on account of the nonpayment of rent, plaintiffs were compelled to cancel the lease on February 6, 1918. The complaint then sets forth that the lease and assignment were executed to Ford and Dones as agents of defendant Niemeyer and as part of a conspiracy for the purpose of enabling defendants to represent that the theater was being profitably conducted by a reliable tenant, and that the statements and representations in respect thereto were made as a part of an agreement between the defendants for the purpose of inducing the purchase by plaintiffs. Plaintiffs allege that no revenue is obtainable from the auditorium as a moving picture theater, and that it must be remodelled so as to render it suitable for other purposes, that the property is not worth what it would have been had defendants' representations as to the lease and rental thereof been true. Plaintiffs seek damages for the alleged fraud.

Both defendants filed answers denying the allegations of the complaint, and defendant Niemeyer filed a cross-complaint, claiming misrepresentations on the part of plaintiffs as to the value of the ranch, and asking damages therefor. The trial court found that the facts in regard to the conspiracy in the ostensible execution and assignment of the lease and the representations made by defendants concerning the same were substantially as pleaded in the complaint. The allegations of the cross-complaint as to the misrepresentations on the part of plaintiffs and resulting damages to defendant Niemeyer were found to be untrue. Judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiffs for damages in the sum of $9,007. Defendants appeal from the judgment upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the findings of the trial court in the following particulars: (1) The making of false representations by defendants; (2) plaintiffs' reliance upon defendants' representations; (3) the value of the respective properties exchanged.

Plaintiff I. A. Wood testified that defendant Niemeyer told him that the theater was being conducted by defendant Dones at a profit, that Dones was occupying the same as assignee of a lease and was paying $175 a month therefor, that Dones was a reliable tenant, and that the rent would be mailed to plaintiff the first of each month so that he would not even have to go to the building to collect the same. The purported lease was delivered to plaintiff, and, when he inquired as to the whereabouts of Ford, the original lessee, he was informed by the defendants that Ford could not be located. Plaintiff further testified that he would not have consummated the deal had he not believed the statements of defendant concerning the existence of the lease, and that the building was rented and bringing in good returns, and was a "good revenue-paying affair." Up to this point plaintiff's testimony was corroborated by Mr. Kious, but the latter was not present at the interviews between plaintiff and Mr. Dones. Plaintiff testified that, before purchasing the property, he inspected it several times and had several conversations with defendant Dones. At the first conversation defendant Dones refused to talk about the property until he had received word from Mr. Niemeyer. He later told plaintiff he had communicated with Mr. Niemeyer, and that the latter had stated that he was thinking of making an exchange with plaintiff, and that plaintiff was free to question Dones concerning the property. Plaintiff then asked about the business, and Dones said that he was running the theater under the lease, which was "absolutely all right," that business was increasing very much, that he expected in a short time to pay off the mortgage on the furniture in the theater, and that he "only regretted that there wasn't more seats in the building than it contained." The exchange was made in January, 1918, and plaintiff testified that Dones never paid any rent thereafter and, when plaintiff went to the theater for the rent, shortly after the 1st of February, 1918, Dones told him that he could not pay the rent; that the theater was not paying, and he could not run it. The theater was then closed, and plaintiff was unable to rent it, and had received only $175 as rent therefor from the time he acquired the building until the date of the trial, which was over a year and a half.

Defendant Dones, who was called as a witness by plaintiffs, subject to the provisions of section 2055 of the Code of Civil Procedure as added by St. 1915, p. 58, testified that he had never seen Ford, the original lessee, that some time prior to the assignment of the lease to him he was called on the telephone by Ford, who said he heard Dones wanted to open the theater, and that Dones then asked Ford to come and talk over the matter. Ford never appeared, but, a few days after this conversation, defendant Niemeyer came to see Dones, and stated that he would obtain an assignment of the lease from Ford to Dones. Dones also testified that, after the assignment, and during the months of December, 1917, and January, 1918, he occupied the theater as tenant, but he admitted his signature to a letter, produced by plaintiffs' counsel, dated April 15, 1918, and addressed to a deputy collector of internal revenue of the United States government. In this letter it was stated that, during the months of December, 1917, and January, 1918, Dones was the manager of the theater in question, that during the time that he was manager Mr. L. J. Niemeyer was the owner of the theater as well as of the furniture and property, both real and personal, that he had nothing to do with the taxes, and, in fact, did not know there was a government tax to be paid. The letter closed with the following statement:

"I hope this letter will make it plain that I have never owned any theater whatsoever, and when I was running said theater, it was simply as manager for Mr. L. J. Niemeyer."

Another witness, called by plaintiffs, a real estate man, testified that, shortly prior to the transaction between plaintiffs and defendants now before the court, defendant Niemeyer had listed the theater property with him. This real estate dealer arranged an exchange of the property for property in Colorado. At the time of the exchange it was represented that the theater was leased to parties by the names of Warner and Sayler. Shortly after the consummation of the exchange the client from Colorado became dissatisfied and wished to rescind. At first defendant Niemeyer declined, but finally consented to a rescission upon being informed by the witness that the latter had discovered that the lease under which the theater was operated at the time of the exchange was not bona fide, the ostensible lessees having been paid by defendant Niemeyer to sign the lease. This testimony was corroborated by that of a witness who had been employed at the theater as a janitor during the times in question.

[1] It is unnecessary to go into further detail, for to do so would be but weighing the evidence, and it is clear from the evidence thus far excerpted that there is ample substantial evidence in support of the findings to the effect that the lease and assignment were fictitious, and arranged for the purpose of enabling defendant Niemeyer to secure a purchaser of the property, and that they in fact accomplished the purpose which they were designed to bring about.

[2] The court found that the representations that the lease would not expire until June 1, 1920, and that the lease called for a monthly rental of $175, were untrue. Defendants complain of this finding, claiming that the terms of the lease show that these representations were true. The court found, in substance, that the lease was not bona fide, but was executed as part of a conspiracy to permit the defendant Niemeyer to dispose of his property, and that the representations that there was a binding lease to a reliable tenant containing the terms mentioned was untrue. The evidence justifies this; if there was not a bona fide lease as represented, the terms of the purported lease were immaterial.

[3-5] The remaining questions concern the findings of the value of the properties exchanged. The findings place the value of the ranch traded by plaintiffs at $26,900, less a mortgage of $6,000, and the value of the personal property transferred with the ranch at $2,500, making a total valuation, after deducting the amount of the mortgage, of $23,400. The value of the theater property which passed to plaintiffs under the exchange was found to be $19,193, less an incumbrance of $8,000, and the additional property transferred was valued at $3,200, making a total of $14,393. The damage awarded was the difference between the value of the property conveyed by plaintiffs and that received by them from defendants, of $9,007. Defendants assert that the evidence did not warrant the placing of a gross valuation of $26,900 upon the ranch. This contention merits but little, if any, consideration, for respondents have demonstrated in their brief that, from the evidence adduced, the trial court should have applied a different measure of damages, and consequently have placed a higher valuation on the ranch than that found. That is to say, the trial court found, upon sufficient and satisfactory evidence, that the defendant Niemeyer represented the value of the theater property to be $35,000, and the aggregate value of certain other real and personal property, which was also involved in the trade, to be $3,200, making the represented aggregate value of the defendant's property to be $38,200. The trial court further found the actual value of the defendant's property involved in the exchange to be but $19,193. Upon these findings and the settled rule of law in this state applicable to actions "for deceit in the sale or exchange of real estate * * * " the plaintiff, as the party found to have been defrauded, was entitled to recover the difference between the actual value of the property which he received and the value which it would have had if the defendant Niemeyer's representations as to the value thereof had been true. Hines v. Brode, 168 Cal. 507, 143 Pac. 729; Blake v. Arp, 180 Cal. 144, 179 Pac. 683; George Cople Co. v. Hindes, 34 Cal. App. 576, 170 Pac. 155. So we say, in unison with counsel for respondent, that appellant has but little cause for complaint as to the amount of damages awarded him when, as a matter of law upon the facts as found, the trial court should have awarded the plaintiff as damages the sum of $19,007, the difference between the misrepresented and the actual value of the defendant's property, rather than the sum of $9,007, which the court did award for damages, upon the mistaken theory that the measure of damages was the difference between the actual market value of the exchanged properties. Defendants contend that there was no evidence to support the finding that the value of the personal property transferred to defendant Niemeyer by plaintiffs was $2,500. It does not appear that the values of either the personal property sold with the ranch or the property which passed to plaintiffs with the theater property were in dispute. However that may be, plaintiffs introduced in evidence a written memorandum which plaintiff I. A. Wood had delivered to defendant Niemeyer at the time of the completion of their negotiations. This writing, which, it was testified, was a memorandum of the agreement of the parties to the exchange, contained a list of the property conveyed by plaintiffs to defendant Niemeyer and plaintiff's estimate of the value thereof, including an itemized statement of the personal property in question at a total valuation of $2,500. Defendants claim that this valuation cannot be considered in determining the value of the personal property, for the reason that in this memorandum the ranch was valued at $31,500, whereas the court found the ranch to be worth only $26,900. Considerable evidence was introduced on both sides as to the value of the real estate, and while the court evidently accepted other evidence as to the value of the ranch, it does not follow that the court disregarded the valuation placed upon the personal property by the plaintiff. Since the memorandum in question was a memorandum of the agreement of the parties concerning the property to be conveyed, the statements therein contained were some evidence of the value of the personal property transferred. Booth v. Pendola, 88 Cal. 36, 23 Pac. 200, 25 Pac. 1101; Bringham v. Knox, 127 Cal. 40, 59 Pac. 198; Lehigh v. Standard Tie Co., 149 Mich. 102, 112 N. W. 481. No evidence was introduced by defendants to contradict or offset these statements.

[6] The final contention of defendants relates to the fact that in valuing the building traded by defendant Niemeyer to plaintiffs the court deducted from the cost of reproduction thereof the cost of altering the building to make it suitable for a use other than as a moving picture theater. There was testimony that no rent could be obtained from the building in the condition in which it stood, because no one would rent the auditorium as a moving picture theater, and that was the only purpose for which it could be used in its then condition. Plaintiffs were induced to accept the building in that condition by the representations of defendants that the building was rented and was producing income as a moving picture theater. Therefore the fact that the building would not yield an income as it then stood and the necessity for altering the same to make it rentable was, under the theory adopted by the trial court, an element to be taken into consideration in fixing the damage resulting from the fraud.

The judgment is affirmed.

SHERMAN v. S. K. D. OIL CO. et al. (L. A. 5696.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 19, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⟸617(2)—Dissolution for failure to pay license tax does not mature obligations.

The dissolution of a corporation by operation of law for failure to pay the license tax does not mature obligations of the corporation not yet due.

2. Corporations ⟸252—Ordinarily creditor's action against stockholders accrues after unsatisfied execution against corporation.

The general rule is that the right of action by a creditor against a stockholder for the unpaid value of the stock does not accrue until judgment has been obtained against the corporation and execution thereon returned nulla bona.

3. Corporations ⟸252—Creditor's action accrues against stockholders without judgment and execution against insolvent corporation.

A creditor's right of action against the stockholders of a corporation accrues without the necessity of obtaining judgment and execution against the corporation, in case the corporation is insolvent and that fact has become manifest by its ceasing to do business.

4. Limitation of actions ⟸58(4)—Creditors of dissolved corporation not required to sue stockholders before maturity of obligations; hence limitations began to run only from maturity of note.

Creditors of corporation which was engaged in the highly speculative enterprise of drilling for oil on leased premises are not required to bring suit against stockholders of the corporation for the unpaid value of their stock before the notes given to creditors have matured, even though before that time the corporation had been dissolved for failure to pay its license tax and was insolvent and had ceased to do business, so that the statute of limitations against a creditor's bill began to run only from the maturity of the notes.

5. Limitation of actions ⟸34(5)—Creditors' suit against stockholders is not to enforce statutory "liability created by law."

A bill by creditors of a corporation against the stockholders to compel them to pay the difference between the value of the property for which the stock was issued and the par value of the stock is not a suit on a "liability created by law," within the meaning of that term as used in Code Civ. Proc. § 359, requiring such actions to be brought within three years.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Liability Created by Law.]

6. Limitation of actions ⟸39(14)—Creditors' suit against stockholders is not for "relief on ground of fraud or mistake."

A suit by creditors of corporation to enforce a liability of the stockholders to pay the full value of the stock issued to them is not one for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake, within Code Civ. Proc. § 338, subd. 4, requiring such an action to be begun within three years after the discovery of the fraud or mistake, but is regulated by Code Civ. Proc. § 343, requiring actions for relief not thereinbefore provided for to be commenced within four years after the cause of action accrued.

7. Corporations ⟸273—Stockholders with notice liable to creditors for entire overissue of stock notwithstanding return of part to corporation.

Where a corporation issued its stock, having a par value of $500,000, in payment for an assignment of an oil lease valued at $125,000, under an arrangement whereby the recipient of the stock immediately returned $375,000 to the treasury for sale by the company, a creditor is entitled to recover the difference between the actual value of the oil lease and the total par value of the stock issued without deduction for that returned to the company.

8. Corporations ⟸240(1) — Creditor with knowledge cannot recover from stockholders for overvaluation.

Creditors who extended credit with full knowledge that corporation's stock was issued for overvalued property cannot recover for such issuance by a creditor's bill in equity.

9. Corporations ⟸240(1) —Notice to creditors that part of the stock had been issued for overvalued property is not notice that all was issued and part returned.

Notice to creditors of a corporation that a stated amount of the stock of the company had been issued for an overvalued oil lease is not notice to them that the entire authorized stock had been so issued and the amount exceeding that stated returned to the company.

10. Corporations ⟸240(1)—Creditor bound by valuation of property for which he knew stock was issued.

The creditor of a corporation, who knew that stock had been issued for an oil lease at an overvaluation, cannot recover from the stockholders the difference between the valuation and the true value of the lease, though he can recover for other stock issued for the lease and returned to the company for sale.

11. Limitation of actions ⟸124—Amended complaint bringing in new defendants is "commencement of action" as to them.

An action is commenced as to defendants, who were not made parties to the original complaint, but were made defendants in the amended complaint, only at the time of the filing of the amended complaint.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Commencement of Action.]

12. Corporations ⟸244(1)—Failure to have stock transferred to buyer leaves seller liable to creditors.

A stockholder, who sold his stock to another but failed to have it transferred on the books of the corporation, remains liable to the creditors of the corporation.

13. Corporations ⟸244(5)—Stockholder must participate or have notice of watered stock to be liable to creditors.

A stockholder in the corporation is not liable to creditors for the issuance of the corporate stock for overvalued property, unless he either participated in the original transaction, or thereafter accepted a transfer of the stock with notice of the transaction.

14. Appeal and error ⟸934(1)—All presumptions are to be indulged in favor of the judgment.

On appeal, all presumptions are to be indulged in favor of the judgment.

15. Corporations ⟸268(1)—Complaint held to show all defendants except one were transferees of stock.

The complaint by a creditor against stockholders of a corporation which alleged that all the stock of the corporation was issued to one of the defendants as the purchase price of an oil lease, and alleged that the other defendants immediately thereafter acquired by a transfer portions of such stock as part of the same transaction, shows by a fair construction that all except the first-named defendant were transferees of the stock.

16. Corporations ⟸268(2)—Answer held to show transferees of stock participated in watering transaction.

An answer to a creditor's bill which alleged that all the stock was issued by the corporation to one defendant, who returned a portion thereof to the corporation and divided the remainder among the other defendants in specified sums, shows that the defendants so answering participated in the original transaction, so as to cure the omission of an allegation to that effect from the creditor's complaint.

17. Appeal and error ⟸916(3)—Reasonable inference of liability from answer not drawn on appeal from judgment for defendants.

Though from an answer to a creditor's bill alleging that two of the defendant stockholders were associates of a third, who was shown by the answer to have participated in the stock-watering transaction, it was a reasonable inference that those two also participated in that transaction, such inference will not be drawn on appeal from a judgment in favor of defendants.

18. Corporations ⟸268(1)—Complaint held not to state cause of action against transferee of watered stock.

A complaint by a creditor against the stockholders of a corporation to recover the amount by which the property for which the corporate stock was issued was overvalued does not state a cause of action against one of the stockholders, who was not alleged to have participated in the stock-watering transaction, and who was not charged with notice of that transaction at the time he acquired his stock.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by W. H. A. Sherman, assignee of Charles A. Meyer, against the S. K. D. Oil Company and 41 stockholders to enforce a stockholders' liability. Judgment for all defendants served except two, who made default, and plaintiff appeals. Judgment affirmed except as to four defendants, and as to those defendants reversed.

Stutsman & Stutsman, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Goodwin & Morgrage, Willoughby Rodman, Simms & Fulwider, and Birney Donnell, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WILBUR, J. This is an action brought to recover upon stockholders' subscription liability. Forty-one stockholders were joined as defendants. Nine of these stockholders appeared and answered, and after trial of the issues judgment was rendered in their favor. Two made default and judgment was rendered against them. The S. K. D. Oil Company, defendant, was organized August 12, 1910, with a capital stock of 500,000 shares of a par value of $1 each. The corporation issued its entire capital stock to G. M. Kyle as fully paid stock in exchange for a lease on 30 acres of land upon which to prospect for oil. As a part of the same transaction it was agreed between Kyle and the corporation that 375,000 shares of such stock should be returned to the corporate treasury to be sold by the corporation for its benefit. It was found by the trial court at the time of the exchange of the property for the stock the oil lease was actually worth $90,000, and that the exchange was made in good faith and in the honest belief on the part of the directors that the property acquired by them was equal in value to the stock given in exchange therefor. It is not entirely clear whether the trial court intended to find that the directors actually believed that the oil lease was worth $500,000 or whether they believed it to be worth $125,000. The evidence, however, is undisputed on the part of the directors that they believed the lease was worth $3,000 per acre, owing to the fact that an oil well producing 1,000 barrels a day had been developed on the adjoining property and that if a successful well was obtained upon the property it would be worth much more. The finding of the trial court of good faith in the exchange of said stock is not supported by the evidence, for the directors' own testimony shows that in their judgment $90,000 was the outside value of said lease.

Plaintiff's cause of action is based upon three promissory notes assigned to him, the first promissory note dated October 15, 1911, for $4,280.34, bearing 7 per cent. interest, due February 16, 1912, payable to Fairbanks, Morse & Co.; the second note was to J. F. Lucey Company for $2,780.23, dated November 13, 1911, payable 90 days after date, and bearing 7 per cent. interest; the third note was dated November 13, 1911, payable 60 days after date, for $2,038.53, at 7 per cent. interest.

The plaintiff alleged that on November 30, 1911, the corporate charter was forfeited for nonpayment of the license tax, and that at the same time "the corporation became insolvent and bankrupt and unable to pay its debts and without properties to pay the promissory notes belonging to the plaintiff, and ever since that time has been and now is wholly insolvent and bankrupt." The court further found that such insolvency and cessation of business was on November 30, 1911, known to the payees named in each of the promissory notes. The trial court held that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. This conclusion was sustained by the District Court of Appeal, Second District, Second Division, which held that the statute of limitations began to run as soon as the corporation dissolved, to wit, November 30, 1911, and, therefore, that plaintiff's cause of action was barred on all three promissory notes. This conclusion by the District Court of Appeal was based upon the proposition that the mere dissolution of the corporation for failure to pay its license tax at once matured all obligations against it, regardless of whether or not they were due. The petition for transfer to this court was granted because of our doubt as to the correctness of this ruling.

[1] It seems clear that the dissolution of the corporation by operation of law for failure to pay the license tax would not have the effect of maturing its obligations. The policy and effect of the laws of this state forfeiting the corporate charter for failure to pay a license tax are discussed in the recent case of Hanson v. Choynski, 180 Cal. 275, 180 Pac. 816, and it is unnecessary to repeat that discussion. It was there held that creditors of such a corporation must ordinarily pursue their usual remedies at law against the directors or trustees of the corporation. There is no statutory authority for holding that the notes, bonds, and other obligations of a corporation become due upon its dissolution for nonpayment of license tax, and the policy of the law is opposed to such a conclusion, as is clearly shown in Hanson v. Choynski, supra. If we regard this suit as an action upon three promissory notes against the defendant corporation, or its directors and trustees, the action is not barred.

Is the action barred against the stockholders on their liability in equity as holders of watered stock before action is barred against the corporation or its representatives on its note?

[2] The general rule is that the right of action by a creditor against a stockholder on such liability does not accrue until judgment first has been obtained against the corporation and execution thereon is returned nulla bona. Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448. Ordinarily, therefore, a creditor may wait up to four years after the maturity of his promissory note before bringing suit against the corporation, and upon obtaining judgment and return of execution nulla bona may thereafter bring a creditor's bill in equity against the stockholders. The statute of limitations on this latter cause of action would not begin to run until the return of the execution nulla bona.

[3] There is an exception, however, to the rule requiring that judgment be first had against the corporation in cases where the corporation is insolvent. In such a case the creditor may bring an action against the corporation and stockholder without first securing a judgment against the corporation and a return of execution nulla bona. "Insolvency or return of execution nulla bona is prerequisite to maintain an action against stockholders on their subscription liabilities." Merchants' Mutual Adjusting Agency v. Davidson, 23 Cal. App. 274, 137 Pac. 1091; Helliwell on Stock and Stockholders, § 450; Clark and Marshall on Private Corporations, p. 2459, notes, 513, 514; Id. p. 3867; Id. p. 2474, note 586; 1 Cook on Corporations, § 108, p. 380; Id. § 200, p. 532; Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 3888; 14 C. J. § 1725, p. 1103. Obviously there is some difficulty in determining the exact date when the statute of limitations begins to run in favor of the stockholders in cases of insolvency, in the absence of any assignment for the benefit of creditors, or bankruptcy proceedings to fix the date of insolvency. In disposing of the contention that insolvency per se started the statute of limitations running in favor of a stockholder against a creditor's bill, the Supreme Court of Ohio, in Barrick v. Gifford, 47 Ohio St. 180, 24 N. E. 259, 21 Am. St. Rep. 798, aptly stated:

"Such a rule would be not only uncertain, but deceptive to the creditor. The right to commence the action would be a matter of speculation. It could not be determined before bringing the action and taking an account whether the company was indebted in a sum greater than its assets would pay or not. A rule of certainty, applicable to such cases, should be adopted. The true rule, and that which is usually adopted where the company has property and continues to do business, is to require the creditor first to obtain a judgment against the corporation and cause an execution to be issued, and, if it is returned not levied for want of goods, then the creditor has the right to commence suit against the stockholders upon their individual liability, and the statute of limitations begins to run against the right of action from that time, and not earlier.

"So long as the company is possessed of corporate property and continues to transact its business, the stockholders should be regarded as estopped from averring that the right of action against them as individuals accrued, by reason of the insolvency of the company, at a period earlier than the return of an execution unsatisfied issued upon the judgment of a creditor of the company. Stockholders have the means of knowing the condition of their company much better than creditors, and, if the company continues to do business upon an insolvent basis, it should be regarded as permitted by the stockholders, as the directors and officers of the company derive their authority from and are the agents of the stockholders."

In Schofield v. Turner, 213 Pa. 548, 62 Atl. 1068, it was said:

"A misapprehension of what was decided in Swearingen v. Dairy Co., 198 Pa. 68, is doubtless responsible for this appeal. * * * This is what was decided in that case, summed up in the following sentence: 'The right of action of the plaintiff, whatever it was, accrued upon the fact of insolvency of the dairy company shown by the assignment for the benefit of creditors and the statute of limitations began to run from that date.'"

In Helliwell on Stock and Stockholders, § 450, it is said that such a creditor's bill may be brought against stockholders "where it appears that the corporation is insolvent, has entirely ceased to do business, has made an assignment for the benefit of creditors, and has neither money, credit, nor materials with which to do business or pay its debts."

In Chilberg v. Siebenbaum, 41 Wash. 663, 84 Pac. 598, the court distinguishes between the right of action against the corporation on the original debt and the right of action to recover against the stockholder on a creditor's bill in case of insolvency. It is there held that the bringing of an action against the corporation does not suspend the running of the statute of limitations against the stockholders until the recovery of the judgment, because judgment and return nulla bona are unnecessary where it is shown the same would be futile. In that case there was no property or assets of any kind belonging to the corporation. The court there said:

"From the foregoing statement it will appear that the only question presented on this appeal is, When does the right of action in favor of the creditors of an insolvent corporation, as against its stockholders, to enforce the stock subscription liability, accrue? We are of opinion that such right of action accrues, at least, as soon as the corporation disposes of all of its property and assets, ceases to be a going concern and becomes notoriously insolvent, and that is as far as we are required to go in this case. * * *

"The appellant contends, however, that his action against the stockholders is based on his judgment against the corporation, not upon the original corporate indebtedness which is merged in the judgment, and that his cause of action against the stockholders did not accrue until the recovery of his judgment against the corporation and the return of nulla bona, or, at least, until the recovery of the judgment. If this be true, it must be for one of two reasons; first, because his right of action against the stockholders did not accrue until he exhausted his legal remedies against the corporation by the recovery of a judgment and a return of nulla bona; or, second, because the stockholders continue liable as long as a liability exists against the corporation, and cannot interpose the statute of limitations as a defense, unless the statute has also run in favor of the corporation. What we have said is sufficient to demonstrate the fallacy of the first proposition. An action of this kind is in the nature of a creditor's bill, and, in the absence of statute, it is not necessary to first obtain a judgment against the corporation, when it is otherwise shown that such a proceeding would be utterly futile and subserve no useful purpose. Benham v. Ham, 5 Wash. 128, 31 Pac.

459, 34 Am. St. Rep. 851; Cook, Corporations, § 200, and authorities above cited. Nor does the liability of the stockholder continue as long as the creditors may be able to keep their obligations alive against the corporation."

The Supreme Court of Arkansas has adopted the rule that actual notice of the corporation's insolvency would start the statute of limitations running in favor of a stockholder.

In the case of Lester v. Bemis Lumber Co., 71 Ark. 379, 74 S. W. 518, that court said:

"The period of limitation to an action based on the written subscription of a stockholder in a corporation is five years, and commences to run whenever an execution has been issued against the corporation and returned unsatisfied, or whenever the creditor has notice that the corporation is insolvent."

In the case of Lester v. Bemis Lumber Co., supra, that court holds that the statute of limitations, if no execution had been issued and returned, begins to run when a creditor has notice of the insolvency of the corporation, and that such notice would probably be presumed when the insolvency of the corporation became a matter of general notoriety. In this case it is held that the corporation had been insolvent more than the statutory period before the suit was brought, but the fact was not generally known, and hence the suit brought was in time.

In the case of Harmon v. Page, 62 Cal. 448, supra, the cause of action against the corporation accrued May 9, 1873. Judgment against the corporation recovered May 2, 1878. A complaint was filed on stockholders' liability August 30, 1878. The court quotes with approval from Curry v. Woodward, 53 Ala. 376, as follows:

"'Until the call was made, or there was an evident disbandment of the company and a relinquishment of business, the statute of limitations would not begin to run.' To the same effect is the case of Cherry et al. v. Lamar et al., 58 Ga. 541, in which a bill was filed by the creditors of a corporation to subject to the payment of their judgment against it certain unpaid stock subscribed by the defendants."

In 1 Cook on Corporations, § 200, p. 532, it is said:

"The corporate funds are the corporate creditors' primary resources, even where the liability of the individual stockholder is declared to be primary, like that of an original contractor or partner. Where, however, the corporation has been adjudged a bankrupt, the remedy against the corporation need not first be exhausted. Such, also, has been held to be the rule where the corporation is notoriously insolvent, or has been formally dissolved. * * *"

See, also, 4 Thompson on Corporations (2d Ed.) § 3888.

The rule is thus stated in 14 Corpus Juris, p. 1103, § 1725:

"Where Liability Secondary. Where the stockholders' liability is secondary, as a general rule, the creditor's right of action against the stockholders on their statutory liability does not accrue, so as to set the statute of limitations running, until judgment has been recovered against the corporation, or until such judgment has been recovered and execution thereon against the corporation has been returned unsatisfied. Where, however, the corporation has done, or suffered to be done, any act which would render judgment and process against it impossible or of no avail, the creditors' right of action against the stockholders may accrue without first obtaining judgment and execution against the corporation; and, within this rule, limitations begin to run in favor of stockholders from the time the corporate property is placed in the hands of an assignee in insolvency or bankruptcy, or of a receiver, or the corporation has been dissolved, or suspended business, or from the time when by some other legal proceeding its property has been put in process of application to the payment of its debts. But the creditors' right of action against the stockholders does not accrue upon the corporation becoming insolvent in the sense, simply, that its property is insufficient for the payment of its liabilities; nor on the appointment of a receiver for the corporation merely for the purpose of carrying on its business, and not on account of its insolvency, or to wind up its affairs."

[4] In the case at bar three things co-operated on November 30, 1911, to the accrual of a cause of action against the stockholders; the dissolution of the corporation, the insolvency thereof, and notice of the latter to the creditor. Unless, however, the creditor was bound to commence an action against the stockholders before his right accrued against the corporation, we may assume the dates when the plaintiff's rights of action accrued against the corporation as the dates when such rights also accrued against the stockholders. In considering this matter it should be borne in mind that the corporation was never declared an insolvent or bankrupt, and that the dissolution resulted as a penalty for nonpayment of a license tax without judicial proceedings of any kind; that no assignment was made for the benefit of creditors; and that it was a mere coincidence that the bankruptcy of the corporation and the dissolution thereof by operation of law occurred at the same time. Plaintiff's notes only ran 60 and 90 days. The credit was extended only a few weeks before the dissolution of the corporation upon representations of the stockholders and directors as to the status of the corporation. No case has been called to our attention and we have found none in which it has been held that the right of the creditor against the stockholder matured and the statute of limitations began to run before his obligation against the corporation matured. While it is true that a creditor may bring a suit against the stockholders upon the ground that the corporation is insolvent, the question we have to deal with is, When must the creditor bring his action? In this case we are dealing with a corporation carrying on a speculative business. The indebtedness to plaintiff's assignors was for materials used in sinking an oil well. The financial status of the corporation depended upon the success of its well-drilling operations. It was drilling in territory that was regarded as proved territory, and it could not be ascertained until the oil stratum was reached or until the stratum which was supposed contained oil had been passed whether or not the venture was a success or failure. The plaintiff after November 30, 1911, had the right to sue the trustees of the defunct corporation upon the obligations due to him and to attach the property of the corporation as soon as his claims were due. Under such circumstances, there being no assignment to creditors and nothing to prevent the plaintiff from pursuing his legal remedies against the corporation, or its trustees, it cannot be said that his right of action in equity against the stockholders to recover for fraudulent overvaluation of the property issued in exchange for their stock would acrue until it was manifest that the corporation or its trustees did not have sufficient property subject to attachment to pay the plaintiff's claim in full. It would seem clear that under the circumstances of this case the creditor was fully justified in waiting to bring his action against the corporation and the stockholders until the maturity of its obligation against the corporation. We are of opinion, then, that the cause of action against the stockholders for their amount due, because of the issuance of the watered stock, accrued when the notes became due.

[5] The corporation could not have successfully interposed the statute of limitations to a suit brought by the plaintiff upon the promissory notes in question at the time this suit was brought, to wit, February 11, 1916, except as to the third cause of action on the note which matured January 12, 1912. As it is conceded by the appellant that the statute of limitations had run upon this last-mentioned note, we need not give it further consideration. As to the first notes, assuming that the statute of limitations on the action upon the notes against the corporation and the statute of limitations upon the action against the stockholders were running concurrently because of the insolvency of the corporation, it remains to consider whether or not that period lapsed before the bringing of the suit. If that period is four years or more, the statute of limitations had not run as against the first two notes. If the period is three years or less, the statute has run as to all the notes. The defendants plead practically all the sections fixing limitations upon actions, and the court found in accordance with the allegations of the answer. In the argument it is claimed that section 359 of the Code of Civil Procedure applies to the action against the stockholders. This statute regulates the time for commencing actions against stockholders of a corporation to enforce a liability created by law, and provides that such an action must be brought within three years after the discovery by the aggrieved party of the facts upon which the penalty of forfeiture attached or the liability was created. Of course, in one sense every liability is created by law and by the acts of the parties. In that sense, and only in that sense, is this action upon a liability created by law. Obviously, the section does not apply to suits in equity brought to enforce the implied obligation of the stockholder to pay the par value of the stock owned by him.

[6] It is suggested that section 338, subdivision 4, applies. This section provides that an action must be begun within three years "for relief on the ground of fraud or mistake." The cause of action in such case is not to be deemed to have accrued until the discovery, by the aggrieved party, of the facts constituting the fraud or mistake. In one sense the action at bar is an action based upon fraud, that is to say, upon the fraud of the incorporators in accepting property at an overvaluation. This section makes the cause of action mature when the fraud is discovered, and is not applicable to the case at bar, where the right of action does not arise upon the discovery of the fraud nor before the assets of the corporation are exhausted. This is an equitable action in the nature of a creditor's bill, and the time for filing such action is regulated by section 343 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides: "An action for relief not hereinbefore provided for must be commenced within four years after the cause of action shall have accrued." This section applies to equitable actions, such as a creditor's bill. See discussion in Piller v. S. P. Ry., 52 Cal. 42; Hecht v. Slaney, 72 Cal. 363, 366, 14 Pac. 88; Nougues v. Newlands, 118 Cal. 102, 106, 50 Pac. 386.

It follows from the foregoing that the plaintiff's action as to the first two promissory notes, which matured within four years from the commencement of the action, is not barred by the statute of limitations.

[7] It remains to consider the effect of the initial transaction by which the corporation issued its entire corporate stock and later to consider the effect of that situation upon appellant's rights against the respondent stockholders. The pleadings of the defendants, as well as their arguments before this court, would indicate that they do not claim that the lease in question was worth $500,000, or any other sum in excess of $125,000. As between the corporation and Mr. Kyle, who transferred the lease to the corporation in exchange for all its stock, the corporation was only out 125,000 shares of stock for the lease. In any action between the corporation or its stockholders and the vendor of the lease, 125,000 shares, no doubt, would be taken to be the purchase price of the lease in determining whether or not the corporation had been defrauded. We are not considering the rights of the corporation. It is bound by the action of its directors. Nor are we considering the rights of the stockholders against the corporation or the assignor of the lease. We are considering the transaction solely from the standpoint of a creditor. As between the creditors of the corporation and the stockholders, the purpose, and the only purpose, of the transaction by which 375,000 shares of stock was issued by the corporation to the assignor of the lease and by him reconveyed to the corporation, was to enable the corporation to sell such shares as paid-up stock for less than par. If the land conveyed to the corporation was reasonably believed by the directors to be worth $500,000, the stock would have been thereby paid up, and it would make no difference whether the corporation subsequently sold the stock returned to it for more or less than par. As between the creditor of the corporation and the stockholders, the validity of the transaction does not depend upon the fact that the corporation subsequently received back a large proportion of the stock originally issued in payment for the lease. The rights of the parties must be determined with reference to the original transaction, from which it appears that the directors issued $500,000 of stock for $90,000 worth of property. Under our decisions the stockholders who received this stock in exchange for the property and those subsequently taking the stock with notice of the original transaction were bound to make good the difference between the value of the property transferred and the par value of the stock to creditors extending credit without notice of such overvaluation. Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., 194 Pac. 11.

[8, 9] At this juncture we pause to consider a point raised by the defendants, which, if determined in their favor, will require the affirmance of the judgment. It is claimed by the defendants that the creditors who extended credit to the corporation had full knowledge of the issuance of the stock at an overvaluation. If the creditor had full knowledge of the transaction, he could not recover in a court of equity on a creditor's bill. Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., supra. It was found by the trial court that all the facts with reference to the issuance of said stock were fully known to J. F. Lucey Company, in whose favor the last two notes were executed, before it extended the credit to the corporation, and that such facts were fully known to the payee of the first note at least four months before the note was executed. All of said notes were executed in payment of an antecedent obligation. This finding, however, is not supported by the evidence. It appears therefrom that the creditors to whom these notes were given were informed that the corporation had issued 125,000 shares of its stock in payment for the oil lease. This statement was far short of informing them that 500,000 shares of stock had been issued for the oil lease. Of course, if the transaction amounted to a sale of the 125,000 shares of stock for the lease, the representations were substantially true and plaintiff could not recover, but, as we have held, the two transactions were not equivalent so far as creditors were concerned.

[10] As to the second action, based upon the notes to the J. F. Lucey Company, as the original obligation was incurred in the belief that 125,000 shares of stock had been issued in payment for the lease, the plaintiff as to that note would be estopped to claim that the lease was worth less than $125,000, and would be restricted in his recovery to the difference between $125,000 and $500,000 prorated among the various stockholders. The question as to whether or not the plaintiff is similarly restricted with reference to the note issued to the Fairbanks, Morse Company is somewhat different, because in that case the credit upon which the liability was founded was extended before the creditor had notice of the situation. However, as the promissory note was accepted in payment of the precedent obligation, so the court finds, with knowledge that the property had been taken by the corporation at a valuation of $125,000, the same rule would apply to the plaintiff on that cause of action.

It remains to consider the cause of action against the respective stockholders who appeared and defended the action, and, in order to discuss that question, it will be necessary to state further facts in regard to the several defendants involved.

[11] The defendants W. H. Davies and Birney Donnell were not made parties to the original complaint, but were first made defendants in the amended complaint filed September 28, 1916. At that time the notes against the corporation had been due for more than four years. The statute of limitations on the right of action against the stockholders was running at the same time, and hence was operating at the time of the filing of the amended complaint, which, so far as they are concerned, is taken as the date of the beginning of the action. Jeffers v. Cook, 58 Cal. 147, 150; Matteson v. Wagoner, 147 Cal. 739, 746, 82 Pac. 436. The judgment in their favor must therefore be affirmed.

Of the 125,000 shares of stock which were issued in consideration of the lease and were retained by the assignor, G. M. Kyle, 15,625 shares were transferred to defendant P. E. Spellacy, the same number to defendant T. Spellacy, and 31,070 shares to defendant J. F. Davies. These shares were owned by said defendants from that time until the trial of the action. In the same manner 15,625 shares were issued to J. M. Danziger and afterwards sold by him in good faith to J. F. Davies, but the transfer was not recorded on the books of the corporation, and at the time of the trial said shares of stock still stood on the books of the corporation in the name of J. M. Danziger. In the same manner 15,625 shares were issued to W. Morgrage. He sold and transferred to defendant Fred C. Clift 1,875 shares of stock, to defendants W. H. Davies and Birney Donnell 2,500 shares each, and to persons unknown 3,750 shares, all of which were transferred upon the books of the corporation. Defendant W. Morgrage also sold the balance of 5,000 shares to J. F. Davies, but no transfer was made upon the books of the corporation, and the same remained in the name of defendant W. Morgrage up to the time of the trial.

[12] The failure to make the transfer on the books of the corporation requires that such transfer be disregarded in considering the rights of a creditor of a corporation, for the stockholder remains liable to the creditors of the corporation in the absence of a proper transfer. Realty & Rebuilding Co. v. Rea et al., 194 Pac. 1024; McCarthy v. More, 181 Cal. 738, 186 Pac. 140; Geary Street P. & O. R. Co. v. Bradbury Estate Co., 179 Cal. 46, 175 Pac. 457; Shean v. Cook, 180 Cal. 92, 179 Pac. 185, 5 A. L. R. 1042. See, also, Security Commercial & Savings Bank of El Centro v. Imperial Water Co., 192 Pac. 22.

As the liability of defendants Birney Donnell and W. H. Davies, transferees of stock, has been disposed of on the statute of limitations, it is not necessary to further consider the assignment of stock to them.

[13] It is apparent from an examination of the record that the parties in the preparation of their appeals in the trial of the case and the court in its finding did not have in mind the distinction between subscribers for stock and purchasers and transferees of watered stock pointed out in Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., supra. That case was decided subsequent to the filing of briefs and argument of this case in this court. It was there announced that, in an action to recover the difference between overvalued property and the par value of the stock in case of watered stock, it was necessary to prove that the holders of such stock participated in the transaction, or, if transferees, that they acquired this stock with notice, actual or constructive, of such fraudulent overvaluation.

[14] As all presumptions are to be indulged in in favor of the judgment, we will examine the record with a view to applying the rules announced in Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., supra, to the balance of the defendants. The complaint alleges that all of the 500,000 shares of stock were issued to G. M. Kyle in full payment of the purchase price of the oil lease, as fully paid stock. It is further alleged: That at said day and date and at said meeting of said board of directors, or immediately thereafter, but as a part of the same transaction, the said corporation, by its officers duly authorized, executed and delivered certain of the said shares of the said capital stock, by issuing certificates therefor to the following named defendants, all of whom subscribed for or acquired by transfer and at all times herein mentioned owned and now own the said shares represented by the said certificates, as follows: J. M. Danziger, 15,625 shares; J. F. Davies, 31,250 shares; G. M. Kyle, 240 shares; L. B. Kyle, 31,010 shares; W. Morgrage, 5,000 shares; P. E. Spellacy, 15,625 shares; T. Spellacy, 15,625 shares; W. H. Davies, 2,500 shares; Birney Donnell, 2,500 shares; and Frederick C. Clift, 1,875 shares. In addition to these defendants who appeared, answered, and are respondents upon appeal, the balance of the entire list of stockholders of the corporation is included in the above statement, as is shown by the succeeding paragraph of the complaint, in which it is alleged that the foregoing constitute all the stockholders of the defendant corporation.

[15] It would be a fair construction of this complaint, and one that must be indulged in in support of the judgment in favor of the other defendants, to conclude that all of the defendants named in the allegation, other than G. M. Kyle, acquired their stock as transferees. The recital "but as a part of the same transaction" in the foregoing allegation is hardly sufficient to justify the conclusion that all the stockholders of the corporation specifically set forth in this paragraph participated in the original transaction, as it is elsewhere alleged that 500,000 shares of stock were issued to G. M. Kyle.

[16] However, in the joint answer of J. M. Danziger, Wilbert Morgrage, P. E. Spellacy, T. Spellacy, G. M. Kyle, and J. F. Davies, it is affirmatively alleged that G. M. Kyle was the owner of the above-mentioned lease, dated July 7, 1910; that on July 8, 1910, it was agreed between defendants G. M. Kyle, J. F. Davies, P. E. Spellacy, and T. Spellacy that the defendant corporation should be formed, and that Kyle should assign said lease to the corporation and that said corporation should issue in the name of said Kyle 499,995 shares of its capital stock, 249,995 of which said shares should be retained by said Davies as fully paid and nonassessable and by him divided between himself and his associates, and the balance of 250,000 shares returned to the treasury of said corporation, to be sold by it and the proceeds arising therefrom to be used for the benefit of said corporation; that on July 8, 1910, the corporation was formed and Kyle assigned his lease to the corporation, which caused to be issued and delivered to said Kyle 449,995 shares of its capital stock as fully paid and nonassessable; that said Kyle immediately returned to the corporation 250,000 shares of said stock. The finding of the trial court upon the matter under discussion is as follows:

"That thereafter and on August 16, 1910, said G. M. Kyle offered to sell and convey said lease to said S. K. D. Oil Company for 500,000 shares of its capital stock fully paid, and when so issued to immediately return to the treasury of said company, for the use and benefit of said company, 375,000 shares of said stock. Thereupon the said corporation, at a meeting regularly called for that purpose, accepted said proposition by resolution regularly passed and spread upon the minutes of said corporation, and on the same day, to wit, August 16, 1910, said G. M. Kyle assigned, transferred, and delivered said lease to said S. K. D. Oil Company, and said S. K. D. Oil Company thereupon caused to be issued and delivered to said G. M. Kyle 500,000 shares of its capital stock as fully paid, and said G. M. Kyle on said day returned to the treasury of said company 375,000 shares of said stock, to be sold and the proceeds thereof to be applied to the use and benefit of said corporation; the remaining 125,000 shares of said stock so issued to him as fully paid was then divided as follows, to wit, to T. Spellacy, 15,625 shares; to G. M. Kyle, 31,420 shares; to J. F. Davies, 31,070 shares; to P. E. Spellacy 15,625 shares; to L. B. Kyle 10 shares; to J. M. Danziger 15,625 shares; to Wilbert Morgrage 15,625 shares, all of which shares were issued in the respective amounts to said parties respectively, and since said issuance have stood and now stand on the books of said company in the names of said respective parties, except as to the stock of said Morgrage, as hereinafter in these findings set out. * * *" (Italics ours.)

[17] The defect of the complaint in failing to sufficiently allege that the respondents participated in the original transaction is cured so far as the defendants T. Spellacy, P. E. Spellacy, J. F. Davies, and G. M. Kyle are concerned by the affirmative allegations of their answer. We might also infer that W. H. Davies and Wilbert Morgrage, who each received 15,625 shares, were associates of J. F. Davies, within the meaning of that expression as used in their answer, in the light of the finding that the stock was divided between them and the above-mentioned defendants. Such a conclusion, however, would be a mere inference. There is no allegation in the complaint, no direct admission in the answer, and no express finding holding that W. H. Davies and Wilbert Morgrage participated in the original transaction or received their stock with knowledge thereof. All inferences are to be drawn most strongly in favor of the judgment upon appeal, and for that reason the judgment in their favor must be affirmed. As to the defendants T. Spellacy, G. M. Kyle, J. F. Davies, and P. E. Spellacy the judgment must be reversed.

[18] It remains to consider the case of the respondent Frederick C. Clift. As already stated, he purchased 1,875 shares of stock from defendant Morgrage and caused the transfer to be recorded upon the books of the corporation. There is no allegation in the complaint that he took this stock with knowledge or notice of the original transaction. He alleges in his answer that he purchased the stock on the open market paying therefor the full market price. He does not allege whether he received such stock with or without notice of the original transaction, and there is no finding upon that question. As the complaint fails to state a cause of action against him, the judgment in his favor must be affirmed. Rhode v. Dock-Hop Co., supra.

The judgment of dismissal included all the defendants other than two who had made default, although many of the defendants had not been served and had not appeared in the action. No point, however, was made upon this feature of the judgment, and it need not receive further consideration.

The judgment will be affirmed, except as to the defendants P. E. Spellacy, T. Spellacy, G. M. Kyle, and J. F. Davies; as to the said named defendants the judgment is reversed.

1. Appeal and error ⊜907(3)—Assumed on appeal on judgment roll that evidence was ample to sustain finding.

On an appeal upon the judgment roll alone, the appellate court must assume that the evidence was ample to sustain all the findings made by the trial judge.

2. Escrows ⊜14(1)—Complaint held to state cause of action against depositary.

A complaint, alleging that plaintiff deposited a note and money with one defendant to be delivered to other defendants when a lease had been secured and delivered to the depositary for the plaintiff, and that the property deposited was delivered to the other defendants without their having complied with their agreement, and after plaintiff had demanded a return of the deposited property, held to state a cause of action in trover, upon which a judgment could be predicated for damages against the defendant; the value of the property appearing by the very description of its kind, and it not being necessary to specifically allege the particular amount of value.

3. Escrows ⊜14(1)—Liability of depositary for damages arising from violation of duty.

One with whom was deposited money and note to be delivered to certain persons upon delivery of a certain lease, etc., was equally liable in damages with the persons to whom he delivered such deposited property, without their having complied with their agreement, being charged as depositary with the duty of obeying the instructions of the parties as to the delivery of the property deposited with him, a violation of which duty would result in a liability being cast upon him for damages to the person who might suffer injury, and hence depositary was properly joined with defendants in an action for damages for the wrongful conversion of the deposited property.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1170(1)—Misjoinder of parties no ground for reversal, in absence of miscarriage of justice.

If a liability for the amount recovered existed against a defendant, the fact that he may have been improperly joined with other parties as defendant in the action wherein the recovery was secured must be deemed to be without prejudice to any substantial right, and a reversal may not be had, under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Grover C. Trask against Ramon B. Garza and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

E. L. Johnson and Ralph F. Twombly, both of San Diego, for appellants.

J. K. Stickney, of San Diego, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This appeal is taken by the defendants from an adverse judgment, and is presented upon the judgment roll alone.

The points urged as ground for reversal rest upon the ruling of the trial judge in refusing to sustain a demurrer interposed by the defendants to the second amended complaint of the plaintiff. The grounds of that demurrer to be here considered are: (1) That said complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action as against defendants or either of them; (2) that there was a misjoinder, in that appellant Johnson was improperly included as a defendant in the action.

The plaintiff alleged in his complaint that in September, 1919, a written agreement was entered into between plaintiff and the two Garzas, whereby plaintiff agreed to buy, and said defendants agreed to sell, a certain poolhall and business, with the furnishings and fixtures, for the sum of $700. Other terms and conditions were alleged in the complaint to be as follows:

"Plaintiff to execute his promissory note for the sum of $350.00 payable to said defendants Garza, sixty days after date and deliver the same together with $350.00 in cash to the defendant E. L. Johnson; and defendants, Garza, to execute to plaintiff a bill of sale of said business, furnishings, fixtures and equipment and deliver same to the said E. L. Johnson, all of which were to be held by the said E. L. Johnson for a period of time not to exceed 7 days; that within said 7 days defendants Garza were to secure a lease from the owner of the building in which said business, furnishings, fixtures and equipment were located in favor of plaintiff for a period of one year from and after date of said sale, at a monthly rental of $40.00 and deliver same to the said E. L. Johnson; and upon the delivery of said lease to the said E. L. Johnson within the time aforesaid and not otherwise, the said E. L. Johnson to deliver said $350.00 in cash and said promissory note to the said defendants Garza and the said bill of sale and the said lease to plaintiff; and if the said lease was not so delivered to the said E. L. Johnson within the said ten days' time the said E. L. Johnson should redeliver to plaintiff the said promissory note and $350.00 in cash upon demand of plaintiff so to do, and to return said bill of sale to said defendants Garza."

[1-4] Plaintiff further alleged that he executed his promissory note and delivered the same to Johnson, together with $350.00 in cash, upon the express condition that it should not be delivered to the Garzas until the lease referred to in the allegations quoted had been secured and delivered to Johnson for the plaintiff; that Johnson was a practicing attorney, and was fully informed by all the parties of the conditions upon which the note and cash were deposited with him, and that he knew of the agreement and the terms requiring him to dispose of the money and papers in the manner aforesaid. It is then alleged that the Garzas did not, within 10 days, or at all, secure the lease for the plaintiff which they had agreed to furnish. It is further alleged that defendant Johnson, notwithstanding the conditions of the agreement under which the deposit was made with him, and notwithstanding that plaintiff "repeatedly notified" said Johnson not to deliver the note and cash to the defendants, did before the expiration of 10 days deliver the note and money of the plaintiff to defendants Garza, in violation of the agreement and in violation "of his instructions given him by both plaintiff and defendants Garza." Further allegations of the complaint set out that plaintiff had repeatedly demanded of defendants Johnson and Garzas that they return to him his note and money, which demand had at all times been refused. Prayer for judgment was, first, for the sum of $350, with legal interest thereon; second, that the defendants be required to deliver up the promissory note; that the same be canceled and that, if this could not be procured to be done, then that plaintiff have judgment for the sum of $350 with legal interest, and for costs of suit. The court made its findings determining the facts in accordance with the allegations of the complaint, with the additional findings that plaintiff had tendered back to the defendants all the personal property that he had received, and had offered to make accounting for all proceeds of the business during the time he had had possession, and that the defendants Garza had disposed of the promissory note of the plaintiff. The judgment was for the principal sum demanded, with the proviso that, if within ten days defendants should file a bond to indemnify plaintiff against liability upon the promissory note which had been converted by them, then the amount of the judgment should be reduced to the sum of $362.25, which sum represented a recovery of the cash payment made by the plaintiff under his agreement with Garza, together with interest. Having the judgment roll only to look to, we must assume, of course, that the evidence was ample to sustain all the findings made by the trial judge. We think that the complaint stated sufficient facts upon which to predicate a judgment for damages against the defendants. The defendants in effect were charged with having converted the property of the plaintiff in violation of their duty under the contract, and were hence liable for all damages which the plaintiff might sustain, with interest from the date of conversion. The value of the property appears by the very description of its kind; hence it was not necessary to specifically allege the particular amount of value. The complaint set out the conditions under which the deposit was made, alleged a violation of the agreement, and showed that all of the defendants were parties to the act of conversion. Upon these facts plaintiff was entitled to a judgment. We may give brief attention to the claim that the court erred in overruling the demurrer of the defendant Johnson. This demurrer, a special one, stated in effect the contention that the liability of Johnson, if any, was different from that of the other defendants; hence, he could not be made a party to the same cause of action. We think that the liability of Johnson under the facts of this case was precisely the same in amount as the liability of the other defendants. As a depositary he was charged with the duty of obeying the instructions of the parties as to the delivery of the property deposited with him. A violation of this duty would result in a liability being cast upon him for damages to the person who might suffer injury, and the damage in this case was the value of the property converted. Riggs et al. v. Trees, 120 Ind. 402, 22 N. E. 254, 5 L. R. A. 696; 10 R. C. L. par. 16. Were we to concede that the liability of Johnson, because of a violation of his duty as a depositary, is different from that of the other defendants, and that the special demurrer for misjoinder might have been properly sustained by the trial court, the concession is of no avail here. This for the reason that under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution it could not be said that the overruling of the demurrer was such an error as had produced a miscarriage of justice. If a liability for the amount recovered existed against the defendant, the fact that he may have been improperly joined with other parties in an action wherein the recovery was secured must be deemed to be without prejudice to any substantial right. This court has had occasion heretofore to suggest that under the section of the Constitution referred to, it would be a rare case indeed which would call for a reversal of a judgment for the sole reason that the trial judge had overruled a demurrer interposed upon some special ground not going to the sufficiency of the cause of action stated.

The judgment is affirmed.

51 Cal. App. 747

ERNST v. HALL et al. (Civ. 2223.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 16, 1921.)

1. Adverse possession ⟸114(1)—Evidence held to support finding of adverse occupancy.

In a suit to quiet title, evidence held sufficient to support a finding of plaintiff's adverse occupancy of the disputed strip.

2. Adverse possession ⟸89—Payment of taxes unnecessary when title complete before April 1, 1877.

It was unnecessary to prove payment of taxes to establish title by adverse possession where title was complete prior to April 1, 1877, the date the amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 325, requiring payment of taxes as a necessary element of such title, became effective.

3. Quieting title ⟸49—Judgment quieting title held proper, though action was to determine conflicting claims.

Though an action was one to determine conflicting claims to real property under Code Civ. Proc. § 749, where the complaint embraced every averment required under section 738 to quiet title, the judgment quieting plaintiff's title was not erroneous, though he failed to prove a fact essential to a judgment under section 749.

4. Estoppel ⟸62(4)—May be invoked against municipal corporation in exceptional case.

As a general rule the principle of estoppel in pais will not lie against a municipal corporation, but it may be invoked in exceptional cases where justice and right require it.

5. Estoppel ⟸62(8)—Payment of taxes to city insufficient to create estoppel to claim title by adverse possession.

Where a strip embraced in the west half of a lot was inclosed with the east half which belonged to the city, the mere fact that defendant had for 20 years paid taxes to the city on the west half including such strip was not sufficient to estop the city's grantee from claiming title by adverse possession where he and his grantors had been in the adverse occupancy of the land for more than 50 years.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by A. G. Ernst against R. A. Hall and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant Elbert R. Tiel appeals. Affirmed.

M. S. Wahrhaftig, of Sacramento, for appellant.

C. E. McLaughlin and C. P. McLaughlin, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

BURROUGHS, Justice pro tem. This is an action to determine conflicting claims to real property under the provisions of section 749, Code of Civil Procedure. The allegations of plaintiff's complaint bring him within the provisions of that section of the Code and also embrace every averment required under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure to quiet title to real property.

The property described in the complaint is the east half of lot No. 2 and a strip of land contiguous thereto in lot No. 3, all of said land being in the block bounded by Ninth and Tenth and O and P streets, in the city of Sacramento, and designated by counsel as "the colored school lot."

All of the defendants, with the exception of defendant Tiel, either filed disclaimers or suffered their defaults to be entered. Defendant Tiel answered, denying plaintiff's ownership of the land described as a portion of lot No. 3, alleged title thereto in himself, and asked that the same be quieted.

The court found that the plaintiff is now, and that he and his predecessors in interest have been, in the actual, exclusive, and adverse possession of the land in controversy continuously for 50 years prior to the filing of the complaint. The date of the filing of the original complaint does not appear in the record, but the amended complaint, upon which the cause was tried, was filed January 4, 1917.

The court entered its judgment quieting plaintiff's title to all of the lands described in the complaint, and defendant Tiel has appealed from the judgment.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that plaintiff had been in the adverse occupancy of that portion of the premises within the school inclosure and described as a part of lot No. 3.

[1, 2] The undisputed testimony of all the witnesses establishes the fact that the lot described in the complaint, together with the building thereon, had been used as a school for colored children, since at least as early as the year 1877, and that the fences on the exterior boundary thereof were in the same place at the time of the trial as they were in 1877, and that in 1877 they had the appearance of being at least 10 or 12 years old. One witness, R. T. Carrington, testified that he had lived in Sacramento continuously since 1871 or 1872, that the location of the fences had never been changed, and that he was almost sure that the fences were there in 1871 or 1872. This uncontradicted evidence was sufficient to support the finding complained of. It was unnecessary to prove payment of taxes to establish title by adverse possession, as respondent's title was complete prior to April 1, 1877, the date the amendment of section 325, Code of Civil Procedure, requiring payment of taxes as a necessary element of such title, became effective.

[3] Appellant further contends that, the action having been brought under the provisions of section 749, Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff was not entitled to relief, except upon strict proof in accordance therewith; that, having failed to prove payment of taxes, as provided in said section, he was not entitled to a judgment quieting title under the general provisions of the law relating to actions of that character.

In support of this proposition he cites Mondran v. Goux, 51 Cal. 151, Bryan v. Tormey, 84 Cal. 126, 24 Pac. 319, and Shenandoah M. & M. Co. v. Morgan, 106 Cal. 417, 39 Pac. 802. An examination of these cases shows that in each instance the findings of the trial court were without the issues raised by the pleadings, and not, as in the case at bar, findings upon issues presented by the pleadings. The point has been decided contrary to appellant's contention in Faxon v. All Persons, 166 Cal. 107, 137 Pac. 919, L. R. A. 1916B, 1209. That action was brought under the McEnerney Act. Stats. 1906 (Ex. Sess.) p. 80. The defendant answered the complaint and submitted his claim to the property to the jurisdiction of the court for adjudication. Plaintiff's proof failed to bring him within the scope of said act, but notwithstanding, upon the allegations of the complaint and answer, and the proof adduced, the court rendered judgment quieting plaintiff's title to the land in controversy. The defendant appealed, presenting the same question now raised by this appellant. In disposing of this branch of the appeal it was held that, as between the plaintiff and the appealing defendant, by reason of the issues raised by their pleadings, the action was in substance and effect one to quiet title to real property and the judgment was affirmed.

The rule promulgated in that case is to be applied with equal force to the case at bar. The issue of title was raised by the pleadings of the parties, and was therefore properly before the court for determination.

[4, 5] It is the final contention of appellant that, as the city of Sacramento levied and collected taxes on the property, the respondent, as the successor in interest of said city, is estopped to claim title thereto.

It appears from the record that for 20 years prior to the commencement of this action the west half of lot No. 3 which includes the strip of land in controversy, had been assessed to appellant, and the taxes had been paid by him.

It is a general rule that the principle of estoppel in pais will not lie against a municipal corporation, but that it may be invoked in exceptional cases where justice and right require it. The case of the City of Los Angeles v. Cohn, 101 Cal. 373, 35 Pac. 1002, upholds this rule. It is there held in substance that possession of land for 40 years, the erection of valuable buildings thereon after the city, through its city council, had found that the city had no claim or title to the property, and that a judgment in its favor would result in a destruction of the defendant's buildings, constituted a case within the exception to the general rule that estoppel in pais will not lie against a municipality, and, commenting on this doctrine, the Supreme Court says:

"The question being a new one in this state, and a most important one, we will content ourselves with an application of it to the facts of the present case, and not attempt to promulgate any general rule by which every case invoking the doctrine may be weighed and measured. If we concede the existence of the principle of estoppel in pais against the public in certain exceptional cases, then this case is rightly decided."

The judgment was affirmed.

In Ruling Case Law, vol. 10, p. 712, it is said that the wrongful or erroneous collection of a tax on public property does not estop a municipal corporation from asserting its legal title thereto.

In the instant case payment of taxes is the only circumstance relied upon by appellant to take the case out of the general rule. Standing alone, this fact is insufficient to justify such holding, especially when it appears that plaintiff and his grantors have been in the adverse occupancy of this land for more than 50 years.

We find no error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

MILLAR v. MILLAR et al. (Civ. 2220.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 14, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 12, 1921.)

1. Set-off and counterclaim ⊜10—Allowance involves practically consolidation of independent actions.

The purpose of allowing a cross-complaint is to avoid a multiplicity of suits, and for all practical purposes the situation involves a consolidation of two independent actions, arising out of or related to the same transaction.

2. Marriage ⊜62—Wife entitled to execution for alimony where husband in action for maintenance filed cross-complaint for annulment of marriage.

Where, in a wife's action for maintenance without divorce, the husband filed a cross-complaint to annul the marriage for fraud, the wife is entitled to an execution on an order allowing alimony pendente lite, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 137, providing for execution in the discretion of the court in a suit for maintenance.

3. Appeal and error ⊜77(1)—Order allowing alimony in action for maintenance appealable as "final judgment."

An order, allowing alimony pendente lite in an action for maintenance, is appealable under Code Civ. Proc. § 963, subd. 1, authorizing appeals from final judgments in actions or special proceedings, as a "final judgment" is one completely adjudicating the rights of the parties submitted to the court for determination, and the order is really a separate judgment in an intermediate proceeding, and its appealability is not affected by Civ. Code, § 137, making the issuance of execution discretionary with the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Final Decree or Judgment.]

4. Appeal and error ⊜467—Undertaking on appeal from order allowing alimony in suit for maintenance not without consideration.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 942, providing for an undertaking to stay execution on appeal from a judgment or order for the payment of money, and section 946, providing that an appeal, perfected as provided in the preceding sections, stays further proceedings, an undertaking on an appeal from an order allowing alimony pendente lite in a suit for maintenance stayed execution, and was not without consideration, though, under Civ. Code, § 137, the issuance of execution was in the court's discretion, and there was no application therefor as the undertaking deprived the court of discretion to order its issuance.

5. Executors and administrators ⊜224—Judgment need not be presented when filed with the clerk.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1505, providing that where judgment is obtained in defendant's lifetime no execution shall issue after his death, except as otherwise provided, and section 1502, providing that, if an action is pending the claim must be filed with the clerk or presented to the executor or administrator, where a judgment for alimony from which an appeal was pending was filed with the clerk, it was not necessary to present it.

6. Executors and administrators ⊜224—Claim for alimony in pending action need not be presented; "Arising upon contract."

Code Civ. Proc. § 1502, providing that if an action is pending against a decedent at the time of his death the claim must be filed with the clerk or presented to the executor or administrator for allowance or rejection, applies only to claims requiring presentation if no action were pending, and has no application to an allowance for suit money or temporary alimony in a pending suit; it not being a "claim arising upon contract" required to be presented by section 1493.

7. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1240—Sureties on undertaking to stay execution cannot require presentation of claim to principal's executor.

Where an undertaking to stay execution on an appeal from a judgment for alimony pendente lite was conditioned as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 942, for payment of the judgment if the appeal was dismissed, and the appeal was dismissed, their liability was fixed, and they could not inject into the undertaking a condition not expressed that the obligee should make an effort to collect the judgment by presenting it to the principal's executor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Solano County; W. T. O'Donnell, Judge.

Action by Katherine A. Millar against James Millar, in which Robert F. Millar and another, as executor and executrix of the original defendant, were substituted as defendants. From a judgment against the sureties on an undertaking for payment of alimony to plaintiff, Agnes H. Etzel, as administratrix of Joseph Etzel, deceased, and Forest Lee Atkinson appeal. Affirmed.

A. E. Bolton, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Metson, Drew & Mackenzie, R. G. Hudson, and Garret W. McEnerney, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. Two appeals involving the same subject-matter have been submitted together upon one set of briefs, and they will be considered in one opinion. In one, Joseph Etzel and Forest Lee Atkinson, sureties on an undertaking to stay execution of an order for alimony pendente lite appealed from a judgment rendered against them in favor of Katherine A. Millar on said undertaking on September 23, 1918. The other is by said Katherine A. Millar from an order of the superior court of November 20, 1918, vacating and setting aside said judgment.

The original action was brought by a wife against her husband to obtain maintenance without divorce. The husband filed an answer and also cross-complaint, in which latter pleading he sought to annul the marriage upon the ground of fraud. After the cause was at issue upon said cross-complaint the plaintiff moved for alimony pendente lite. The motion was granted, and from the order the husband took an appeal and gave the undertaking in question. While this appeal was pending, the case was tried upon its merits, and the marriage annulled upon the ground set forth in the cross-complaint. The wife appealed from this decree, but it was affirmed by the Supreme Court in Millar v. Millar, 175 Cal. 797, 167 Pac. 394, L. R. A. 1918B, 415, Ann. Cas. 1918E, 184. The defendant died after said order for alimony was made, and after said judgment was rendered in the superior court. His executors were substituted, and they prosecuted an appeal from the order granting alimony pendente lite. This appeal was thereafter dismissed by the Supreme Court in the following order:

"It appearing that defendant, James Millar, is dead, and that his executors have been substituted in his stead by order in the superior court, it is ordered that said executors be substituted as defendant herein. Motion to dismiss granted, and appeal ordered dismissed."

More than 30 days after the filing in the superior court of the remittitur thereon, the plaintiff moved for judgment against the sureties, which was granted. During the pendency of the two appeals herein, Joseph Etzel, one of the sureties, died, and by order of this court his administratrix has been substituted in his place and stead.

It does not appear upon what grounds the order setting aside said judgment was made, but the contentions of the sureties in support of said order and in opposition to said judgment may be summarized as follows: (1) The order for alimony was not appealable, and the undertaking given to stay the execution of said order was therefore without consideration, and no liability was or could be incurred on said undertaking. (2) The action in which the judgment against the sureties was recovered abated by reason of the failure of Mrs. Millar to present a claim against the estate of her husband, and hence it was improper to render judgment against said sureties.

As to the first point, they assert:

"There must be at the time the undertaking is given an appealable order and one upon which execution has been issued, or can be issued, as a ministerial act by the clerk of the court."

It is claimed that the order herein was not enforceable because the court had made no order directing the issuance of execution. This position is grounded upon the peculiar language of section 137 of the Civil Code in reference to a suit for maintenance. Therein it is provided that—

"During the pendency of such action the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay as alimony any money necessary for the prosecution of the action and for support and maintenance, and execution may issue therefor in the discretion of the court."

The first answer of plaintiff to this contention is that—

"The defendant's cross-complaint transformed the action into one for annulment of marriage and gave to the plaintiff whatever rights in respect of temporary alimony she would have had in 'an independent suit for annulment.'"

Since, therefore, it is not disputed that, in such action for annulment, execution would issue as of course upon an order for alimony, and application for said order was made after issue joined in said cross-complaint, it is urged by plaintiff that the case is not one for the application of said section 137. The force of the argument depends manifestly upon the effect of the cross-complaint. In section 808 of Pomeroy's Remedies and Remedial Rights it is said:

"The only real difference between a complaint and a cross-complaint is that the first is filed by the plaintiff, and the second by the defendant. Both contain a statement of the facts, and each demands affirmative relief upon the facts stated. In the making up of the issues and the trial of questions of fact, the court is governed by the same principles of law and rules of practice in the one case as in the other. When a defendant files a cross-complaint, and seeks affirmative relief, he becomes a plaintiff, and the plaintiff in the original action becomes the defendant in the cross-complaint."

It is accordingly held that a cross-complaint must contain every allegation which would be essential to an original complaint upon the same cause of action. Coulthurst v. Coulthurst, 58 Cal. 239.

In fact, where the complaint sets forth an action in law and the cross-complaint contains a cause of action which is of equitable cognizance, it is the duty of the court to determine first the issues involved under the cross-complaint. Whittier v. Stege, 61 Cal. 238; Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 12 Pac. 454.

[1] Undoubtedly the purpose of allowing a cross-complaint is to avoid a multiplicity of suits and thereby save vexation and expense; and for all practical purposes, as claimed by plaintiff, the situation involves a consolidation of two independent actions arising out of, or related to, the same transaction.

[2] At any rate, in view of the cross-complaint herein it cannot be said that the action is wholly for maintenance, but it involves also the annulment of said marriage. Assuredly, then, the plaintiff would be entitled to an execution for the allowance, which may as well be referred to the cross-complaint as to the complaint in the action.

We find nothing in the opinion of the Supreme Court in Lowe v. Superior Court, 165 Cal. 708, 134 Pac. 190, inconsistent with the generally accepted views as to the nature of a cross-complaint. The gist of that decision may be seen from this quotation taken from the syllabus:

"The filing of a cross-complaint, although for some purposes treated as the commencement of a new action, is a proceeding in the action commenced by the filing of the plaintiff's complaint which is expressly authorized by statute, the design of the statute being to enable all matters in dispute between the parties 'relating to or depending upon the contract or transaction upon which the action is brought, or affecting the property to which the action relates,' to be determined in a single action, and by a single judgment which shall give to a defendant seeking it such affirmative relief as he is entitled to."

Since it was held to be a proceeding in the action which was instituted by the filing of the complaint, the cross-complaint was deemed pending from the beginning to the extent of applying the provision of the statute:

"Provided always that no action pending against any corporation shall abate thereby [the forfeiture of its charter], but may be prosecuted to final judgment, the same may be enforced by execution with the same force and effect and in like manner as though no forfeiture had occurred."

In this connection plaintiff cites two decisions from other jurisdictions that are very much in point: Slocum v. Slocum, 86 Ark. 461, 111 S. W. 806, and Willits v. Willits, 76 Neb. 228, 107 N. W. 379, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 767, 14 Ann. Cas. 883.

In the former the wife filed an unverified complaint for divorce, and the husband filed an answer and cross-complaint. She thereupon made application for alimony pendente lite. The rule in that state is that a plaintiff wife cannot obtain such relief except upon sworn evidence, but a defendant wife is not required to make such showing. The trial court treated the cross-complaint for the purposes of the plaintiff's application as though it were an independent action in which the wife was a defendant, and allowed her temporary alimony, including costs and counsel fees. The Supreme Court upheld the ruling, saying in the course of the opinion:

"It is recognized and permissible practice for the defendant to file a cross-bill and ask independent relief in divorce suits. When he does so, his suit is as separate and distinct from that of his wife as if the wife had brought no suit, and the finding of the court should be upon each separately."

In Willits v. Willits the wife sued for maintenance. Her husband filed an answer and also a cross-complaint for annulment. Suit money was allowed to the wife, although the court annulled the marriage on the cross-complaint. The husband appealed from the order of allowance, claiming that it was unauthorized because it was made in an action for maintenance. In affirming the order the Supreme Court said:

"So far as the suit money is concerned, the defendant takes the position that because the wife's suit was not brought for a divorce, but merely for maintenance, she is not entitled to suit money. Whatever the rule may be with regard to an allowance for suit money in an action brought merely for maintenance, it is well settled that in an action by the husband to annul the marriage, the wife is entitled to alimony pendente lite and counsel fees, and the fact that the defendant proceeds by cross-petition, instead of an original suit, does not change the rule."

[3] Moreover, if we disregard the cross-complaint and treat the case as involving an order for alimony in an action solely for maintenance, the order is nevertheless final and appealable. In other words, its appealability does not depend upon its enforceability by execution. There is no doubt that, while we usually refer to such allowance as an order, it is really a separate judgment in an intermediate proceeding, and as such is appealable by virtue of subdivision 1 of section 963 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 185, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709. The authorities hold that a final judgment is one that completely adjudicates the rights of the parties submitted to the court for determination. Herein the question was whether the plaintiff was entitled to any allowance for "alimony," so called. The application was regularly heard, and upon the evidence submitted the court determined that she was entitled to an allowance, and adjudged the amount thereof. The fact that an order of the court might be required to have an execution issue does not affect the finality of the judgment itself any more than if an order were made to stay the execution. The judgment and the execution of the judgment are two separate and distinct considerations. Necessarily, the finality of a judgment precedes and does not follow its enforceability.

In Blake v. Blake, 80 Ill. 523, the plaintiff, upon the ground that the execution of the order was not demandable as of course, but only in the discretion of the court, moved to dismiss the appeal from an order allowing temporary alimony in a suit for divorce. But the court held that such circumstance did not affect the finality or appealability of said order, as this depended, not upon whether it was presently enforceable, but whether the court had the power to award an execution to enforce it.

In Zappettini v. Buckles, 167 Cal. 27, 138 Pac. 696, is found an interesting discussion of the difference between an interlocutory and a final judgment, and it is held that a judgment is final if it determines the rights of the parties and nothing remains but to carry it into effect, although some action may be required of the court to enforce the judgment.

Many other authorities are cited by plaintiff to the same effect, but there can be no necessity for noticing them specifically. To show that this quality of the judgment does not depend upon its present enforceability she suggests this apt illustration: Suppose in a suit for divorce an order for alimony is made payable in 65 days after the making of the order. Of course, an execution could not issue until the money became due. But an appeal from said order would have to be taken within 60 days after it was made. No one would contend that the provision of the order extending the time for payment would toll the period for taking an appeal. If an appeal were not taken at least 5 days before the money was due, in other words, before an execution could issue, the appeal could be dismissed.

Upon this particular question that an order staying execution does not affect the appealability of the judgment, plaintiff cites Vickers v. Tyndall, 168 Ill. 616, 48 N. E. 214; Hamill v. Bank of Clear Creek County, 7 Colo. App. 472, 43 Pac. 903; Meredith v. Peterson, 108 Iowa, 551, 79 N. W. 351; State v. Downing, 40 Or. 309, 58 Pac. 863, 66 Pac. 917; Gaston v. Boyd, 52 Tex. 282; Arnold v. Sinclair, 11 Mont. 556, 29 Pac. 340, 28 Am. St. Rep. 489; Winthrop Iron Co. v. Meeker, 109 U. S. 180, 3 Sup. Ct. 111, 27 L. Ed. 898.

[4] But as we understand the position of the sureties, they attach more importance to the contention that since an order of the court was required to make the execution issuable, it cannot be said that their undertaking operated to stay the execution, and therefore said undertaking was without consideration and void. In opposition to this, plaintiff contends, and cites authorities in support of the contention, that "but for the filing of the surety's undertaking to stay execution a writ of execution to enforce the order for alimony would have issued as of course and without any express direction for its issuance." Plaintiff's view is that the judgment is itself a judicial declaration that she was entitled to the money, and that the provision of the statute reserving to the court a discretion as to withholding the issuance of the execution requires the court, by an express provision to that effect in the order or judgment itself, to prohibit or stay its issuance for a definite or indefinite time, or else the execution will issue as of right.

But be that as it may, we are entirely satisfied that the undertaking was effective to stay the execution and therefore the consideration was supplied. It deprived the court of any discretion to order its issuance as it also prevented the clerk from performing the ministerial act that would ordinarily follow such order. If, not withstanding such undertaking, plaintiff had applied to the court for the order, can it be doubted that the undertaking could have been successfully urged as a bar to the proceeding?

The case is one that falls clearly within the provisions of sections 942 and 946 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The appeal is from "a judgment or order directing the payment of money." The undertaking bound the sureties "in double the amount named in the judgment or order" to pay the amount if said judgment or order should be affirmed or "the appeal be dismissed." The undertaking, therefore, as declared in the latter section, stayed "all further proceedings in the court below upon the judgment or order appealed from." The section is too plain for controversy. However, a case in point is McAneny v. Superior Court, 150 Cal. 6, 87 Pac. 1020, wherein it is said:

"The stay of proceedings on the alimony order, thus effected, operated as a supersedeas, and during its operation deprived the superior court of all power to enforce the order appealed from, either by execution or by proceedings for contempt, or through the appointment of a receiver."

Furthermore the court said:

"If the order appointing the receiver in this case was an act in furtherance of the enforcement of the alimony order which was stayed by the appeal, it was prohibited by the statute, which in such cases forbids further proceedings upon the order appealed from and matters embraced therein (Code Civ. Proc., § 946), and it was, in a certain sense, in excess of the jurisdiction of the court."

An application in the instant case for an order for the issuance of execution would assuredly be "in furtherance of the enforcement" of the judgment, and is certainly prohibited by said statute.

Nor can it be assumed that if the undertaking had not been given, the court would not have made such order. The presumption is to the contrary. It is not to be supposed that the court would make an allowance and then decline to do whatever might be necessary to carry such order into effect. At any rate, the undertaking prevented the plaintiff from taking any steps towards securing the fruits of the judgment, and it does not lie in the mouth of the sureties to say that, if the undertaking had not been given, an execution might not have issued. The probability that it would issue, and the certainty that any such probability was forestalled by reason of said undertaking furnished sufficient basis for the obligation of the judgment debtors. The contention of the sureties seems to resolve itself to this: We have given an undertaking and have thereby tied the hands of the court and its ministerial officer in relation to the execution, but since plaintiff did not apply for a "preliminary" order, which the court would be powerless to grant, we deny the plaintiff's right to claim that the execution was stayed. We do not understand that plaintiff was required to do such a vain and useless thing in order to urge successfully the validity of the bond.

The second contention of the sureties is based upon the provision of section 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as follows:

"If an action is pending against the decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff must in like manner file his claim with the clerk, or present it to the executor or administrator for allowance or rejection, authenticated as required in other cases; and no recovery shall be had in the action unless proof be made of such filing or presentation."

Millar died, as we have seen, after the trial of the action and before the appeal was heard in the Supreme Court. It is admitted that this claim for alimony was not presented as required by said section 1502. Hence the assertion of the sureties that the action abated and no further proceedings could be taken for the purpose of enforcing said claim. The position is, if we understand it, that the judgment for alimony was suspended, was virtually rendered of no force and effect until the claim therefor was so presented, and that only by such presentation could the judgment be revived. They insist that this does not involve the release of one only of several obligors, as was the case in Bank of Stockton v. Howland, 42 Cal. 129, which concerned the joint makers of a promissory note, wherein a claim was not presented to the administrator of one who had died, but it affects, so they claim, an essential condition of the liability of the sureties on their bond. In other words, the liability of the sureties depended upon the liability of Millar, that the suspension of his liability would likewise produce a suspension of theirs, and that while this condition existed no legal proceeding could be taken to enforce the liability of the sureties.

[5] In the first place, although the statute provides (section 1049, Code Civ. Proc.) that "an action is deemed to be pending from the time of its commencement until its final determination upon appeal, or until the time for appeal has passed, unless the judgment is sooner satisfied," it is at least doubtful whether the term "pending" is thus used in said section 1502. It would seem quite reasonable to hold that it is limited to the period of time after the filing of the complaint and prior to the rendition of judgment in the trial court. No particular reason appears why a claim that has become merged into a judgment should be thus presented. Of course, a judgment of the superior court is entitled to full faith and credit until reversed or modified on appeal. Indeed, the particular statute applicable to the situation herein is found in section 1505 of the same Code. Therein it is provided that where a judgment is obtained in his lifetime, no execution shall issue thereon after his death "except as provided in section six hundred eighty-six." As to a judgment for the recovery of money—which was this case—it "must be filed with the clerk or presented to the executor or administrator, like any other claim." Said judgment was filed with the clerk, and hence it was not necessary "to present it to the executor or administrator." As stated before, it would constitute a recognized claim against the estate, to be paid as other claims, subject, of course, to any adverse ruling upon appeal.

In the matter of the Estate of Brennan, 65 Cal. 517, 4 Pac. 561, the party against whom a judgment was rendered died after moving for a new trial but before the motion was heard. The judgment was modified on the hearing of the motion, and the Supreme Court held that said section 1505 of the Code of Civil Procedure did not require the presentation of the judgment. It was considered sufficient that the executrix had been made a party to the action and had fully represented the estate.

[6] Moreover, the claim herein involved was not such as the statute requires to be presented to the administrator or executor. Said section 1502 must be read in connection with section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Hibernia, etc., Soc. v. Wackenreuder, 99 Cal. 503, 34 Pac. 219, it is said that section 1502 "simply means that when an action is pending against a decedent at the time of his death, the plaintiff therein is not relieved from the duty of presenting for allowance the claim upon which it is based, when this claim is of that character that he would have been required to make such presentation in order to preserve its validity as a claim against the estate if such action had not been brought in the lifetime of the decedent." And in the same decision it is held that we must look to said section 1493 to determine the character of claims that must be thus presented. Such claims are those "arising upon contracts." It cannot be said in any just sense that an allowance for suit money or for temporary alimony involves a claim "arising upon contract." It is a matter entirely of statutory regulation, and is not affected by any agreement of the parties.

In Audubon v. Shufeldt, 181 U. S. 575, 21 Sup. Ct. 735, 45 L. Ed. 1009, it is said:

"Alimony does not arise from any business transaction, but from the relation of marriage. It is not founded on contract, express or implied, but on the natural and legal duty of the husband to support the wife."

Many decisions to the same effect from state jurisdictions are therein cited.

In the subsequent decision, in Gould v. Gould, 245 U. S. 151, 38 Sup. Ct. 53, 62 L. Ed. 211, the foregoing case was quoted with approval, and the court held that alimony paid to a divorced wife was not subject to an income tax.

[7] Again, the sureties bound themselves, as we have seen, to pay the judgment "if the appeal be dismissed." The appeal was dismissed, and therefore the very condition happened which was to fix irrevocably their liability. It was not a condition of their obligation that plaintiff should make any effort to collect the judgment from Mr. Millar. He was not a party to the undertaking and defendants cannot inject into said instrument some condition that is not expressed therein. While they cannot be bound by anything not found in said undertaking, they must stand upon its terms. This, of course, is elementary. It follows necessarily that plaintiff was not required to take any steps towards the enforcement of the judgment against Millar. It was to the interest of the sureties to have it so enforced, but it was a matter of indifference to plaintiff as far as this action is concerned. Plaintiff might elect to rely entirely upon the responsibility of the sureties, and do nothing toward presenting any claim to the executor or administrator, if we assume that such presentation was necessary to keep the claim alive against the estate.

To restate the situation: The undertaking was given in consideration of the stay of execution. It was effectual for that purpose. The sureties promised in consideration thereof that they would pay the judgment if the appeal was dismissed. The appeal was dismissed, and thereby their obligation became absolute. Plaintiff might have brought an action directly against the sureties, but the statute provides (section 942, supra) an alternative remedy, which was adopted by the plaintiff. Indeed, in their undertaking, defendants expressly agreed that:

"If the appellant does not make such payment within thirty days after the filing of the remittitur of the Supreme Court in the court from which the appeal is taken, judgment may be entered in said action, on motion of the respondent, against the undersigned sureties for the whole amount which may be then due pursuant to the terms of said order."

The remittitur was so filed; plaintiff waited more than 30 days, no part of the amount due under said judgment was paid, and, upon motion, judgment was entered against the sureties for said amount. No valid defense was offered to said motion, and the facts were undisputed. Of course, if the sureties had shown that they were misled by the conduct of plaintiff, or that the obligation was extinguished, a different question would be presented, but that plaintiff may or may not have endeavored to secure payment from the estate of Millar is a matter of no consequence as far as this case is concerned.

We do not understand the sureties to claim that the judgment for alimony was rendered inoperative by reason of the judgment in the main action nullifying the marriage, although there may be an intimation to that effect in their brief. At any rate, as it is not urged, for the reason, no doubt, that it does not possess merit, we need not consider it.

The judgment is affirmed.

SCHAEFER v. SCHAEFER. (Civ. 3731.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 18, 1921.)

Marriage ⊂=65—Court held to have abused discretion in setting aside default judgment of annulment.

In divorce case where defendant husband allowed the court to enter a default and judgment of annulment of marriage upon ground that plaintiff had former husband living, on affidavit by the defendant that plaintiff agreed that if defendant would not contest her action she would obtain an annulment of her former marriage and immediately remarry him, that it was due to such promises he permitted the default to be entered, and that after the hearing he was surprised to find that plaintiff had testified in court that he had forced her into marriage with him through fear and intimidation, held, that court abused its discretion in setting aside the default; the testimony of plaintiff objected to being upon a matter collateral to the real issue of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Bernard J. Flood, Judge.

Action by Luelle Marie Schaefer against Arthur Herman Schaefer. From an order granting a motion to vacate the default and judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Reisner & Honey, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Cleveland R. Wright, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to have the marriage between herself and defendant annulled. Summons and a copy of the complaint were served upon the defendant, who obtained an order from the court granting him 10 days within which to appear, demur, or answer. While this order was in force, defendant and his counsel each signed a stipulation which was filed, withdrawing the extension. Thereupon the court entered the default of the defendant, and proceeded with the hearing. After taking the testimony of the plaintiff and considering certain documentary evidence, it entered its decree of annulment upon the ground that at the time of the marriage with defendant, plaintiff had a former husband living, the marriage with whom was then in force. Four days later the defendant gave notice of motion to vacate the default and judgment upon the ground of "mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect." The motion was granted, and from that order the plaintiff appealed.

The defendant's affidavit fails to show any such mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect as would justify the court in granting the motion. The facts therein stated are that after service of summons upon defendant the plaintiff admitted to him that she was already married to one Northrup, from whom she had not obtained a divorce at the time of her marriage to him; that if defendant would not contest her action she would obtain a decree of divorce, or annulment of her former marriage, and immediately remarry defendant; that due to such promises he withdrew the extension of time which he had obtained, and permitted his default to be entered; that after the hearing he was surprised to read in the daily newspapers that plaintiff had testified in court that he had forced her into marriage with him through fear and intimidation; that if he had known plaintiff intended to accuse him of having forced her to marry him, he would have contested the annulment proceedings.

Plaintiff filed no counter affidavit. The fact remains, however, that she only sought to have her marriage annulled upon the ground alleged in her complaint, which, when established, rendered her marriage with respondent utterly void.

From the evidence taken by the trial court in the annulment action it appeared without contradiction that the plaintiff and Northrup were formerly married and that they had not been divorced or the marriage annulled at the time of the marriage of the plaintiff to defendant. The defendant, in his affidavit, did not attempt to contradict that testimony, or to show that it was not true. Neither did he in his affidavit deny the testimony of the plaintiff, partially elicited on cross-examination by the court, that at the time he was seeking to induce plaintiff to marry him he exhibited a bottle of acid and also a pistol, and threatened to disfigure her and to kill himself.

We think in this instance the trial court abused the wide discretion vested in it in passing upon motions to set aside default judgments. The respondent had no defense on its merits to the action, or if he had he failed to establish it. The fact that the appellant gave testimony upon a matter collateral to the real issue of the case, which may have been unsatisfactory to the respondent, creates no ground for invoking the legal discretion of the court to set aside the judgment.

The order is reversed.

Landlord and tenant ⇐156—Landlord not liable to tenant for failure to collect insurance on improvements.

Where insurance was taken in the name of the property owner for the value of improvements by the tenant under an agreement that such insurance should be for the benefit of the tenant who took possession of the policy, the property owner is not bound after loss occurred to take steps necessary to collect the insurance, at least until the tenant delivered the policy to him with request that he make proof of loss.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Albert Zeimer against J. B. Weikel. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. S. Butler and B. F. Van Dyke, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Martin I. Welsh and Robert H. Schwab, both of Sacramento, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $400. It appears that the defendant was the owner, and the plaintiff the lessee, of a certain building; that the plaintiff made certain improvements to the building of the value of $400; that to protect his interest in these improvements it was agreed that insurance on the building in the amount of $400 would be taken out in the name of the defendant, but for the benefit of the plaintiff; that this was done; that the building was burned and the loss incurred, but the insurance policy was not collected, and that prior to the commencement of the action all right to recover upon it had been lost by failure to present proofs of loss within the required time. The foregoing facts appear without dispute. The dispute is over the nature of the agreement with relation to the taking out of the insurance, the plaintiff claiming that the agreement was that the defendant should collect the insurance in case of loss, so that he is responsible for its not being collected, and the defendant claiming that the agreement was only that the plaintiff might take out the insurance in the defendant's name without any responsibility on the defendant for its collection.

The agreement in question was made upon the advice of an insurance agent, a Mr. Deason, that the insurance, while intended for the protection of the plaintiff, would have to be in the name of the defendant, as he was the owner of the building. The agreement was purely oral at first, but after the policy had been issued in the name of the defendant the plaintiff wished something to evidence his right under it, and the defendant signed and gave him a writing for that purpose. The defendant complains that evidence of the terms of the oral agreement was admitted when there was a subsequent written agreement, but the point is not material, since so far as the question involved here is concerned there is no difference between the terms of the oral agreement and those of the writing. The plaintiff's testimony as to the original oral agreement is:

"Yes, we (plaintiff and defendant) talked about insurance with Mr. Deason, who represented Mr. Weikel (the defendant), and he said the only way for me to do would be to take the insurance—the insurance amounted to $400—for me to take out a policy and pay him for it; he would put it in Mr. Weikel's name; Mr. Weikel said it was satisfactory to him."

The writing subsequently signed by the defendant and given to the plaintiff read:

"Sacramento, Cal., Oct. 31, 1916.

"It is hereby agreed and understood by and between the parties hereto that the Prussian National Insurance Policy No. 663572, issued July 31, 1916, in the name of J. B. Weikel, was issued in the behalf of, and cost to A. Zeimer, to protect the said A. Zeimer, in the event of a fire, to the amount thereof ($400) for money spent by him, at his own expense, in the improvements of the building so covered.

"[Signed] J. B. Weikel."

The policy referred to in this writing expired in July, 1917, a year after its issuance, and thereupon another policy for the same amount and for the ensuing year was issued through Deason at the request of the plaintiff and in the name of the defendant. While this second policy was in effect the loss occurred. We may assume that this policy, as well as the first, came within the agreement between the parties; but the facts are that the defendant had nothing to do with its issuance, that its issuance was a matter of arrangement between Deason and the plaintiff solely, that it was delivered to the plaintiff, who retained possession of it at all times, and that the defendant, so far as appears, did not know of its issuance until the morning after the fire, and never before or after had possession of it. The morning after the fire there was a meeting of the plaintiff, the defendant, and the sheriff. The last inquired as to the amount of insurance on the building, and the plaintiff told him the defendant had $1,000 and he (the plaintiff) had $400, and showed the policy for the latter. The defendant acquiesced in the statement that the $400 was for the plaintiff. The plaintiff, however, did not then or at any time give or offer to give the policy to the defendant, and he himself testifies that he never presented it to the defendant for collection. He does testify that shortly after the fire he asked the defendant about the $400 of insurance and the defendant replied that he did not care a snap about it. But even then the plaintiff took no steps either to collect the policy himself or to insist upon the defendant collecting it for him. So far as appears, he simply kept the policy and did nothing until the time had passed for presenting proofs of loss. Then he demanded of the defendant the $400.

Now, it is evident that neither by the terms of the oral agrement, nor by those of the writing, was there any express assumption by the defendant of an obligation to collect the policy in case of loss or of responsibility for its collection. If the plaintiff be entitled to recover, it must be because there was an obligation to collect on the policy implied in the defendant's assent that it might be taken out in his name. The written notice of loss and the verified proof of loss required by the policy would, of necessity, have to be given and made in his name, and it would seem that the obligation would be fairly implied that he should sign any proper notice and verify any proper proof of loss that might be prepared and presented to him by the plaintiff. It may possibly be, also, although this would be going much further, that if the defendant was in a position where he could take the routine steps required for collection, such as giving notice and preparing proofs of loss, he should himself affirmatively have taken these steps. But he was not in a position to take these steps unless he had the policy, and when the situation was that the policy was not in his possession, but that of the plaintiff, it was certainly a condition of any obligation on his part to do the things necessary to collect the policy, that the plaintiff put it in his hands for that purpose. Until this was done and the defendant was thereby put in a position where he could proceed, he could not justly be held responsible for not proceeding. Just how or why it happened that proofs of loss were not presented does not appear. All that appears is that while the plaintiff, himself, had the policy and was alone beneficially interested in it, he apparently did nothing whatever either to collect it himself or to have the defendant collect it for him. Under these circumstances, the responsibility for the failure to collect it was his own and not the defendant's.

Judgment reversed.

This is an application for a writ of habeas corpus based on the ground that the prisoner has been committed by a magistrate for trial on the charge of embezzling certain bonds, without a showing of probable cause. The application is accompanied by a transcript of the testimony taken before the committing magistrate. An examination of this transcript satisfies us that it discloses probable cause for holding for trial on the theory that after the debt was fully paid the prisoner without lawful right retained the bonds and converted the same to his own use by pledging the same for his own obligation.

LOS ANGELES ROCK & GRAVEL CO. v. COAST CONST. CO. et al.

AMERICAN SURETY CO. OF NEW YORK v. EMPIRE SECURITIES CO. et al.

1. Subrogation ⊂=33(2)—Surety of contractor has no rights to money or bonds due under contract superior to assignee first giving notice.

As materialmen and laborers whose claims the contractor's surety has discharged have no rights in the moneys or bonds due under the contract, the surety cannot claim rights in such moneys or bonds by subrogation or otherwise superior to those of the contractor's assignee who first gave notice of assignment.

2. Municipal corporations ⊂=373(2)—Materialmen and laborers held to have no lien upon money or bonds coming to contractor; "incidental expenses."

Under the Vrooman Act, §§ 7, 8, and 9, requiring assessments of property benefited by public improvement to be made on completion of the work by the contractor, and the warrant, assessment, and diagram to be recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets, whereupon the contractor or his assignee is entitled to receive the same on demand, but not until payment to the superintendent of streets of the incidental expenses not previously paid by the contractor or his assigns, "incidental expenses" being defined by section 34 as including the cost of printing and advertising, making assessments, and compensating city engineer and superintendent, there being no provision for withholding the warrant until the claims of materialmen and laborers have been discharged, such claimants are not given a right or lien equitable or otherwise upon the money or bonds going to the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, Incidental Expenses.]

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=373(2)—Laborers or materialmen held not to have liens against property owners for public improvement under statute for owner's withholding money.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1184, providing for the withholding of money by the owner or person who contracted with the contractor after receiving notice from one who performed labor or furnished materials, may not be applied to a public improvement within the city, since the Vrooman Act provides a comprehensive, self-sufficient, and exclusive plan for the improvement of streets covering the protection of the laborers, materialmen, the city and owners of property, and such Code section is also inapplicable because it is limited to "the persons mentioned in the preceding section," none of which persons are laborers or materialmen.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=353—Contractor's surety cannot trace claim to any right of materialmen or laborers as against assignee of funds payable to contractor.

Funds due the contractor upon completion of work contracted for under the Vrooman Law being free from any claim or lien of materialmen or laborers, the contractor's surety cannot trace any claim thereto through such creditors of the contractor to the prejudice of intervening bona fide assignees of said fund, and the mere fact that the assignee knew of the existence of plaintiff's claim at the time of the assignment does not in itself indicate lack of good faith in making the assignment.

5. Municipal corporations ⊂=353—Contractor's surety cannot compel assignee of fund payable to contractor to pay materialmen and laborers.

While a contractor's surety can enforce the performance of the legal obligation to pay materialmen and laborers, embodied in a contract provision, the surety cannot compel performance by a third person who is a total stranger to the suretyship relation created by the bond, and who is a bona fide assignee to make payments from such funds.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Grant Jackson, Judge.

Action by the Los Angeles Rock & Gravel Company against the Coast Construction Company and others, in which certain cross-complaints were filed. Injunction granted as prayed for, but motion for the appointment of a receiver denied without prejudice and from the order granting the injunction, the defendants appeal. Order reversed.

Oscar Lawler and James E. Degnan, both of Los Angeles, for respondent American Surety Co., of New York.

LENNON, J. The plaintiff, who claims to have furnished materials used in certain street improvement work performed in the city of Los Angeles, brought suit upon the contractor's bond to recover the purchase price of said materials. Plaintiff's right to recover is not disputed; the controversy upon the present appeal is the result of issues raised by the cross-complaint.

Defendant Coast Construction Company, hereinafter referred to as the contractor, entered into a contract, in accordance with the provisions of the Vrooman Act (Deering, Gen. Laws 1915, p. 1714, Act 3930), for the performance by said contractor of street work in the city of Los Angeles. Concurrently with the execution of the contract, the contractor, as principal, and the defendant and cross-complainant, American Surety Company of New York, as surety, executed and delivered to the city of Los Angeles the bond required by section 6½ of the Vrooman Act for the benefit of those performing labor upon and furnishing materials for said street improvement work. Thereafter the plaintiff furnished certain material used in said street work, and, receiving no part of the purchase price thereof, filed with the board of public works of Los Angeles a verified statement of its claim, which contained the averment that it was filed pursuant to the provisions of the Vrooman Act and also to section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and purported to require said board to withhold payment from the contractor until plaintiff's claim was paid. Immediately after the filing of this notice, plaintiff brought suit against the contractor and the surety for the recovery of the said purchase price. In that action the defendant surety company filed a cross-complaint against the following, as cross-defendants: The plaintiff materialman, the contractor, the city of Los Angeles, the board of public works of said city, and the Empire Securities Company, a corporation. The cross-complaint alleges that prior to the commencement of this suit and prior to the filing of plaintiff's claim the contractor had assigned to the Empire Securities Company its right to the warrant, assessment, and diagram which, by the terms of the Vrooman Act, are issuable to the contractor upon the completion of the contract and make it possible for the contractor to collect the assessments levied upon the property benefited by the street improvement work. The assignee filed this assignment with the city and with the board of public works prior to the filing of plaintiff's claim. The cross-complaint admits the validity of plaintiff's claim and seeks an injunction restraining the city and its board of public works from delivering to the contractor, or its assignees, the warrant, assessment, and diagram, and to enforce the delivery thereof to a receiver to be appointed by the court, to the end that the assessment against the property benefited by the street improvement work may be collected and applied first in payment of the claim of plaintiff and "all other claims similarly situated." The aggregate amount due the contractor on account of said contract is $15,310. Plaintiff's claim amounts to $2,083.70, and it does not appear that any other claims remain unpaid. The trial court granted the injunction as prayed for, but denied the motion for the appointment of a receiver, without prejudice to the right of cross-complainant to renew the same or of the court to grant such relief should equity require it. Upon the present appeal from the order granting the injunction, prosecuted by the Empire Securities Company, the city of Los Angeles, and the board of public works of said city, appellants contend that the right of the Empire Securities Company, the assignee of the contractor, to the proceeds of the contract, is superior to any claim of the contractor's surety.

[1] The decision of Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 179 Pac. 880, rendered subsequent to the granting of the injunction in the present proceedings, is determinative of the questions raised upon the appeal now before the court. The facts of that case, in so far as material to a discussion of the instant case, were as follows: A contract for street work, which was executed under the provisions of the "Improvement Act of 1911" (Stats. 1911, p. 730), was assigned by the contractor to one Lloyd, who immediately gave notice of the assignment to the proper authority. Thereafter the contractor's surety was compelled to pay claims amounting to approximately $10,000 for material and labor furnished and rendered in completing the contract. Upon the completion of the contract, the surety company claimed its rights in the assessments collected from the property owners were superior to those of the assignee, Lloyd, basing its contention in part upon the theory that, by virtue of its payment of the claims against the contractor, it acquired by subrogation an equitable lien upon any moneys or bonds due under the contract in payment for the work, which lien was superior to any assignment or other disposition which the contractor may have made. The court decided against the surety's claim to subrogation, holding that the materialmen and laborers whose claims the surety had discharged had no rights whatever in the moneys or bonds due under the contract, and that therefore the surety could not claim rights in the said moneys or bonds superior to those of an assignee who had first given notice of his assignment. The same is true of the rights of the plaintiff materialman and the surety company to the funds due the contractor in the present case.

[2] Under sections 7, 8, and 9 of the Vrooman Act the assessments of the property benefited must be made upon the completion of the work by the contractor, and the warrant, assessment, and diagram must be recorded in the office of the superintendent of streets. Thereupon the contractor, or his assignee, is entitled to receive the said warrant, assessment, and diagram "on demand, but not until after the payment to the said superintendent of streets of the incidental expenses not previously paid by the contractor, or his assigns." The term "incidental expenses" is defined in section 34 of the act as including the cost of printing and advertising required by the act, expenses of making assessments authorized by the act, and the compensation of the city engineer and superintendent. Upon the payment of "incidental expenses," and regardless of whether the claims of materialmen and laborers have been discharged, the contractor, or his assignee, becomes, by virtue of the express provisions of the act, entitled to the warrant and assessment, and, upon receiving the same, he is authorized to immediately demand and receive from the respective property owners the amounts of the several assessments. There is no provision for the withholding of the warrant until the claims of the materialmen and laborers have been discharged. Since a precisely similar method of procedure was prescribed by the act under consideration in Adamson v. Paonessa, supra, the language of the court in that case is equally applicable to the case at bar. In the Vrooman Act, as in the "Improvement Act of 1911," the sole provision for the security of materialmen and laborers is the requirement—

"that every contractor to whom a contract is awarded under the act must file with the superintendent of streets a good and sufficient bond inuring to the benefit of any and all persons performing labor on or furnishing materials used in the work or improvement. There is no provision which gives such claimants any right or lien, equitable or otherwise, upon money or bonds coming to the contractor. In particular, there is no provision in the act authorizing or permitting the retention by the municipality, or by the owners whose lands are assessed, of anything which may be due the contractor in order to pay the claims of materialmen or laborers, or permitting the deduction of the amount of such claims from anything that may be due the contractor. * * * It contemplates that the contractor be paid directly by the property owners whose property is assessed for that purpose, each paying for himself his own assessment. * * * It is manifest that under such circumstances there is no single fund out of which the contractor is to be paid, and it is likewise clear that, in view of the fact that payment may be made to the contractor without the interposition of the city treasurer or any other city official or common conduit of payment, any right to have moneys or bonds coming to a contractor retained to meet claims against the contractor would be quite impracticable." Adamson v. Paonessa, 180 Cal. 157, 161, 179 Pac. 880, 881.

[3] From what has been said, it is also obvious that in the present case, as in Adamson v. Paonessa, supra, the provisions of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure cannot be invoked. This section provides for the withholding of money by the owner, or person who contracted with the contractor, after receiving notice from one who has performed labor or furnished materials. The Vrooman Act provides a comprehensive, self-sufficient, and exclusive plan for the improvement of streets, etc., which covers not only the doing of the work and the protection of laborers, materialmen, the city and owners of property, but likewise provides a complete and comprehensive scheme for the payment of the contractor, which, as previously stated, is irreconcilable with any process for withholding the funds such as that provided in section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure. But this is not the only reason that said section must be held inapplicable to proceedings under the Vrooman Act. That section is, by its own terms, limited in its application to "the persons mentioned in the preceding section," and none of the persons there mentioned are persons performing labor or furnishing materials for work of the character of that dealt with by the Vrooman Act, namely, work upon "streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, sidewalks, and * * * sewers." Kreuzberger v. Wingfield, 96 Cal. 251, 257, 31 Pac. 109; Warren v. Hopkins, 110 Cal. 506, 42 Pac. 986.

[4] It is clear that the decision in Adamson v. Paonessa, supra, is conclusive upon the point that the funds due the contractor upon completion of work contracted for under the Vrooman Act are free from any claim or lien of materialmen or laborers, and consequently that the contractor's surety cannot trace any claim thereto through such creditors of the contractor to the prejudice of intervening bona fide assignees of the said funds. Respondent, however, seeks to distinguish the present case upon the ground that the surety in the instant case does not claim to be subrogated to rights of creditors of the contractor, but is seeking exoneration. That is to say, respondent claims that, by virtue of his right to compel the principal to perform an obligation when due (Civ. Code, § 2846), the surety may proceed in equity to compel the contractor to pay the claims of materialmen and laborers from the assessments to be collected under the contract. "It seems to be well settled that a surety against whom a judgment has been rendered may, without making payment himself, proceed in equity against his principal to subject the estate of the latter to the payment of the debt, in exoneration of the surety." Dobie v. Fidelity, etc., Co., 95 Wis. 540, 70 N. W. 482, 60 Am. St. Rep. 135; Holcombe v. Fetter, 70 N. J. Eq. 300, 67 Atl. 1078; Tillis v. Folmar, 145 Ala. 176, 39 South. 913, 117 Am. St. Rep. 31, 8 Ann. Cas. 78; Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (2d Ed.) vol. 5, § 2342. The difficulty with the position of the respondent surety lies in the fact that in the present proceeding the surety is not seeking to compel the principal to pay his obligation from the principal's own property, but is attempting to sequester funds which have passed, by assignment, to a third party, and in which the principal no longer has any right. This can only be done in the event that the surety has such an interest in the proceeds of the contract merely by virtue of the suretyship that the contractor can make no assignment of the contract or the proceeds thereof except subject to the right of the surety to compel a resort to such proceeds in payment of claims for labor and material incurred in the prosecution of the work. As previously stated, assessments collected or to be collected upon completion of an improvement contracted for under the Vrooman Act are the property of the contractor free from claims arising in connection with the work called for by the contract. This being so, the surety can compel the contractor to resort to that fund in payment of claims of materialmen and laborers incurred in the prosecution of the work contracted for only in the event that the fund constitutes part of the estate of the principal at the time the surety seeks to compel such payment. In the instant case the right to the proceeds of the contract had, by assignment, passed to third parties prior to the surety's attempt to reach them, and the warrant and assessments represented thereby do not, therefore, constitute part of the principal's assets which the surety has the right to subject to the payment of claims. The bona fides of the assignment are not attacked. The mere fact that the assignee knew of the existence of plaintiff's claim at the time of the assignment does not in itself indicate lack of good faith in the making of the assignment. There is nothing to indicate that the assignee had any knowledge that any claim would not be paid by the contractor; it does appear that the assignment was made in consideration of the payment of money to the contractor by the assignee; the surety's attempt to reach the proceeds of the contract was not made until after the assignment was consummated and notice thereof had been given.

[5] Respondent surety calls attention to a clause in the contract for the street work in question which provides that the contractor is to turn over the work free and clear of all claims of laborers and materialmen. It is urged that this clause gave such claimants and the surety the right to resort to the proceeds of the contract for payment of the claims and that, as regards this right, the assignee of the proceeds of the contract is in no better position than the original contractor, for it took with notice of the rights under this clause of the contract. We need not consider the question of the validity of a clause inserted in a contract for the purpose of imposing upon the contractor's right to demand the warrant a restriction not sanctioned by the act. The clause in question merely expresses the general legal duty on the part of the contractor to pay all materialmen and laborers. It imposes no additional burden upon the contractor, but simply reduces to writing the nature of the legal duty in regard to such matters assumed by the contractor and which would exist whether in writing or not; it does not attempt in any way to increase the security for the performance of that legal duty on the part of the contractor or provide any additional protection in any form for the claimants in question, but leaves them to their right to sue upon the bond required by the act. The surety can enforce the performance of this obligation by the principal, but it cannot compel the performance by a third party which is a total stranger to the suretyship relation created by the bond; in other words, it cannot compel payment of the claims from the funds due under the contract after the right thereto has passed to a bona fide assignee.

The order granting the injunction is reversed.

GRAY v. GRAY. (L. A. 5808.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊜934(2)—Intendments in favor of judgment where findings waived.

Findings having been waived, every intendment is in favor of the judgment, so that on all the issues raised by the pleadings it must be presumed that the trial court in effect found all the facts necessary to support the judgment in favor of plaintiff.

2. Husband and wife ⊜297—Evidence held to justify inference husband's abandonment of wife and his charge of adultery not justified.

In a wife's suit for separate maintenance, evidence held to warrant the trial court's inference that defendant husband's abandonment of plaintiff wife and his charging her with adultery were not justified or in good faith.

3. Appeal and error ⊜712—Matter not of record may not be considered.

A matter which does not appear of record may not be considered on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Martha J. Gray, also known as Mattie Gray, against Everett E. Gray. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Earl Rogers, Harrison Cassell, and G. Stuart Silliman, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Samuel D. Weil, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife, and in this action for separate maintenance, instituted under the provisions of section 137 of the Civil Code, the plaintiff sought and secured a decree directing the defendant to pay her the sum of $50 per month for the permanent maintenance and support of herself and minor child. One of the three causes of action pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint was abandoned, and the cause proceeded to trial upon the remaining two causes of action, namely, willful desertion and extreme cruelty. The desertion complained of consisted of the alleged refusal of the defendant, willfully and without any sufficient cause, to live with the plaintiff, and his willful and causeless living separate and apart from her from the 16th day of August, 1917, up to the time of the institution of the action on October 30, 1917. The extreme cruelty pleaded was based upon allegations of the plaintiff's grievous mental suffering and bodily ill health, resulting from the conduct of the defendant in falsely charging the plaintiff with adultery and the repetition of said charge to certain friends and relatives of the plaintiff, coupled with the statement of the defendant, repeatedly made to the plaintiff and to her said friends and relatives, that he was not the father of the child born to the plaintiff during wedlock with the defendant. The defendant, answering the plaintiff's complaint, denied the alleged desertion and the charge of cruelty, but admitted that he did tell plaintiff that he was not the father of the child born to plaintiff, and alleged that in truth and in fact he was not the father of that child. It should be noted that the answer of the defendant failed to deny the allegation of the plaintiff's complaint to the effect that he had charged her with adultery and had repeated said charge to certain friends and relatives of the plaintiff, and therefore it may be taken as an admitted fact in the case that he made said charge against the plaintiff, and disseminated it among her friends and relatives. At the conclusion of the trial of the case the court announced that it would render judgment for the plaintiff, and thereupon, findings having been waived, the judgment appealed from was entered in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] Findings having been waived, every intendment is in favor of the judgment, and, therefore, upon all of the issues raised by the pleadings, it must be presumed that the trial court, in effect, found all the facts necessary to support the judgment in favor of the plaintiff. Antonelle v. City Hall Com'rs, 92 Cal. 228, 28 Pac. 270; Bruce v. Bruce, 16 Cal. App. 353, 116 Pac. 994. The only point made in support of the appeal is the claimed insufficiency of the evidence to warrant and support the implied findings of the trial court which, had findings in fact been made, must necessarily have been to the effect that the defendant had, without cause, deserted and abandoned the plaintiff, and was guilty of extreme cruelty toward the plaintiff in the particulars narrated in the plaintiff's complaint.

[2] We are satisfied, and it is conceded by counsel for appellant, that the evidence adduced upon the whole case amply supports the implied findings of willful abandonment and extreme cruelty upon which the judgment rests, unless, as counsel for appellant contend, it can be fairly said that the evidence compels the conclusion that the defendant had good cause for believing the plaintiff unfaithful to him, and that he was therefore justified in separating from her and charging her with adultery and asserting to her and to her friends that he was not the father of the child born to her. Conceding it to be the law that, if the defendant honestly, though mistakenly, believed the plaintiff to have been unfaithful to him, he would have been justified in doing and saying the things charged against him, and therefore absolved in the eyes of the law from the charge of desertion and extreme cruelty, still we are satisfied that the evidence as a whole warrants the inference, which the court doubtless drew therefrom, that the defendant's abandonment of the plaintiff and his charging her with adultery were not justified or made in good faith.

The evidence offered and received in support of the plaintiff's case, in substance and in effect, is as follows: Plaintiff and defendant intermarried in the city of Los Angeles on January 9, 1907, and they lived together as husband and wife until August 9, 1917, when the defendant separated from the plaintiff and refused further to live with her. During the first nine years of their married life the couple were childless, but on November 13, 1916, a child was born to them. For about nine months thereafter the couple continued to live together harmoniously until on or about the said 9th day of August, 1917. The defendant came home late in the evening of that day very much excited. The plaintiff at that time was in the family bedroom with the baby. The defendant went in there, opened the drawers of a chiffonier, shuffled his hands around the tops of things therein contained, and then went into another bedroom and did the same thing with the dresser there. He then came into the room where plaintiff and the baby were. He then went out into the kitchen, and the plaintiff followed him there, and asked him what he was doing with the revolver which he had. He replied that he had just begun to realize that she, meaning the baby, did not belong to him. The plaintiff asked what put that thought in his head. He said that he had had visions. The plaintiff was so shocked and stunned by the declaration and conduct of the defendant that she had nothing to say at that time. On the following day the plaintiff sought an explanation from the defendant of his conduct and his statement on the night before, and all that he would say was that he had had visions. When the defendant came home on the following evening, he paid no attention to the plaintiff or to the baby, and during the dinner, of which he partook, he had nothing to say to either the plaintiff or the baby. After dinner he went into the front room, where he sat down in a Morris chair and slept for a while, and then went out for a walk. He returned about midnight, very much excited, and when he came into the room where the plaintiff was, said to her: "Who would have ever thought that the thing could have happened?" The plaintiff's cousin was present at this time, and she said to the defendant that he might be wrong in his belief; that his suspicions may not have been well founded, and he replied by saying, no, that his father had materialized and come to him, and that his father would not have done so if it was not that his father was such a good man. The next morning the defendant left the house for his work as usual, but the plaintiff did not hear from him until several days later, and then only when the plaintiff's cousin got into communication with the defendant by telephone, to whom he said that he was not coming home any more. Later on in the middle of the month of September the plaintiff called upon the defendant at the store where he was employed, when he again declared to the plaintiff that the child was not his, and told the plaintiff to have the father of the child support it, to which the plaintiff replied that he was the father of the child, and that she wanted him, as its father, to support it. He again declared that he was not the father of the child, and that he would not support it, and abruptly left the plaintiff. A few days later defendant called upon the plaintiff at her home for the purpose of talking things over and making arrangements as to what they should do temporarily. Never at any time did the defendant give any reason to the plaintiff as to why he believed he was not the father of the child, except that the spirit had told him that he was not the father. From the day of their marriage, on January 9, 1907, to the day that the defendant left the plaintiff, in 1917, they lived together continuously as husband and wife. From the time the child was born and up to the time that the defendant separated from the plaintiff, he was very kind and attentive to the child. When he would come home in the evenings he would always see her the first thing, and then, after his dinner, he would pick her up and play with her, and oftentimes took her out for a ride in his automobile, and always liked to have her sitting in the seat beside him. He always carried the baby to the front door in the mornings, and there said good-bye to her. Prior to August 9, 1917, the defendant never at any time said anything to the plaintiff, directly or indirectly, concerning the paternity of the child and, until then, the relations of the plaintiff and the defendant were harmonious and affectionate. The child resembles the defendant in a marked degree. From the day of their marriage up to the day the baby was born, the plaintiff and the defendant continuously and habitually occupied the same bed. All during her married life the plaintiff was desirous of having a child and, with that end in view, sought and secured medical treatment for the purpose of enabling her to become pregnant with child. The physician who attended her diagnosed her case as one of an undeveloped uterus. He so successfully treated her that she became pregnant.

The defense interposed by the defendant, namely, that he was justified in believing the plaintiff to have been unfaithful to him, and therefore was warranted in separating from her and charging her with adultery, was rested primarily upon the fact that, although the plaintiff and the defendant had lived together as husband and wife during the several years preceding the birth of the child in question, the plaintiff had never been enceinte until the said child was conceived. No competent showing, however, was made or attempted to be made, upon behalf of the defendant, that he was impotent during all or any part of the time that he and the plaintiff lived and cohabited together as husband and wife, and therefore the circumstance that the plaintiff had failed to conceive during the first several years of her married life cannot, in and of itself, be held to be sufficient to warrant the belief in the mind of the defendant that the child born to her was fathered by some one other than himself. It is claimed, however, that this circumstance, coupled with a claimed indiscretion of the plaintiff, testified to by the defendant, warranted the defendant in doubting the chastity of the plaintiff, and justified him in declaring his doubts to her, to her relatives, and to her friends.

[3] It must be admitted that the circumstances connected with the claimed indiscretion might well arouse the suspicion and indignation of the defendant, and, if believed by the trial court, would have justified a further finding that it ultimately culminated in the conviction in the mind of the defendant that plaintiff was untrue to him. In this connection it is asserted upon behalf of the plaintiff that she offered to take the witness stand in rebuttal and denial of the defendant's testimony upon this phase of the case, but that the trial court waved her aside, and declined to hear her upon the theory, apparently, that a denial of the defendant's testimony in the particulars stated was wholly unnecessary. This does not appear of record, and therefore we may not now consider it. The trial court was, however, at liberty to believe or disbelieve the defendant's testimony upon this as well as upon every other phase of the case, and the fact does appear of record that the defendant at the time of the claimed indiscretion did not attach much, if any, significance to the incident, and made no complaint thereof until the time of the trial.

The fact that the defendant did not consider the incident in question of any significance is best indicated by his testimony to the effect that until the plaintiff became pregnant he never had occasion to doubt her chastity. The incident in question, so the defendant testified, occurred on January 15, 1916, and the record shows that it was in April, 1916, that the defendant discovered that his wife was pregnant. The defendant's testimony in this behalf doubtless impelled the trial court to treat the incident of the plaintiff's claimed indiscretion as indifferently as did the defendant at the time of its occurrence.

The order appealed from is affirmed.

Ex parte NELSON. (Cr. 2339.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 26, 1921.)

1. Prisons ⟹15—Credits given on sentence for good conduct pure matter of grace.

The credits given a convict on the time of his sentence for good conduct, under Pen. Code, § 1588, are a pure matter of grace, which can be withdrawn by the same legislative authority which created it, subject only to such conditions as the Legislature prescribes.

2. Prisons ⟹15—In forfeiture of good conduct credits on sentence the prisoner should be informed, but the board of prison directors should inform itself as to facts.

While the rights of a convict in respect of the forfeiture of his credits on his sentence time for good conduct should in every instance be safeguarded by the prison authorities with scrupulous care and fairness, all that is required by Pen. Code, § 1588, relative to a forfeiture, is that the prisoner shall be informed of the charge against him, and that the board of prison directors shall inform itself by such reasonable means as it may in its discretion adopt of the merits of the case, and the courts will not, on habeas corpus, consider the sufficiency of the evidence on which the board acted.

3. Prisons ⟹15 — Evidence insufficient to show prison board acted without investigation or in disregard of rights in forfeiting good conduct credits.

In habeas corpus proceedings by a convict claiming to be unlawfully imprisoned in the state prison on account of forfeiture of his good conduct credits on his sentence, under Pen. Code, § 1588, by the board of prison directors for his alleged participation in a riot, evidence held insufficient to show that prison board acted without fair investigation, or in disregard of petitioner's rights under the statute.

In Bank.

In the matter of the application of Charles Nelson for writ of habeas corpus, directed to James A. Johnston, Warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure prisoner's release from an alleged unlawful imprisonment by reason of forfeiture of credits on sentence time. Writ discharged.

Petitioner, in pro. per.

SLOANE, J. The petitioner claims to be unlawfully imprisoned and restrained of his liberty in the state prison at San Quentin. He is held in custody in said prison under a judgment of commitment on a sentence of 15 years for robbery. He was received at the prison on November 1, 1907. The full term of his sentence will not expire until November 1, 1922.

Under section 1588 of the Penal Code, however it is directed that every convict who shall have conducted himself in conformity to the prison rules and requirements shall have deducted from his term of imprisonment two months in each of the first two years, four months in each of the next two years, and five months in each of the remaining years of said term. With the full allowance of credits thus provided for, petitioner's term of imprisonment would have expired April 1, 1917.

Prior to that date, however, the prison board declared forfeited for alleged misconduct all credits the petitioner had earned or might thereafter earn and the prison authorities have refused and still refuse him his discharge on the ground that the term of his sentence is not yet expired. Petitioner seeks his discharge from custody under the writ of habeas corpus on the ground that he has been illegally deprived of his credits.

Section 1588 of the Penal Code, which provides for the allowance of such credits, also provides for the forfeiture for flagrant disregard of prison rules and discipline, under the condition that—

"Such forfeiture, however, shall be made only by the board of directors after due proof of the offense and notice to the offender; nor shall any forfeiture be imposed when a party has violated any rule or rules without violence or evil intent, of which the directors shall be the sole judges."

The petitioner here was charged with having participated in a riot within the prison, and on this charge he was found guilty and his credits, existing and prospective, were by the board declared forfeited.

The ground of his complaint is set forth in his petition as follows:

"That, therefore, on or about July, 1912, your petitioner was haled before the state board of prison directors, then in session at San Quentin Prison, and without having received due notice, or any notice theretofore, was summarily charged with participating in riot within the prison. He was questioned thereon and denied that he had so violated any rule of the prison and pleaded not guilty; that he was not confronted with any witnesses then or any time therefor or thereafter concerning said charge; that no due proof, or any proof or evidence whatsoever, was produced in his petitioner's presence, if at all, in support of said charge, but without any show of compliance with the provisions of said section 1588 of the Penal Code, he was called from the solitary dungeon cell and taken before the board of prison directors at about 6 o'clock at night, and had no knowledge of the reason for so taking him before said board until actually in their presence. He had no opportunity of preparing or presenting any defense on said charge, and his credit of 67 months which were allowed by the Code were forfeited by the board of prison directors, without evidence; no testimony was taken in his presence. He was not confronted by any witnesses and was not given any chance to call witnesses or to defend himself.

"Petitioner further alleges that he had no notice that any credits were to be forfeited from him, and was in ignorance that the same had been forfeited until on or about the 1st day of April, 1916, when he should have been discharged from custody in compliance with the provisions of section 1588 of the Penal Code of the state of California."

The evidence on the hearing shows that he was brought before the board of prison directors and notified and informed of the charges made against him, to which he pleaded not guilty; that testimony on said charges was then and there taken by the board; that the warden of the prison and the captain of the yard and others testified in support of the charges; and that thereupon he was found guilty and all credits earned or to be earned were revoked.

The proceeding was evidently summary and informal. He was served with no notice of the charges prior to being taken before the board. He pleaded not guilty and apparently had an opportunity to tell his own story. He did not ask for a continuance or for time to prepare for further defense, and makes no claim that he demanded or was refused an opportunity to produce evidence in his own behalf. He was not confronted with the witnesses against him, and had no opportunity to cross-examine them.

[1] If the Code provision which calls for "due proof of the offense and notice to the offender" entitles the prisoner to a formal hearing, the law was not complied with in this case. But, as is held in the Matter of the Application of Stanton, 169 Cal. 607, 147 Pac. 264: "It is settled that the board is not required to proceed with the formality required by the courts." No constitutional rights to process of law, formality of procedure, or to being confronted by the witnesses, or having the privilege of cross-examination, are involved. The credits given a convict are a pure matter of grace, which can be withdrawn by the same legislative authority which created it, and subject only to such conditions as the Legislature prescribes.

[2] While the rights of the convict should in every instance be safeguarded by the prison authorities with scrupulous care and fairness, all that seems to be required by the statute, in view of the decisions, is that the prisoner shall be informed of the charge against him, and that the board shall inform itself, by such reasonable means as it may in its discretion adopt, of the merits of the case, and the courts will not on habeas corpus consider the sufficiency of the evidence on which the board acted. Matter of the Application of Stanton, supra; In re Knowlton, 136 Cal. 107, 68 Pac. 480; Ex parte McDonald, 187 Pac. 991.

[3] We find no evidence in this case that the prison board acted without fair investigation or in disregard of the petitioner's rights under the statute.

The writ is discharged.

In re WEMPE'S ESTATE. (S. F. 9198.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 25, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 23, 1921.)

1. Wills ⊂=230—Contest held not to be stricken on ground contestant had previously petitioned for probate.

Where one O., named as executor, executed a written renunciation of his right to letters testamentary in favor of one W., conditional upon the latter's appointment as administrator with the will annexed, and filed a petition signed by himself for the probate of the will and for the appointment of W., and W. also filed a petition, stating that he did not know whether or not the decedent was of sound mind when the instrument offered for probate was executed, and praying that if it were admitted to probate he (W.) be appointed administrator with the will annexed, held that W.'s subsequent contest of the will should not be stricken from the files as sham, on the ground that he had petitioned for the probate of the will, thereby assuming an inconsistent position.

2. Wills ⊂=384—Refusal to strike out answer to will contest held not prejudicial.

In a will contest, the refusal of the court to strike out the answer to the contest filed on behalf of the proponent of the will was not prejudicial, where he had full opportunity to amend it or substitute another for it, and no claim was made that it was insufficient, or that he had been prejudiced in any way in presenting his defense to the contest by the court's allowing the answer to stand.

3. Wills ⊂=384 — Striking from files proponent's second petition for probate of will held not prejudicial.

In a will contest, where by his first petition the proponent of the will renounced his right under it to act as executor, and asked that W. be appointed administrator with the will annexed, there was no prejudicial error in striking from the files his second petition for the probate of a will, in which he withdrew his renunciation and asked for letters for himself; the only question on the contest being whether the will should be admitted to probate.

4. Trial ⊂=6(1)—Requirement of notice of trial applies only where court proceeds in absence of party.

Code Civ. Proc. § 594, requiring five days notice of trial, applies only where the court proceeds in the absence of a party.

5. Appeal and error ⊂=920(1)—Regularity of procedure is presumed.

The presumption on appeal is that the lower court pursued its authority regularly, and, if it is claimed that it did not, as, for example, for want of due notice, the facts showing the irregularity must affirmatively appear.

6. Trial ⊂=90—Objection to evidence tentatively admitted waived by failure to move to strike out.

Where testimony objected to was admitted only tentatively, and subject to a motion to strike out to be argued later, the failure to make such motion constituted a waiver of the objection.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of William C. Wempe, also known as and called William Wempe, deceased, in which one Ottens petitioned for probate of a will of decedent, which was contested by Gerhard Wempe. From an order refusing to admit the will to probate, Ottens appeals. Order affirmed.

Charles Baer and Ervin S. Best, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

OLNEY, J. One William C. Wempe died March 30, 1919, leaving as his only heirs his two minor children. He also left an instrument purporting to be his will, whereby he left his estate in trust for his two children as beneficiaries, with contingent remainders over, and named one Ottens as executor. Ottens executed a written renunciation of his right to letters testamentary in favor of one Gerhard Wempe, conditional upon the latter being appointed administrator with the will annexed, and filed a petition, signed by himself, for the probate of the will and for the appointment of Wempe. Wempe also filed a petition, stating that he did not know whether or not the decedent was of sound mind when the instrument offered for probate by the petition of Ottens was executed, and praying that if it were admitted to probate, he (Wempe) be appointed administrator with the will annexed. Thereafter, Wempe, as the guardian for the two minor children, filed a contest to the petition of Ottens for the probate of the will on the ground that the decedent was of unsound mind when the instrument was executed. Thereupon Ottens withdrew his renunciation, and filed a second petition for the probate of the will by a different attorney. The next day the attorney by whom the first petition for probate was filed on behalf of Ottens filed an answer on his behalf to the contest filed by Wempe. Ottens then gave notice to the last-mentioned attorney that he had acted without authority and gave notice of motion to strike from the files both the contest and the answer thereto. Wempe, on his part, moved to strike from the files Ottens' second petition for probate. These motions were heard on June 2d and 10th, submitted on the latter day for decision, and on June 11th the motion of Ottens was denied and that of Wempe granted. At the hearing of the motions the attorney by whom Ottens had filed his second petition for probate appeared as representing him in urging his motion and resisting that of Wempe, and the same attorney represented Ottens in all subsequent proceedings. At the hearing on June 10th, the court called attention to the fact that there was a contest, and asked if it was agreeable to all parties to have it heard on June 16th. Ottens' attorney agreed to this date, and it was fixed, although apparently there was no formal order of court made. On the 16th the contest was called for trial, and Ottens' attorney appeared and objected to the trial proceeding because notice of motion to set for trial had not been given, and there was no formal order setting it. There was no showing or claim made that Ottens or his attorney were taken by surprise, or were not as prepared then as they ever would be to proceed with the trial. The sole point of the attorney was that the cause had not been properly set, although the date had been fixed upon his statement that it was agreeable to him, and although he was then actually present in court, so that the purpose of requiring notice had been served. The court somewhat indignantly—and quite justifiably so—overruled the objection and proceeded with the contest. The attorney then announced that he wished to retire from the courtroom, and, upon the assurance by the court that he might do so with the full consent of everybody, he did retire.

It should also be said that on June 2d or 10th, the testimony of a number of witnesses who could not appear subsequently, was taken by agreement for the purposes of the contest. Among these was a physician who had attended the deceased, and who, over objection on behalf of the proponent, Ottens, testified as to what he had observed and the conclusions he had reached in the course of his professional treatment of the decedent.

Upon the conclusion of the contest, the court made its order denying the admission of the will to probate, and from this order Ottens appeals.

[1] The alleged grounds of error are five. The first is that the court erred in denying the motion of Ottens that Wempe's contest be stricken from the files. The ground of the motion, so far as the contest was concerned, was that it was sham, and the reason assigned why it was sham was that Wempe had filed a petition for the probate of the will, so that he appeared both as asking for and contesting the probate of the instrument. The answer to this is that Wempe had not petitioned for the probate of the will. All that he had done had been to petition to be appointed administrator with the will annexed in case the will was admitted to probate, and in his petition he states explicitly that he does not know whether the decedent was of sound mind when the purported will was executed, and does not ask for its probate.

[2] The second alleged error is the refusal of the court to strike out the answer to the contest filed on behalf of Ottens. This was asked for by Ottens on the ground that the attorney by whom it had been filed was not authorized to represent him. The notice of motion specified that the motion would be made upon oral evidence to be produced at the time of the hearing of the motion, and it does not appear that any evidence of a want of authority on the part of the attorney was produced. If there was not, the court was justified in denying the motion on the ground that the want of authority did not appear, and we cannot presume error, and that want of authority did in fact appear. But passing this, there is another and complete answer to the appellant's contention. It is that at the hearing of the motion the appellant's attorney was informed that if he desired to file a different answer for the appellant he could do so, and the contest was set for trial on June 16th in view of the statement of the attorney that this would give him time to file such an answer. Furthermore, the answer filed, whether filed by an authorized attorney or not, denied all the material allegations of the contest, and no claim is made that it was insufficient in any respect. The situation then is both that if the answer was insufficient in any respect the appellant had full opportunity to amend it or to substitute another for it, and also that no claim is made that it was insufficient, or that the appellant has been prejudiced in any way in presenting his defense to the contest by the court's action in allowing the answer to stand. In other words, the appellant suffered no prejudice whatever and, in fact, no prejudice is claimed.

[3] The third alleged error is the action of the court in striking from the files Ottens' second petition for the probate of the will. The only reason asserted why this was error is that by the first petition Ottens renounced his right to act as executor, and asked that Wempe be appointed administrator with the will annexed, and that he had thereafter withdrawn his renunciation. It is claimed that because of these facts Ottens' second petition for probate, in which he withdrew his renunciation and asked for letters for himself, should have been permitted to stand. But this is an appeal from the order denying the will admission to probate, and unless the making of this order was affected by the action of the court in striking the appellant's second petition from the files, it is evident that the court's action was wholly inconsequential. Now both of Ottens' petitions asked for the probate of the will, and the only substantial difference between them was in respect to the appointment of Ottens as executor. Such difference did not affect in the slightest the issues presented by the contest, and could not affect the determination of the question as to whether or not the will should be admitted to probate, the question, and the only question involved in the order appealed from. Indeed, it is not claimed that the determination of that question was affected by action of the court in striking the second petition for probate from the files. In other words, it is evident that in this instance also the appellant was not prejudiced by the ruling complained of.

[4] The fourth alleged error is the action of the court in proceeding with the trial without, according to appellant, the five days' notice of trial required by section 594, Code of Civil Procedure. In view of what took place this closely approaches trifling. The appellant's attorney was present in court six days before the trial when the trial day was fixed, agreed to the time fixed, and actually appeared at the time fixed. He certainly had five days' notice in the first place, in the second place he waived any right to notice by agreeing to the time fixed, and in the third place the Code provision has application only when the court proceeds in the absence of a party. Sheldon v. Landwehr, 159 Cal. 778, 116 Pac. 44.

It is claimed that what occurred on June 10th does not properly appear in the record, since the reporter's notes (the record is brought up by the so-called alternative method) did not show what took place on that date, and the occurrences were inserted in the reporter's transcript by the judge from his recollection. But assuming that there was no authority for the judge making such insertions in the transcript, the reporter's notes did show that appellant was present in court by his attorney on the 16th when the contest was called for trial. This alone was enough to justify the action of the court. But the reporter's notes also showed a colloquy on the 16th between court and counsel, wherein what occurred on the 10th was stated by the court and not denied by counsel, and showed that it was upon the basis of the occurrences of the 10th as so stated that the court took its action in proceeding with the trial. This was sufficient, in the absence of any showing in the record that the statement of the court as to what had taken place was not true. In addition to this, the order appealed from itself recites the occurrences of the 10th, and these recitals must be taken to be true in the absence of any showing to the contrary. In fact, the situation would not be changed even if the colloquy mentioned did not appear and the order had contained no recitals.

[5] The presumption on appeal is that the lower court pursued its authority regularly, and if it is claimed that it did not, as, for example, for want of due notice, the facts showing the irregularity must affirmatively appear. This has been settled law in this state for many years. In the present case, even if the appellant's contention as to the insertions by the judge in the reporter's transcript be correct, a contention which is at least doubtful, there is nothing to show affirmatively that the court had proceeded irregularly with the trial of the contest. For all that would appear in the absence of the colloquy and the recitals, the appellant might have expressly waived notice in open court, as he in effect actually did.

[6] The fifth and last alleged error is the admission over objection of the testimony of the decedent's physician, previously mentioned. But whether the testimony was competent or not, the appellant's objection to it was waived. The testimony was admitted only tentatively, and subject to a motion to strike out to be argued later. Such motion was not made. The failure to make it under the circumstances was a waiver of the objection. King v. Haney, 46 Cal. 560, 13 Am. Rep. 217; Tarpey v. Veith, 22 Cal. App. 289, 294, 134 Pac. 367, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 711. The other evidence, furthermore, is overwhelming to the effect that the decedent was of unsound mind when the purported will was executed, so that the admission of the testimony objected to could not have affected the result.

The foregoing are all of the errors relied upon as justifying this appeal. It must be evident that there is not a semblance of merit in any of them, and that the appeal was wholly without justification. Furthermore, not a single step taken on behalf of the appellant in the court below after the filing of the contest seems to have been directed to assisting the determination of the question as to the validity or invalidity of the instrument offered for probate, the only question on the merits which the cause presented. On the contrary, every step would seem to have been directed to complicating and delaying the determination of that question. We cannot avoid the conclusion that the appeal is of like character, and that damages should be assessed against the appellant for a frivolous appeal, whose only rational result could be delay. It is therefore ordered that the order appealed from be affirmed, and that there be added to the costs assessable against the appellant the sum of $100 damages for an appeal taken for delay.

FLETCHER v. ALLEN et al. (Civ. 3479.)

1. Trusts ⊂=357(3)—Purchaser in good faith for valuable consideration not involuntary trustee.

Where transferee of oil lease in default agreed with plaintiff and another that plaintiff should be employed as attorney in litigation on the lease, that the amount of recovery should be divided equally, and that no settlement or compromise should be made by any of the parties to the agreement without the consent of all parties thereto, and, after plaintiff had performed services as attorney in the matter and obtained a judgment against the defaulting parties on the lease, the transferee of the lease sold to such parties all his right and interest in the lease and actions pending arising out of it, and entered satisfaction of the judgment, for which settlement the defaulting parties paid the transferee $2,469, held, that no trust under Civ. Code, § 2219, was impressed on the property in plaintiff's favor as against the defaulting parties, in view of section 2243, where the purchase price was paid by them without notice of plaintiff's rights.

2. Attorney and client ⊂=104—Principal and agent ⊂=177(1)—Notice to attorney or agent is notice to principal.

Knowledge by notice to attorney or counsel or agent, acquired during the negotiations for a purchase, is constructive notice to their principal; but the notice must be of a character which would put a prudent man on such inquiry that, if prosecuted with reasonable diligence, it would lead to actual knowledge of the true facts with reference to the subject of the transaction.

3. Trusts ⊂=357(2)—No trust raised in attorney's favor against third persons by client's agreement to pay attorney share of recovery.

Where an attorney relied on his client's promise to make no compromise without the attorney's consent, and defendants in the litigation conducted by the attorney knew of no contract between the attorney and his client, except that the client was to pay the attorney a share of the amount recovered, there was nothing in notice of such an agreement, which is not an unusual kind of agreement, calculated to lead a reasonably prudent man to prosecute an inquiry whether such contract, in addition to the personal obligation assumed by the client, created a trust for the attorney's benefit, so that such defendants, in compromising the litigation and purchasing the subject-matter, of the litigation for a sum which they paid to the client, were not charged with such notice that, against them, a trust in the attorney's favor was impressed on the property purchased.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by Kimball Fletcher against F. H. Allen and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Kimball Fletcher, of Los Angeles, in pro per.

Schweitzer & Hutton and A. A. Kidder, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The purpose of this action was to have certain property and rights therein, legal title to which was vested in defendants Warring, Arundell, and Narver, declared to be the subject of a trust in favor of plaintiff. Judgment went for defendants, from which plaintiff has appealed.

On November 1, 1910, the Southern Refining Company leased certain prospective oil lands, of which it had the possessory right, to defendants Warring, Arundell, and Narver. The lease provided that the lessees should, at their own expense, keep up the assessment work on the lands as required by law, and further provided that, in case they should fail to commence operations under the terms of the lease by July 4, 1911, they should pay to the lessor the sum of $100 per month for each and every month in which they should make such default in the commencement of operations. The lessees made default in performing the covenants of the lease, and thereupon the lessor, on March 6, 1913, by written instrument, transferred and assigned the lease, together with all rights of action arising from the breach thereof to F. H. Allen, who, on March 13, 1913, instituted an action against said lessees to recover as damages the penalty of $100 per month accruing prior to such time. A judgment therein for the sum of $2,469.38 was rendered against defendants, from which they prosecuted an appeal. Thereafter, and while this action was pending on appeal, Allen instituted other actions to recover against defendants for the penalty of $100 per month, in all of which plaintiff acted as his attorney. While these actions were pending, Allen, on March 17, 1916, by written instruments, sold, transferred, and assigned to Warring, Arundell, and Narver all his right, title, and interest in the lease so acquired by him from the Southern Refining Company, together with all right and interest in pending actions arising out of or under the terms of the lease, and entered satisfaction of the judgment in his favor, from which defendants had appealed, for all of which, and in consideration of the full acquittance granted to defendants, they, in the nature of a compromise, paid him the sum of $2,469.

As stated, the Southern Refining Company, by a naked assignment in writing, transferred all its interest in the lease to Allen on March 6, 1913. On August 1, 1914, an instrument to which Allen, Bacigalupi, and plaintiff were parties was duly executed, the effect of which was to employ plaintiff as attorney, not only in pending litigation therein referred to, but "in all further suits, settlements, or compromises in connection with the contract" in question, and whereby, among other things, it was agreed that out of any money or property recovered as a result of such litigation, or in settlement or compromise in connection therewith, the amount thereof, less expenditures and costs and sums allowed by the court as attorney's fees, which should go to plaintiff, should be divided equally between the parties, by whom it was "further mutually agreed * * * that no settlement or compromise shall be made by any of the parties hereto without the consent of all parties to this agreement."

[1] Plaintiff, under the provisions of section 2219, Civil Code, insists that the agreement impressed the property, legal title to which was in Allen, with a trust in his favor to the extent of one-third of such as might be recovered, either by suit, compromise, or settlement, and that since the contract provided that no settlement or compromise should be made by Allen without plaintiff's consent, which was not given, the defendants Warring, Arundell, and Narver took the property so acquired from Allen subject to the trust and are involuntary trustees thereof, as provided in section 2243, Civil Code.

Section 2219, Civil Code, provides that:

"Every one who voluntarily assumes a relation of personal confidence with another is deemed a trustee, within the meaning of this chapter, not only as to the person who reposes such confidence, but also as to all persons of whose affairs he thus acquires information which was given to such person in the like confidence, or over whose affairs he, by such confidence, obtains any control."

And section 2243, Civil Code, entitled "Third Person, When Involuntary Trustee," provides:

"Every one to whom property is transferred in violation of a trust, holds the same as an involuntary trustee under such trust, unless he purchased it in good faith, and for a valuable consideration."

We entertain grave doubt as to whether the contract, as claimed by plaintiff, created an express trust in his favor. However, conceding the contention to be correct and that the acts of Allen were in violation of the trust, defendants could not, under section 2243, Civil Code, above quoted, be deemed involuntary trustees if in purchasing the property and interest vested in Allen they acted in good faith and paid a valuable consideration therefor. That they did so act and make such payment appears from the finding "that the said purchase price ($2,469) was paid by said defendants D. C. Narver, Hugh Warring, and T. F. Arundell to the said F. H. Allen in good faith and without any notice, actual or constructive, prior to or down to the time of the payment of said money, that the plaintiff had any interest whatever in said contract, rights of action, judgments or property referred to in the third amended complaint," and that at the time of said purchase Allen was in the sole possession of all of said property rights and appeared to be the sole owner thereof. The facts so found, if true, must be deemed a bar to the remedy sought by plaintiff against defendants Warring, Arundell, and Narver.

[2] Appellant, however, insists that the finding is not supported by the evidence in that, while conceding the defendants had no personal knowledge of plaintiff's rights, it nevertheless shows their attorneys received notice, the character of which was such as to put a reasonably prudent man upon inquiry as to plaintiff's rights, and that such notice must be imputed to defendants, who as principals must be deemed chargeable with constructive notice.

"Knowledge by notice to attorney or counsel or agent acquired during the negotiations for a purchase is constructive notice to their principal." Watson v. Sutro, 86 Cal. 500, 24 Pac. 172, 25 Pac. 64.

Whether constructive or actual, the notice must be of a character which would put a prudent man upon such inquiry that if prosecuted with reasonable diligence it would lead to actual knowledge of the true facts with reference to the subject of the transaction. Pomeroy's Equity Jurisprudence (3d Ed.) vol. 2, §§ 597, 599; Bank of Mendocia v. Baker, 82 Cal. 114, 22 Pac. 1037, 6 L. R. A. 833. Conceding the law as stated, appellant insists that the evidence shows that one of the attorneys for defendants had sufficient notice to put him upon inquiry as to the plaintiff's interest in the subject of the controversy. As appears therefrom, the lease provided that defendants should pay $100 per month as a penalty for each and every month during which they failed to comply with certain terms thereof. Under this provision, an action had been instituted by Allen wherein a judgment was recovered, and other actions for accruing penalties were pending, in all of which and during the entire time that Allen owned the lease, plaintiff had acted as counselor and attorney for him, and Schweitzer & Hutton and A. A. Kidder had during said time acted in like capacity for defendants.

Pending the appeal from the judgment obtained in the first action instituted against defendants to recover the penalties stipulated in the lease, the negotiations which culminated in a settlement of all controversies growing out of the lease were commenced. The testimony of plaintiff tends to show that he acquainted Mr. Kidder with the fact that he had an interest in the lease. This testimony, however, is flatly contradicted by Kidder, who further stated that he was never informed by any one that Allen was not the real owner of the lease and rights assigned by him to defendants, nor apprised of the fact that Fletcher had any interest therein other than as an attorney representing his client; that in a conversation had with Mr. Allen, wherein the latter stated that he and Fletcher did not agree as to what should be exacted in settlement, he mentioned $2,500 or $3,000 in cash as a sum which he would be willing to accept, and further stated that his arrangement with Fletcher was that in case he recovered a judgment and collected it, he would pay Fletcher one-third. Plaintiff himself testified that, in response to an offer of $2,000 made by Mr. Hutton in settlement of the whole proposition, he said that he did not think the amount was sufficient, but that, if Allen and Bacigalupi were anxious to settle the matter, he did not want to stand in their way, but would advise them it was too small. In our opinion, the evidence, while conflicting, is sufficient to support the finding upon which the judgment is based.

[3] Considering the entire record, it is apparent therefrom that plaintiff relied upon Allen's covenant that he would make no compromise of the matter without the former's consent, and that neither he nor Allen made any disclosure of a contract existing between them, other than that out of the proceeds received by Allen he was to pay plaintiff, as compensation for the services rendered, one-third thereof. Such an agreement between an attorney and his client is not unusual, and there is nothing in notice of such fact which is calculated to lead a reasonably prudent man to prosecute an inquiry as to whether such contract, in addition to the personal obligation assumed by the client to his attorney, creates a trust for the latter's benefit.

The judgment is affirmed.

RIVARA et al. v. BARTOLOZZI et al.

(Civ. 2096.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1921.)

1. Partnership ⊂=328(3)—Evidence held to support finding of losses in business.

In action to dissolve a partnership on the ground that it had been a steadily losing venture, a record of the partnership transactions, showing a loss of over $2,000 in the business in about 100 days from its commencement to the date of suit, was sufficient to support a finding that the business had been conducted at a great loss.

2. Partnership ⊂=300—Lease held to become a nullity on dissolution of firm and not to be treated as asset in dissolution proceedings.

Where the owners of the building, furnishings, and supplies of a hotel, bar, and restaurant executed articles of copartnership with other individuals to conduct the business, such articles providing that the partners would pay the owners $250 per month as rental, and that the term of the agreement should be five years, on the dissolution of the partnership as a losing venture prior to the expiration of the five years, the contract as to the premises, even if conceded to be a lease, became a nullity, and could not be treated as an asset of the partnership in the dissolution proceedings.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by A. Rivara and others against Joe Bartolozzi and another. From judgment for plaintiffs, dissolving the partnership, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Henry L. Corson, of San Francisco, for appellants.

Arnold C. Lackenbach and Roland Becsey, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

STURTEVANT, J. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendants to obtain a decree dissolving the partnership existing between the plaintiffs and the defendants. The trial court awarded the plaintiffs a decree, and the defendants appealed under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure.

In their complaint the plaintiffs alleged, among other grounds on which they based their right to a decree, "that at all times since the commencement of said copartnership said business of said copartnership has been conducted at a great loss." These allegations were denied by the answer. A trial was had on the merits, and the trial court made a finding on the above issue in favor of the plaintiffs. The defendants attack that finding as not being supported by the evidence. They also claim that the trial court did not give due consideration to their claim that the partnership was possessed of a valuable leasehold. Before we proceed to consider the point, it should be stated that the plaintiffs Mary Macchetto and A. Rivara were the owners of the building, furnishings, and supplies of a hotel, bar, and restaurant located at 426 Broadway, in San Francisco. On May 13, 1918, they and the defendants executed articles of copartnership to conduct the said business. The articles provided that the partners would pay the owners $250 per month as rental, and that the term of the agreement should be five years. The defendants contend that those provisions of the instrument created a leasehold in favor of all the partners, and as such it should have been treated as an asset in the dissolution proceedings.

[1] Taking up the attack on the findings, there is in the record a written account of the financial transactions from the day the business was commenced to the day the suit was filed (a period of about 100 days), showing a loss of $2,092.08. The appellants do not quote any part of the record which tends to weaken or break down the force of this showing. A steady loss of over $20 a day is certainly a sufficient showing that the finding in question has some evidence to support it.

[2] The leasehold existed, if at all, as one of the integral parts of the contract of copartnership. That contract was the very object of the attack by the plaintiffs' cause of action. The judgment in plaintiffs' favor had the legal effect of annulling the partnership contract and every portion thereof. Conceding, without deciding, that the contract was, among other things, a lease, its existence as a lease ceased the moment the contract was dissolved. Thereafter the contract was neither an asset nor a liability—nor was any part thereof. The trial court did not err in treating the alleged lease as a nullity.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1921.)

1. Contracts ⊂=75(2) — Agreement by landlord to reduce rent unenforceable, as nudum pactum.

Where, during a period of depression, a landlord agreed to a reduction of rent of a hotel, such agreement is unenforceable, being unsupported by a consideration, and the mere fact that the lessees continued to run and manage the property as was their duty, does not make the contract enforceable, for neither a promise to perform a duty or its performance constitutes a consideration, and the agreement was a mere nudum pactum.

2. Receivers ⊂=199 — Compensation of receiver should be paid out of funds in his hands.

Where, in an action to recover for unpaid rents and for foreclosure of a mortgage on the lessee's furniture, a receiver was appointed, held that the compensation of the receiver should be paid out of funds in his hands and an order requiring the receiver's commission to be paid out of rent to accrue after the receiver ceased to act, and which never came into his possession, is improper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; L. H. Valentine and Grant Jackson, Judges.

Action by Elizabeth Y. Gordon against R. A. Green. From a judgment denying plaintiff part of the relief sought, and an order requiring the receiver to deliver property to defendant, plaintiff appeals, as well as from the order whereby the accounts of the receiver were settled and the receiver discharged. Reversed.

Stewart & Stewart and Clair S. Tappaan, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover certain rents alleged to be due and unpaid under the terms of a written lease. Two causes of action are alleged, the first being one to recover a judgment for unpaid rent and for the foreclosure of a mortgage upon certain furniture, given to secure the payment of the rent, and also the performance of all promises and conditions of the lease. By the second cause of action, plaintiff seeks to recover a judgment of foreclosure of a second mortgage upon the same property, given to secure the payment of a certain promissory note in the sum of $3,500.

As a defense to the first cause of action, defendant alleged that there had been a change in the written contract of lease by an oral executed agreement. To the second cause of action, the defendant alleged payment of interest and tender of the principal.

The lease was entered into by plaintiff and defendant on August 12, 1914, and by its terms was to continue until March 8, 1920, and defendant promised to pay plaintiff as rent for the premises the sum of $625 per month, payable in advance on the 8th day of each month up to the 8th day of March, 1915, and the sum of $666⅔ per month for the succeeding five years of the term. To secure the payment of the rent in accordance with the terms of the lease, one of the mortgages here involved was executed. Defendant entered into the occupancy of the hotel premises under the lease, by the terms of which there became due to plaintiff, as rent, the sum of $43,041.61, and at the time of the commencement of this action, on December 15, 1919, defendant had paid to the plaintiff the sum of $30,666.89, leaving $12,394.77 unpaid. These facts are not disputed by defendant, but he alleges that the lease with reference to the amount of rent due thereunder was changed by agreement between the parties.

The trial court found that defendant had entered into possession of the premises described in the lease set forth in the first cause of action, but further found that such terms were subsequently changed by an oral agreement between the parties, and that such agreement was carried out by the lessee and accepted by the lessor. This change in the lease, as found by the trial court, consisted in an agreement which in substance provided that, pending the hard times and general depression of the hotel, apartment house, and rooming house business in the city of Los Angeles, the lessor agreed to accept in lieu of the amounts specified in the lease all of the income derived from the premises over and above the expenses of the business, and a moderate allowance for the support of the defendant and his wife for managing said business. It further found that this condition had improved after the 8th day of September, 1919, since which time defendant had promptly paid to plaintiff monthly the rent, according to the terms of the lease. The court thereupon entered a judgment that plaintiff take nothing by her first cause of action; and that, as to the second cause of action, she have and recover the sum of $3,500, and ordered the receiver who had heretofore been appointed by the court to forthwith "deliver the said property held by him to defendant, and account immediately as to the receivership."

Plaintiff appealed from the judgment so rendered on the first cause of action, and from the order requiring the receiver to deliver the property in his possession to the defendant. The appeal from this portion of the judgment is taken upon the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff also appeals from the order whereby the accounts of the receiver were settled and the receiver discharged. This appeal is taken upon a bill of exceptions.

We will first dispose of the questions raised by the first appeal.

[1] Appellant claims that the oral change in the written contract, as found by the court, shows that it was never intended by the parties to be other than an agreement for the suspension of the time of payment of the amount of rent due under the contract, for which ample security existed, and that the construction given by the trial court to the agreement can avail defendant nothing, for the reason that the agreement as found is entirely without consideration. In this behalf it is argued that the carrying out of the oral agreement by defendant did not validate the contract, for the reason that it was simply the performance of the very act which defendant was legally obligated by his written contract to do, and that defendant therefore suffered no prejudice by the performance of the alleged modification.

We see no escape from this contention. In the absence of any sufficient consideration, the law supplies no means and affords no remedy to compel the performance of a contract. Neither the promise to do, nor the actual doing of that which the promisor is by law or subsisting contract bound to do, is a sufficient consideration to support a promise made to the person upon whom the legal liability rests, either to induce him to perform what he is bound to do, or to make a promise so to do. Accordingly, it has been held in this state that neither a promise to perform a duty nor its performance constitutes a consideration for a contract. Deland v. Hiett, 27 Cal. 611, 87 Am. Dec. 102; Siddall v. Clark, 89 Cal. 321, 26 Pac. 829; Sullivan v. Sullivan, 99 Cal. 193, 33 Pac. 862; MacKenzie v. Hodgkin, 126 Cal. 593, 59 Pac. 36, 77 Am. St. Rep. 209.

See, also, Goldsborough v. Gable, 140 Ill. 269, 29 N. E. 722, 15 L. R. A. 294; Seymour v. Hughes, 55 Misc. Rep. (N. Y.) 251, 105 N. Y. Supp. 249; Wharton v. Anderson, 28 Minn. 302, 9 N. W. 860. The modified agreement, as found by the court to have been made between the parties, was therefore a mere nudum pactum, which did not relieve defendant from the obligations under his lease.

[2] Under her second appeal, plaintiff complains of the order of the trial court requiring the receiver to deliver property in his possession, and further requiring that the receiver's compensation be paid out of rent due the lessor from the lessee, which accrued after the receiver ceased to act, and which rent never came into his hands. The compensation allowed the receiver should have been paid from the funds in his hands, and the balance retained to be applied to the payment of the judgment to which plaintiff was entitled.

From what we have said, it follows that the judgment in favor of defendant on the first cause of action should be reversed. Upon the second appeal, the order directing payment of the receiver's fees out of the rents accruing after the receiver was discharged is reversed, as is also the order discharging the receiver.

It is so ordered.

WRIGHT & KIMBROUGH v. DEWEES et al.
(Civ. 3569.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1921.)

1. Brokers ⊜48—Right to commissions depends on broker being procuring cause of sale and completing transaction in contract.

To entitle a broker to recover commissions under the ordinary broker's contract, the evidence must show that he was the procuring cause of the sale, and that the transaction was completed in the contract, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner.

2. Brokers ⊜56(3)—Sale by owner after termination of broker's contract held not to entitle broker to commission.

In a contract entitling the broker to a commission for sale during the contract, the clause "or after termination of this contract, if sold to a party to whose attention said property was brought through the agency" of the broker, was designed to protect the broker for his efforts during the life of the contract resulting in a sale not consummated until after the termination of the contract, and did not take the contract out of the general rule requiring the broker to be the procuring and efficient cause of the sale, so that, where such a contract dated January 7, 1916, was for 60 days and thereafter until notice, and the price named was $18,000 cash, and, no sale having been made, the contract was canceled March 31, 1916, and in January, 1917, a purchaser, whom the broker had secured no offer from, offered $12,000 for the property, which the owner accepted, the broker was not entitled to commissions.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; E. P. Shortall, Judge.

Action by Wright & Kimbrough, a corporation, against C. W. Dewees and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Elliott & Atkinson, of Sacramento, and Oliver Ellsworth, of San Francisco, (Wm. A. Sitton, of Sacramento, of counsel), for appellants.

Downey, Pullen & Downey, and Joseph L. Knowles, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Defendants appeal from a judgment rendered against them in the sum of $600 for commissions, with interest and costs. The action arises out of a contract for the sale of real estate between defendants, the owners, and plaintiff, a corporation engaged in the real estate business, and containing, among others, the following provision:

"The said 'seller' agrees should a sale or exchange of said above-described property upon said or any satisfactory terms be effected during the period of time hereinafter named, by either party to this agreement, or any other party, or after termination of this contract, if sold to a party to whose attention said property was brought through the agency of the said 'agent,' that the said 'agent' shall receive out of the first payment made on said property 5 per cent. of the price for which said property was sold as a commission for promoting said sale."

The contract, dated January 7, 1916, was for 60 days and thereafter until the expiration of 10 days' written notice, and the price named therein was $18,000 cash. After the termination of the contract defendants personally sold the property to one Mull.

The question here presented is the proper construction of the above clause. There is no substantial conflict in the evidence. It appears that Mr. Mull and his wife were well acquainted with the property, defendants' residence located in Sacramento, before plaintiff entered into the situation. More than a year before defendants contracted with plaintiff for its sale the Mulls were looking at other property in the neighborhood, with the object of buying, and defendants at that time talked to Mr. Mull and endeavored to sell their home to him. Thereafter the Mulls frequently looked at the property from the outside of the house and talked with defendants about it; the last conversation occurring just prior to contracting with plaintiff. No offer, however, was made to defendants as a result of these conversations. When plaintiff interviewed the Mulls regarding the property, they told him they knew it was for sale. Defendants also told plaintiff, after the contract was signed, that the Mulls were interested in the property and were good prospects. Plaintiff likewise was unsuccessful in obtaining an offer from the Mulls, although he took them to see the property once or twice, being the first to show them the interior of the house, and endeavored to sell it to them. Mr. Wright, plaintiff's representative in this matter, then reported to defendants that the Mulls were no longer interested in the property and to forget about them as prospective purchasers; that he had seen plans which they had prepared for a home which they intended building. Thereafter, and on March 31, 1916, defendants served upon plaintiff written notice of cancellation of the contract as therein provided, no sale having been made, and no offer whatever having been obtained from Mr. Mull. About a month later plaintiff solicited a new contract of sale from defendants, which they refused. The matter was dropped, so far as the Mulls were concerned, until several months later, when negotiations were entered into between Mull and defendants, as the court found, without fraud as to plaintiff. In January, 1917, about 9 months after the contract was canceled, and after plaintiff had ceased all negotiations in the matter, Mull offered defendants $12,000, for which defendants sold to them. Mr. Mull testified that he was not influenced in the purchase by anything which plaintiff did, and had dismissed the proposition entirely from his mind; that he did not come to the conclusion of paying $12,000 for the property until practically the day he bought it, when Mr. Dewees offered to sacrifice it. Defendants had, during the life of the contract, refused an offer of $16,000 made by another client of plaintiff. The court found "that plaintiff took no part in these subsequent and final negotiations which resulted in said sale," but nevertheless gave judgment for plaintiff.

[1] The law is well settled by a long line of decisions that in order to entitle a broker to recover commissions under the ordinary broker's contract the evidence must show that he was the procuring cause of the sale.

"The rule is that, to entitle a broker to a commission for the sale of real estate which he has been given by the owner authority to sell, he must produce before the owner a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase at the price and on the terms specifically expressed in the contract of employment. While a change made by the owner, when consummating the sale, in the price of the land or the terms of the sale from those specified in the broker's contract, cannot of itself affect or impair in any way the right of the broker to his commission, the latter cannot claim a commission unless his efforts are the procuring or inducing cause of the sale. * * * 'In order for the broker to recover, the evidence must show that his efforts were the procuring cause, and not merely one in a chain of causes.'" Roth v. Thomson 40 Cal. App. 208, 180 Pac. 656; Waterman v. Boltinghouse, 82 Cal. 659, 23 Pac. 195; Snook v. Page, 29 Cal. App. 246, 155 Pac. 107; Dolan v. Scanlan, 57 Cal. 261; Ayres v. Thomas, 116 Cal. 140, 47 Pac. 1013.

[2] The evidence must also show that the transaction was completed within the time limited in the contract, unless the delay was caused by the negligence, fault, or fraud of the owner. Ropes v. John Rosenfeld's Son, 145 Cal. 671, 677, 678, 79 Pac. 354; Brown v. Mason, 155 Cal. 155, 99 Pac. 867, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 328; Naylor v. Ashton, 20 Cal. App. 544, 130 Pac. 181. The obvious purpose of the insertion in the above-quoted clause of the words "or after termination of this contract, if sold to a party to whose attention said property was brought through the agency of the said agent" was to protect plaintiff for his efforts during the life of the contract resulting in a sale not consummated until after the termination of the contract. As said in Kimmell v. Skelly, 130 Cal. 555, 559, 62 Pac. 1067, 1068:

"The parties to a brokers' contract are at liberty to make the compensation of the broker depend upon any lawful conditions they see fit to place therein. The single question is: What does the contract provide?"

The contract in the instant case is distinguishable from the provision of the contract under construction in the decision in that case, also in Rucker v. Hall, 105 Cal. 425, 38 Pac. 962, and Maze v. Gordon, 96 Cal. 61, 30 Pac. 962. In Kimmell v. Skelly the contract provided for employment as sole and exclusive agents at a fixed compensation in case of a sale by any one during the term of their employment. In Rucker v. Hall the contract provided, if the owner found a purchaser independent of the agents, she would pay them one-half of the specified commission on a sale to their customer "as compensation for their services in advertising," etc. In Maze v. Gordon the brokers' contract was for 12 months and provided for payment of commission "in the event of withdrawing the sale of said property during the time." Here the contract provided:

"If sold to a party to whose attention said property was brought through the agency of said agent," the broker shall receive 5 per cent. "as a commission for promoting said sale."

This language imports an obligation on the part of the broker, to entitle him to commissions, to do something more than merely show the property and make unsuccessful efforts wholly unconnected with and to no extent traceable to the subsequent sale. His commissions depended entirely upon results accomplished—for "promoting" or procuring the sale. There is nothing in the language of this contract which takes it out of the general rule requiring the broker to be the procuring or efficient cause of the sale in order to entitle him to commissions.

The principles stated in Strout v. Hubbard, 104 Me. 366, 71 Atl. 1020 and Moore v. Holman Real Estate Co., 129 Ark. 465, 196 S. W. 479, cited by respondent, are in conflict with this rule. However, in the former case the facts were far more favorable to a recovery measured by the "procuring cause" requirement than in the instant case. The broker, during the life of the contract, obtained an offer from the subsequent purchaser and brought him into negotiations with the owner. The latter rejected the offer. Five days later he canceled the contract, and but one week later sold to the same party for only $120 more than the offer obtained by the broker. It appears from the facts stated in Moore v. Holman that the broker's efforts were the procuring cause of the sale, which was made within two months from the expiration of the contract, and that he was justly entitled to his commissions. The contract provided for payment of commissions to the broker if the property should be sold "on information secured through this agency." The dissenting opinion criticized the reasoning of the majority opinion, saying a sale "on information secured through this agency" should be construed to mean on information sufficient to constitute the moving cause of the sale.

In Williams v. Leslie, 111 Ind. 70, 12 N. E. 102, the provision of the contract under construction was:

"If a customer is introduced through the agency of the said Leslie [the broker], and a sale is afterwards consummated with such customer, I agree to pay the commission before mentioned, whether the time of this agreement shall have expired or not." (Emphasis added here.)

The court said:

"The effect of that clause was, that in the event of a sale, where or by whomsoever consummated, if made to a customer introduced through the agency of Leslie—that is, if the latter was the procuring cause of the sale—he was to have his commission." (Emphasis added here.)

In Shipman v. Wilkeson (Sup.) 112 N. Y. Supp. 895, in which the facts were very similar to those in the instant case, the decisive question was the meaning of the clause in the contract entitling the broker to commission if the farm was sold after the expiration of the contract "on information obtained through your agency." The court said:

"The only valid purpose of the stipulation in question must be to protect the broker from loss of compensation for successful efforts in procuring a purchaser, culminating in a sale on the stipulated terms after the broker's authority to effect a sale has terminated. It is a shield to protect the agent, not a sword to injure his principal."

For the reasons given, the judgment is reversed.

ANAHEIM CITRUS FRUIT ASS'N v. YEOMAN. (Civ. 3416.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 16, 1921.)

1. Damages ⟸79(1)—50 cents per box liquidated damages for fruit marketed outside citrus fruit association held recoverable from member as liquidated damages.

A by-law of a citrus fruit growers' co-operative marketing association requiring a stockholder, failing to permit the association to market his fruit while remaining a member, to pay 50 cents per box for every box of fruit otherwise sold or consigned, held enforceable under Civ. Code, §§ 1670, 1671, by action by the association against such a member, as providing for liquidated damages, not a penalty.

2. Contracts ⟸116(6) — Monopolies ⟸18(1)—Citrus fruit growers' association held not a monopoly or in restraint of trade.

A citrus fruit growers' co-operative marketing association held not to be presumed, without proof, to have a purpose to do acts in restraint of trade or produce an unlawful monopoly, in view of St. 1909, p. 593, so that its complaint against a member to collect liquidated damages under its by-laws of 50 cents per box for his marketing his fruit through other agencies than plaintiff was not demurrable.

3. Agriculture ⟸6 — Fruit growers' association, though not for profit, could collect liquidated damages from member violating by-laws.

That a citrus fruit growers' co-operative marketing association was a nonprofit organization did not militate against its right to collect from a member liquidated damages incurred by him for marketing his fruit through other agencies, in the absence of a showing of intent to divert the money thus collected to some ultra vires purpose.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by the Anaheim Citrus Fruit Association against L. C. Yeoman. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Leonard Evans, of Anaheim, and Frank F. Oster, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. C. Head and A. W. Rutan, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this action there was a judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant has appealed therefrom, adopting the alternative method in bringing up the record. There is printed in appellant's brief material portions of the judgment roll and such evidence as is relevant to a consideration of the questions presented.

The cause of action alleged in the complaint was for the recovery of a sum of money as liquidated damages arising under a term of a contract made by defendant with the plaintiff. In the record presented it is shown that the plaintiff was at all times material to the controversy a corporation organized for the purpose of enabling its members to jointly conduct the operation of harvesting and marketing citrus fruits grown upon land owned by such members. The underlying plan of the organization was co-operative, and no persons were eligible to membership except those who produced citrus fruit which they desired to market. The by-laws which were subscribed by the stockholders provided that the corporation should have the sole and exclusive right to pick, grade, pack, market, and sell the citrus fruit raised by the members on the land described in the certificates of stock—in brief, gave to the association the exclusive right to manage and control the harvesting and marketing of crops of the several members. The condition expressed in the by-laws under which the alleged cause of action arose was that which required of a stockholder who failed to permit the association to market his fruit, while remaining a member, that he pay the sum of 50 cents per box for every box of fruit otherwise sold or consigned. In the year 1919 the defendant, who was then a member of the association plaintiff, marketed 568 boxes of oranges through agencies outside of the association, and refused to pay the stipulated 50 cents per box to the plaintiff. This action was thereafter brought.

Appellant insists that the judgment rendered in this case cannot be upheld for several reasons, chief of which is that the stipulation expressed in the by-laws providing for the payment of 50 cents per box by each stockholder who should violate the agreement is void and of no effect; this because, as it is argued, the condition imposed a penalty which the law does not permit to be recovered.

[1] Aside from any provisions of statute, it has long been held under decisions having their basis in the common law that a contract is not enforceable where a sum of money as a penalty is provided to be paid in the event of a breach, and where the sum fixed has no reference to, and finds no support in, the amount of actual damage sustained by the complaining party. Anson on Contracts, par. 347. The effort of the law has always been to work the equitable result that for the breach of a simple contract obligation there shall be cast upon the delinquent party a liability to respond to such damages only as will furnish reasonable compensation for the injury done. Hence it has been held that a penalty, so stated to be and answering to its definition strictly, is never recoverable, but that the party shall be remitted to his remedy for compensatory relief. It has also been held, nevertheless, that an agreement fixing the amount of damages for the breach of a contract in advance, where such amount could be shown to be reasonably proportionate to the actual damages sustained, or where, because of the peculiar nature of the contract, it would be extremely difficult to ascertain the amount in which the innocent party has suffered damage, is allowed to be enforced. Sedgwick on Damages, vol. 1, par. 403 et seq. Our Civil Code (sections 1670 and 1671) has narrowed the rule by not allowing the enforcement of a condition fixing damages in advance except "when, from the nature of the case, it would be impracticable or extremely difficult to fix the actual damage"; hence we have only to inquire in this case as to whether the contract was, in its terms and conditions, and as shown by surrounding circumstances, such as to fall within the denominated class. In construing contracts for the purpose of determining whether the damages provided to be secured should be treated as a penalty, or as damages properly liquidated, the courts have paid some attention to the terms used by the parties in describing these damages. For instance, in Tayloe v. Sandiford, 7 Wheat. 13, 5 L. Ed. 384, the court said:

"The parties themselves denominate it a penalty, and it would require very strong evidence, to authorize the court to say that their own words do not express their own intent."

This language is a fair expression of the conclusion expressed in earlier cases. It need only be added that more recent authorities, including decisions of our own Supreme Court, have receded from the view that the language of the parties in characterizing the damages fixed is controlling or of any great force in determining the legal effect to be given the contract; this for the reason that the intention of the parties is not the main fact to be ascertained in such a case, but it is rather that the court shall be enabled to find as to whether, under all the circumstances, the parties have made a contract which is, under the law, enforceable. Under this rule the assertions of the persons concerned as expressed in their contract become items only to be considered in the aggregate of the evidence. Our Supreme Court in Nakagawa v. Okamoto, 164 Cal. 718, 130 Pac. 707, has said:

"In determining whether a provision in a contract is for liquidated damage or for a penalty, 'the fundamental rule so often announced is that the construction of the stipulations depends in each case upon the intent of the parties, as evidenced by the entire agreement construed in the light of the circumstances under which it was made.'"

Upon analysis it will be seen that the cases of Potter v. Ahrens, 110 Cal. 674, 43 Pac. 388, and Consolidated Lumber Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 33 Cal. App. 698, 166 Pac. 385, announce neither a more extended nor limited construction than is declared applicable in the case first cited. In controversies of this kind the difficulty is not so much in finding the rule of law to apply to a case which admittedly falls within the excepted class described in section 1671, Civil Code, but rather to determine whether under the given facts the case is entitled to be so classified. The parties to the contract here under consideration did denominate the sums which the defendant would be required to pay by reason of a failure to market his fruit through the plaintiff association as "liquidated damages" so that, as an item in the evidence suggesting proper interpretation to be given, the expression used indicates a recoverable damage, and not a penalty. Irrespective of this expression in the contract, we think that the facts and circumstances shown in evidence all support the plaintiff's contention that recovery should be sustained for the amount fixed by the by-laws of the association. The association was organized for the purpose of the better handling of citrus fruits through the co-operative and joint effort of its members. From the nature of the organization and the statement of its purposes as found in its articles and by-laws, it can be fairly and reasonably inferred that by the co-operation of its members mutual advantages would accrue to all through greater economy in handling and shipping and the securing of more advantageous marketing facilities. These results would be dependent directly upon the performance by the members of their agreement to deliver their fruit into the hands of the association for the purposes declared. Defendant sought to show at the trial that the damage which would accrue to the association by reason of any of its members failing or refusing to market their fruit through the association could be easily and exactly ascertained, and that such damage would consist wholly of a proportionate amount of overhead operating cost. By the line of questioning pursued it was made clear that the association would suffer an actual monetary loss by reason of the failure of defendant to deliver his fruit at the association packing house for market, as he had agreed to do, but in the very nature of the case we do not think that such damage should be the only damage considered to have been suffered by the plaintiff. Other elements have already been suggested. The existence and life of the association itself depended upon its being furnished fruit to dispose of in the public market. A reduction in the amount of fruit so handled would not only tend to increase the overhead cost to the nontransgressing members, but, we may assume, to some extent affect the prestige and standing of the association as a marketing concern. The argument would be the same, regardless of the quantity of fruit which might have been delivered by the defendant, whether it composed but a small fractional part or one-half or more of the entire product designed to be marketed by the plaintiff agency. Enough has been said, we think, to show that the case falls within the class as to which the law permits damages to be liquidated by contract in advance of their occurrence. It follows as a necessary conclusion that plaintiff was entitled to recover the exact amount fixed in its contract as the sum per box which defendant should pay by reason of his failure to market this fruit in the manner agreed.

[2] There is nothing in the articles of incorporation of the plaintiff or its by-laws, or in the evidence of its methods, which tends to show that any purpose of the association was to do acts in restraint of trade or produce an unlawfully monopoly. The statute of this state defining acts which are made penal as having an improper effect upon merchandising expressly excepts organizations formed for the purpose of conducting operations for marketing at a reasonable profit or the marketing of products "which cannot otherwise be so marketed." Stats. of 1909, p. 593. It will not be inferred, without proof of the fact, that an organization, the purposes of which appear to be legal and legitimate on their face, is actuated by a hidden design to operate in a way that is prohibited by law. None of the cases cited by appellant fit the facts illustrated here. Herriman v. Menzies, 115 Cal. 16, 44 Pac. 730, 35 L. R. A. 318, 56 Am. St. Rep. 81, cited by respondent, is in point as sustaining the conclusions which we have just expressed.

The complaint of plaintiff contained a statement of the provisions as to the organization of the plaintiff, the fact that the defendant was a member thereof, and set out that portion of the by-laws relating to the agreement made by the members of the association respecting the marketing of their fruit and the paying of the amount of 50 cents per box for a failure to deliver the fruit to the association; it contained a statement of the number of boxes of oranges which were diverted from the agency of the plaintiff by the defendant, and a statement of the demand made by the plaintiff upon the defendant, and an allegation that plaintiff had suffered damages by the act of defendant, and that it was "impracticable and extremely difficult to fix the actual damage suffered." The demurrer of the defendant to the complaint was, we think, properly overruled.

[3] The plaintiff's existence as a nonprofit association does not in any wise militate against its right to claim the damages recovered. As a corporation considered singly, it designed to make no profit; the advantages, pecuniary and otherwise, resultant upon its operations, descended immediately to the co-operating stockholders. As an agency for the purpose of distributing this benefit in such manner, the corporation existed as such, and by its corporate name it was entitled to prosecute this action. As to whether it might, upon collecting the money, sequester it in a fund not contemplated by the terms of its articles, and so consummate an act ultra vires, is of no concern here. No such intent is shown.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

LOS ANGELES GAS & ELECTRIC CORPORATION v. DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC SERVICE OF CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (Civ. 3674.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1921.)

Electricity ⊂1½ — Public service commissions ⊂6—Municipally owned public utilities are not subject to Railroad Commission.

The Railroad Commission is not empowered to regulate and supervise municipally owned public utilities, so that a municipality constructing electric works to supply itself and its inhabitants with electricity, in connection with its aqueduct system constructed under Const. art. 11, § 19, need not obtain from the Railroad Commission the certificate required by Public Utilities Act, § 50, of public convenience and necessity.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corporation against the Department of Public Service of the City of Los Angeles and others. From judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Paul Overton, S. W. Guthrie, and H. J. Goudge, all of Los Angeles, and Samuel Poorman, Jr., for appellant.

Charles S. Burnell, City Atty., W. B. Mathews, Lewis E. Whitehead, and Ray C. Eberhard, all of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WASTE, P. J. Plaintiff brought this action to enjoin the department of public service of the city of Los Angeles, and the board of public service commissioners of that city, from erecting, constructing, operating, or maintaining an electrical distributing system in the city of Los Angeles, until such time as the Railroad Commission of the state should issue a certificate of "public convenience and necessity" therefor. The lower court rendered judgment in favor of the defendants, and plaintiff has appealed.

The plaintiff is a corporation engaged, under proper franchises, in generating, furnishing, and distributing electric energy to consumers in the city of Los Angeles and elsewhere, for compensation, and has erected and constructed poles, wires, conduits, and other electrical apparatus and appliances in the streets and public places of that city for the purpose of carrying on its business. Under the powers conferred by the state Constitution (article XI, § 19) and its own charter, the city of Los Angeles constructed an aqueduct system for the purpose of providing for the use of its inhabitants an additional supply of water from the watershed of the Owens river. This aqueduct, by reason of the fact that its intake is more than 2,000 feet higher than its southerly terminus in the city of Los Angeles, affords opportunites along its course for the development of electric energy from the fall or flow of the water. Since March 23, 1912, the city, through its board of public service commissioners, has been engaged in the construction of works for generating electric energy from the flow of water in the aqueduct, and for transmitting it into the city, where plants and a complete system have been constructed for distributing such energy for domestic, commercial, and industrial uses and purposes, including public street lighting. More than $8,000,000 have been expended in this enterprise. At the time this litigation was initiated, the city of Los Angeles, in competition with plaintiff, was supplying some 15,000 consumers with electric energy, and was furnishing approximately 40 per cent. of all public street lighting in the city.

In bringing this action for an injunction, the appellant takes the position that the respondents, in constructing and operating an electrical distributing system for the purpose of furnishing and supplying electric energy to the inhabitants of the city of Los Angeles, are not performing governmental functions, but are acting solely in a proprietary capacity, to the same extent as the plaintiff and other private corporations. It therefore contends that, in the operation of its public utilities, the city is subject, as are all private corporations thus engaged, to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act. Its particular complaint is that, before beginning the construction of its works, the city did not, and never has, obtained from the State Railroad Commission the certificate required by section 50 of the Public Utilities Act (Stats. 1915, p. 148), "that the present or future public convenience and necessity require, or will require, such construction," The city takes the ground that it was unnecessary for it to obtain such certificate, claiming that the Public Utilities Act has no application to any public service carried on by it as a municipal corporation.

The sole question presented on this appeal is whether or not the Railroad Commission of the state is empowered to regulate and supervise municipally owned public utilities. When the judgment in this action was rendered in the lower court, the proposition was an open one. Further controversy has, however, been precluded by the recent decision of the Supreme Court in City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission of California, 192 Pac. 25. In that case the city of Pasadena, under authority of its charter, constructed electric works for the purpose of supplying its inhabitants with electricity. It extended its wires to the adjoining city of South Pasadena, and thereafter supplied electricity to the inhabitants of the latter city for similar purposes. On complaint of the Pacific Gas & Electric Company, which was also engaged in supplying electricity to the inhabitants of South Pasadena, the Railroad Commission, assuming to act under the provisions of the Public Utilities Act, made an order requiring the city of Pasadena to file with it a complete schedule of all of its rates, rules, and regulations for the service of electric energy to consumers within the limits of South Pasadena. The city of Pasadena thereupon applied to the Supreme Court for certiorari to review the order of the commission, taking the exact position now assumed by the city of Los Angeles in the instant case, that the Public Utilities Act, under which the Railroad Commission made the order, has no application to any public service carried on by a municipal corporation. The court, in its decision written by Mr. Justice Shaw, and concurred in by the other members of the court, held that the provisions of the Constitution authorizing the Legislature to make laws conferring on the Railroad Commission power to control, supervise, and regulate public utilities in the state of California, and to fix rates for commodities furnished by public utilities, apply exclusively to private corporations and natural persons, or associations of persons, and do not include public service carried on by municipalities. It also held that the Constitution did not give the Legislature authority to confer upon the commission power to regulate the rates of service charged by municipal corporations operating municipally owned public utilities.

The court, therefore, squarely held that the Public Utilities Act, under which the Railroad Commission assumed to act in the Pasadena Case, the provision of which plaintiff in the instant case attempts to invoke, has no application to any public service carried on by a municipal corporation under the authority of the Constitution and laws of the state. City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, etc., supra. A petition for a rehearing of the case after the decision was denied.

No good can be accomplished by further reference or apt quotation from that opinion. Suffice it to say that it comprehensively deals with, and satisfactorily settles, the exact legal question involved in this case. The lower court was correct in holding that the Railroad Commission was without jurisdiction in the instant case, and that it was unnecessary for the city of Los Angeles to apply to the commission for the certificate of public convenience and necessity in the matter of the construction and maintenance of its municipally operated electric plants and distributing systems.

The conclusion we have reached renders it unnecessary to consider the question raised by respondents, whether or not the plaintiff could maintain the action.

The judgment is affirmed.

HUNSTOCK v. ROYAL SECURITIES CORPORATION et al. (Civ. 3476.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 18, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 16, 1921.)

1. Principal and surety ⊂=42—That surety did not know bond for completion of building was to secure purchase price immaterial.

A lot purchaser, not having funds to pay either for the lot or the building he desired to erect thereon, induced the vendor to consent to his mortgaging the lot to obtain funds. The vendor exacted a bond to protect him in case of purchaser's failure to complete the building. The building was never completed, and the security was all exhausted on sale under the mortgage. Held, that the surety was liable on the bond, although he did not know that the bond was to secure unpaid purchase money, for, if the building had been completed, the security would have been ample to protect both vendor and mortgagee.

2. Principal and surety ⊂=59 — Strained construction of a contract of suretyship improper.

A surety will not be held bound through any strained construction of his contract, but under Civ. Code, § 2837, the contract should be construed just as the meaning of other contracts is determined.

3. Principal and surety ⊂=59 — Intent being ascertained, responsibility of surety is limited by conditions imposed.

Once the intent of a written contract of suretyship is ascertained, the responsibility of the surety is limited strictly by the conditions imposed by such construction.

4. Principal and surety ⊂=59 — Commercial sureties are not favorites of the law.

A commercial surety who receives a premium for executing a surety bond is not a favorite of the law, and as such entitled to strict construction of the contract as an ordinary surety for accommodation.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Robert H. Hunstock against the Royal Securities Corporation and Frank E. Ruben. From a judgment for plaintiff the first-named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Muhleman & Crump, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Seth B. Smith and G. C. De Garmo, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This action was brought and recovery allowed upon a bond executed by one Ruben with the appellant corporation as surety, and in favor of the plaintiff. Judgment was in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and from that judgment this appeal is taken.

As to the main facts no dispute is shown in the record. It appears that in November, 1916, Ruben was desirous of purchasing from the plaintiff a lot in the city of Los Angeles upon which to erect an apartment house. The price of the property, as agreed upon between plaintiff and Ruben, was the sum of $15,000. Ruben had not the money to pay the whole of the purchase price, or in fact, as appears later, any part of it. However, it was agreed that $4,000 in cash should be paid to the plaintiff, and that the balance of the price, to wit, $11,000 was to be evidenced by two notes, one for $1,000 and another for $10,000, which notes were to mature in 10 and 20 months respectively, and to be secured by a trust deed which was to be second in priority to another debt which is hereinafter referred to. In order to secure funds with which to pay to plaintiff the $4,000 and to erect the apartment house, it was necessary for Ruben to borrow $45,000. Plaintiff understood this and agreed that a trust deed might be given by Ruben to secure payment of the $45,000, which deed plaintiff agreed might be first in point of security to the trust deed made in his favor, which has just been referred to, with the condition, however, that Ruben should secure a bond running to the plaintiff, the penalty of which bond was to be the sum of $10,000, and which bond would guarantee that Ruben would erect and complete the apartment house in accordance with plans and specifications already prepared, and which had been approved by the plaintiff. The various documents were executed simultaneously, the initial payment on the purchase price was made, and the transaction was closed. Ruben commenced the erection of the building and continued the same for a number of months, when he ceased work, leaving the structure uncompleted. He had not only failed to discharge his interest obligations to the beneficiary under the first trust deed, but also to the plaintiff. Before proceeding with a necessary statement of further facts, we here quote the material portions of the bond instrument:

"Know all men by these presents that Frank E. Ruben, as principal, and Royal Securities Corporation, a corporation, as surety, are held and firmly bound unto R. H. Hunstock in the sum of ten thousand ($10,000.00) dollars gold coin of the United States of America to be paid to the said R. H. Hunstock, his executors, administrators, or assigns, for which payment well and truly to be made we bind ourselves, our heirs, executors, and administrators, successors, and assigns, firmly by these presents.

"Sealed with our seals and dated the 14th day of November, 1916.

"The condition of the above obligation is such that Frank E. Ruben, the principal herein, shall construct and complete a ninety (90) roomed apartment house on the premises known as lot eleven (11) and the north half of lot twelve (12), block K, Knob Hill tract, being located on the west side of Alvarado street between Sixth street and Ocean View avenue, which building shall be completed within six months from the date hereof, according to the plans and specifications, then this obligation to be void, otherwise to remain in full force and virtue."

It will be noted that the six months' term specified in the bond expired on the 14th of May, 1917. At that time Ruben was still at work on the building, and he continued so at work until some time in July of that year, when he abandoned the structure. At or shortly after the date when Ruben ceased to work upon the building, and in July, the plaintiff by his attorneys notified the surety on the bond of the failure of Ruben to complete the structure and advised the surety that plaintiff would look to the former for compensation for any damages which might be sustained by reason of "delay in completing this building." On July 25, 1917, plaintiff exercised his option to declare the principal and interest due on the two promissory notes of Ruben and thereafter proceeded to have a sale made of the property under the trust deed. In October, 1917, the holder of the first trust deed exercised a like option and caused the property to be sold for the sum of $45,000, that being the principal sum advanced under that loan agreement. Under the plaintiff's sale but $500 was realized, leaving a balance due on the principal of $10,500. The sale under the first trust deed wiped out the security and extinguished the interest of the plaintiff. This action was then brought to recover from the surety. The court found upon sufficient evidence that, had the building been constructed by Ruben as agreed, the property would have been worth not less than $65,000, but that in the state it was when abandoned by Ruben it was worth not to exceed $45,000 (that being the amount of the first lien debt). There was also sufficient evidence to support the finding as made that at the time the surety corporation entered into the undertaking in favor of the plaintiff it had knowledge of the transaction between the plaintiff and Ruben in which the bond was required to be given; this with the exception that the court made a further finding in the following terms:

"Said defendant did not know or have any notice that said bond was given to secure any part of the purchase price of said lot or for any purpose other than to insure the completion of said building."

So it is made to appear that, had Ruben completed the building as he agreed to construct it, in accordance with plans and specifications approved by the parties, the property would have been worth enough to have repaid both the holder of the first trust deed and the plaintiff for the full amount of their debts. That this result would have followed is not made the subject of any serious argument in the case.

[1-3] Appellant's claim that the judgment should not be sustained rests upon the contention that under the terms of the undertaking and the particular finding made by the court as last adverted to the obligation of the surety could in no wise be extended so as to cover any loss suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the failure of Ruben to pay his purchase price notes according to their terms, and the argument is that the only liability which could accrue under the terms of the bond would be liability for the rental value of the property with a completed building thereupon. If there were limiting terms included or suggested by necessary construction of the bond instrument, which would tend to show that the agreement was only as contended for by appellant, that position might be maintained. The case made in the record is that the plaintiff exacted the bond from Ruben for the very purpose of insuring him against the failure of Ruben to erect upon the property a building which would make the value of the whole adequate security for the unpaid portion of the purchase price. Whether the particular intent was expressed to the surety we think of no moment. The instrument executed by it was general in its terms and did guarantee that Ruben would erect and complete the building referred to within the time specified. A breach of the condition would result in the surety becoming liable for any damages which would accrue to plaintiff as a natural and reasonable result of the failure of Ruben to perform his contract. By reason of Ruben's default, the contemplated security was depreciated and plaintiff suffered damage. We think he was entitled to recover. The citations presented by appellant as to the favored position which a surety occupies under the law all state well-known and fundamental propositions. True enough it is that a surety will not be held bound through any strained construction of the terms of his contract. In construing his contract and in ascertaining its meaning, precisely the same rules apply as to parties in other situations. Civ. Code, § 2837; Sather Banking Co. v. Briggs Co., 138 Cal. 724, 72 Pac. 352. Once the intent of the instrument is ascertained, then the responsibility of the surety is limited strictly by the conditions imposed under such construction. Stevens v. Partridge, 88 Ill. App. 665; Brandt on Suretyship (3d Ed.) par. 107.

[4] While there seems to be no occasion for invoking the exception to the rule in this case, it may be remarked that the tenor of more recent authorities is to hold that surety companies issuing their obligations for a price, and being in the business of furnishing bonds, are less entitled to insist that they stand as favorites under the law than those who become bound as a matter of friendly accommodation. The surety here was such a corporation and received a premium for executing the bond.

From the conclusions expressed it follows that the judgment should not be disturbed.

The judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte VAN ZANDT. (Cr. 557.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 22, 1921.)

Criminal law ⊂=212—Verified complaint on personal knowledge sufficient to sustain issuance of a warrant without other depositions.

A verified complaint before a magistrate which contains direct allegations of the commission of a felony, and not merely allegations on information and belief, is sufficient to authorize the magistrate to issue a warrant, without his requiring other depositions in accordance with Pen. Code, §§ 811–813.

Application by J. N. Van Zandt for a writ of habeas corpus to secure his release from custody on a charge of forgery. Writ discharged.

Walter F. Lynch, of Stockton, for petitioner.

Edward Van Vranken, Dist. Atty., of Stockton, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. The petitioner is held in durance under a warrant issued by a magistrate of the county of San Joaquin, upon a complaint charging him with the crime of forgery. The allegations of the complaint are positive and not on information and belief. He urges the single point in support of his plea for liberty that a magistrate should not, on the complaint alone, unfortified with depositions, issue a warrant for the arrest of a person charged with the commission of a felony. He cites sections 811, 812, and 813 of the Penal Code as authority for this position. It is, we think, universally conceded that a complaint made upon information and belief must be thus supported. Ex parte Dimmig, 74 Cal. 164, 15 Pac. 619. While this case is clearly authority for the claim that a complaint based only upon information and belief will not support a criminal proceeding, it is likewise authority to the effect that the complaint alone may under proper circumstances be entirely sufficient.

We quote from that case the following instructive language:

"Of course, where there was some evidence upon which the magistrate acted, we would not interfere. It may be also true that the original information might be treated as a deposition; and in such view, if it contained positive evidence of facts tending to show guilt, it might be sufficient as a basis for the issuance of a warrant."

This case has been cited as authority in many later decisions, and it has never, so far as we are informed, been either overruled or doubted. It is quoted with approval in Matter of the Application of Mills Sing, 13 Cal. App. 736, 110 Pac. 693, where the court says:

"The complaint which initiates a criminal proceeding need not be verified. Pen. Code, § 806. If verified, however, and containing positive evidence of facts tending to show guilt, the same may be treated by the magistrate as the deposition required by section 812 of the Penal Code."

The Dimmig Case received consideration at the hands of the court in the case of Modern Loan Co. v. Police Court, 12 Cal. App. 582, 108 Pac. 56, and the court comments as follows:

"He also claims that under section 1527 of the Penal Code the evidentiary and not the ultimate facts should be stated. Here the affidavit set forth the commission of the larceny not upon information, but in positive terms, and in view of the decisions in Ex parte Dimmig, 74 Cal. 164 [15 Pac. 619], and People v. Staples, 91 Cal. 23 [27 Pac. 523], this last contention would seem to have as little merit as the first one."

It is possible that this quotation may be treated, in view of the ultimate conclusion of the court, as a dictum; still it is not without value in this connection. In the Staples Case, 91 Cal. 23, 27 Pac. 523, the precise point involved in the instant case was raised, and in passing thereon Chief Justice Beatty, sustained by the entire court, said:

"One ground of the motion was that the magistrate before whom his examination was had issued his warrant of arrest without having taken any depositions of witnesses in support of the charge laid in the complaint, thus violating, as he claims, the provisions of sections 811, 812, and 813 of the Penal Code. In support of this point he cites and relies on the case of Ex parte Dimmig, 74 Cal. 164. But that case lends no support to his contention, for two reasons: In the first place, the complaint in this case, unlike the complaint against Dimmig, is positive and direct in its allegation of every fact necessary to support the charge laid, and is therefore in itself a sufficient deposition within the doctrine of the Dimmig Case. In the second place," etc.

We find no case in the 70 years of our state's history in which an accused person has been discharged by any court of general appellate jurisdiction for the sole reason that the complaint was not corroborated with depositions, and we are confident that no such case can be found. Where the same point arises in tens of thousands of cases and it meets with the uniform acquiescence of the bench and bar, a strong inference arises that their acquiescence is justified.

In addition to the Dimmig Case, the petitioner refers us to a number of cases which he insists support his position. Some of these will be briefly noticed. In Ex parte Blake, 155 Cal. 586, 102 Pac. 269, 18 Ann. Cas. 815, strongly relied upon by petitioner, we find nothing not in harmony with the cases above cited. That was a case where the petitioner was charged in a justice's court with the commission of a misdemeanor of which the court had jurisdiction. The court quotes from the Dimmig Case with approval and points out a difference between complaints for felonies and mere misdemeanors. The case is not in point. He draws our attention to Ex parte Conner, 3 Cal. App. 241, 84 Pac. 999. It is true that in this particular case the court intimates the necessity for depositions in addition to the original information or complaint. But that was a proceeding under section 701 of the Penal Code, and the court justified its conclusion in these words:

"Nor do we think that the written information verified by her shows the facts necessary to justify the issue of the warrant."

This authority does not support the claims of the petitioner herein; on the contrary, the plain implication therefrom is that the verified information would have been held sufficient if it had shown the necessary facts. It seems that in proceedings under section 701 the complaining pleading is called an "information" instead of a complaint.

No more does Ex parte Hartwell, 28 Cal. App. 627, 153 Pac. 730, aid the petitioner. The reported opinion in that case contains a criticism of the complaint upon which the accused was arrested, but the only point before the court was the competency of the complaint as evidence upon the preliminary examination. It was held to be inadmissible for this purpose. The question as to its sufficiency to justify the issue of a warrant did not arise, and no attempt was made to decide it. The case contains no implication that a complaint under oath stating sufficient facts would not justify the issue of a warrant.

People v. Lee Look, 143 Cal. 216, 76 Pac. 1028, throws no more light on the question now under consideration than to show that the point can be raised only before examination and commitment.

Ex parte Spears, 88 Cal. 640, 26 Pac. 608, 22 Am. St. Rep. 341, discussed at the oral argument, does not throw any light on the question. In that case the complaint charged only "on information and belief," and it comes squarely within the doctrine of Ex parte Dimmig, supra.

Petitioner cites with some confidence the case of Church v. Calhoun, 129 Mich. 126, 88 N. W. 403. That case is not authority on any point involved herein. In that case the defendant was arrested in a civil action on a capias ad respondendum upon an affidavit by a layman charging the defendant with certain acts of malpractice which, it appeared, were within the knowledge only of technically skilled surgeons. The court held that the failure of the affidavit to show that possession of such skill by the affiant rendered it insufficient. It is argued that, as the instant case is a charge of forgery, the affiant cannot have known that the petitioner well or otherwise knew that the check was false, forged, and counterfeit. But this contention is not sound. While there are many cases where one person cannot be heard to say that another possesses knowledge of a given matter, there are nevertheless many cases in which he may, in a variety of ways, very satisfactorily know this. He may have heard the other admit it or he may have heard him make declarations from which the knowledge is infallibly inferred, or, again, he may have seen conditions which impute the knowledge. It is not insisted that any other matters stated in the complaint are such as might not have been known to the deponent.

Our conclusion is that an uncorroborated verified complaint, stating sufficient facts, justifies the magistrate in issuing a warrant of arrest. He must be "satisfied" therefrom that a crime has been committed, and, furthermore, he must find therefrom reasonable cause to believe that the accused is guilty. These things must be shown fully and by positive statement; but the Legislature did not intend to require close technical accuracy in discriminating between probative and ultimate facts. A less satisfactory rule would permit many guilty persons to escape and would render it difficult to apprehend criminals who commit certain classes of crimes.

The petitioner is remanded and the writ discharged.

KATZENBACH & BULLOCK CO. v. BRESLAUER. (Civ. 3661.)

(District Court of Appeals, First District, Division 2, California. March 17, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence not reviewable.

A finding by the trial court upon conflicting evidence is not reviewable.

2. Sales ⊂=335—Where title retained no lien exists requiring sale in manner of pledged property.

Where title to personal property is retained by the seller, no seller's lien exists, and seller is not required to sell in the same manner as in case of pledged property under Civ. Code, §§ 3002, 3049.

3. Sales ⊂=202(1), 335—No title passes where no cash paid under "cash on delivery" contract, so that resale need not be as if goods were pledged.

Where goods are sold "cash on delivery" and no cash is paid, the title remains in the seller, and in selling the goods for the buyer's account he is not obliged to sell in the manner of one enforcing a lien under Civ. Code, §§ 3002, 3049.

4. Sales ⊂=384(7)—Sale by seller for defaulting buyer's account fixes damages recoverable.

Where the seller, on buyer's refusal to accept, sold the goods and the price obtained by him was the highest price obtainable in the nearest available market, this was sufficient to fix his measure of damages, under Civ. Code, § 3311, in the absence of evidence that the price obtained was not the value of the goods.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by the Katzenbach & Bullock Company against A. Breslauer. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. Breslauer, in pro. per.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him in an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract by defendant for the purchase of a carload of caustic soda. The findings show that the plaintiff is a New Jersey corporation and filed a copy of its articles of incorporation in the office of the secretary of state of the state of California, and a certified copy thereof in the office of the county clerk of San Francisco; that the contract sued upon was entered into between the parties for the purchase and sale of a carload of caustic soda at an agreed price, f. o. b. San Francisco, payable cash on arrival; that upon the arrival of the goods, plaintiff notified defendant, and defendant thereupon refused to accept or pay for said goods; that the plaintiff, because of such refusal, was obliged to warehouse the goods and to sell them in the nearest available market, which was at San Francisco; and that said caustic soda was sold at the best price obtainable in said market.

[1] Some point was made by appellant that it had been mutually agreed between the parties that the contract should be canceled, abandoned, and rescinded. The trial court found, upon conflicting evidence, that it was not so agreed and that said contract was never canceled, abandoned, and rescinded. We are therefore not at liberty to go into this question of fact.

[2] The only other point made by the appellant is that the plaintiff did not have the right to sell the caustic soda without giving notice of sale to the defendant. Appellant contends that the present case falls within the provisions of sections 3002 and 3049, Civil Code, and that notice of sale was necessary. Section 3002 deals with pledged property, providing that notice shall be given to the pledgor of the time and place of sale. Section 3949 provides that one who sells personal property has a special lien thereon, dependent on possession, for its price, and may enforce such lien as in the case of a pledge. It is admitted by respondent that if the title to this caustic soda had passed to the defendant, the plaintiff would have had a lien thereon for its price and would have been bound to give notice of the time and place of sale as in the case of a pledge.

However, it has been held that where title to personal property is retained by the vendor, no lien exists. Eads v. Kessler, 121 Cal. 244, 53 Pac. 656; Rayfield v. Van Meter, 120 Cal. 416, 420, 52 Pac. 666; Gibbs v. Ranard, 86 Cal. 531, 25 Pac. 63. Under such circumstances, the vendor is not required to sell in the same manner as in a case of pledged property. Gibbs v. Ranard, supra.

[3, 4] It has been repeatedly held that where goods are sold to be paid for in cash upon delivery, no title passes until the cash is paid. Hilmer v. Hills, 138 Cal. at page 139, 70 Pac. 1080; Brinkley-Douglas Fruit Co. v. Silman, 33 Cal. App. 643, at page 647, 166 Pac. 371; Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., 106 Cal. 441, 39 Pac. 853. The trial court has found that the goods were sold to be paid for upon delivery. Payment was never made. Under such circumstances, the title remained in plaintiff and he could not enforce a lien against his own property. Gibbs v. Ranard, supra; Rayfield v. Van Meter, supra. The evidence and findings here are that the price obtained by plaintiff was the highest price obtainable in the nearest available market. That is all that is required of plaintiff under the circumstances here. Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., supra.

Section 3311, Civil Code, provides the measure of damages in case of a breach of the buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him. It is provided that in the event the property is not sold in accordance with section 3049, the damages shall be the excess, if any, of the amount due from the buyer, under the contract, over the value to the seller, together with the excess, if any, of the expenses properly incurred in carrying the property to market over those which would have been incurred for the carriage thereof, if the buyer had accepted it.

It will be observed from the case of Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., supra, that in a case where the title to the property has not passed, the vendor may or may not sell the same in accordance with the provisions of section 3049, Civil Code; the advantage of complying with the provisions of said section being that, in such case, the price obtained is conclusive evidence as to the value of the property. Under the method of sale adopted by the plaintiff here, the price obtained by him was not conclusive as to the value of goods. Hewes v. Germain Fruit Co., supra; Meyer v. McAllister, 24 Cal. App. 16, 140 Pac. 42. However, there was no substantial evidence offered that the price obtained was not the value of the goods, and there was evidence that it was the best price obtainable and was the value of the goods at the time, and, as we have stated, the trial court has found that the price was the best price obtainable.

We think there are no other matters that require discussion.

The judgment is affirmed.

CORTELYOU et ux. v. VOGEL et al.
(Civ. 3245.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1921.)

1. Mortgages ⟸596, 597—Substitution of deed of trust for mortgage held valid.

Where the parties to a mortgage, interest to which was in arrears, giving the mortgagee the right to foreclose, agreed that, instead of foreclosing, the parties should execute a deed of trust, that the note and mortgage be canceled, the interest thereon being added to the principal in the deed of trust, that the mortgagee be authorized to make further advances to protect the title, to be secured by the deed of trust, and that no equity of redemption should be allowed the mortgagor under the deed of trust after sale of the property under its power of sale, and that he might pay the indebtedness at any time up to and including a year from date of the agreement, which agreement was carried out by the mortgagee by canceling the note and mortgage and making further advances, the agreement was not invalid as cutting off the mortgagor's right to redeem; Civ. Code, § 2889, not applying to such a case, but only to original transactions.

2. Mortgages ⟸596, 597—Substitution of deed of trust for mortgage held valid.

Where parties to a mortgage, by an agreement subsequent to and entirely independent of the original transaction, moved by new consideration, substitute a deed of trust for a mortgage, such a new contract is legal and binding upon the parties to the deed of trust as a recognized form of security; and when it contains a power of sale it gives the grantee thereunder a right to collect his debt either by foreclosure or by sale under the power contained, and until he has exercised his option to use the power of sale as a means of securing repayment of the debt the equity of redemption which the mortgagor possesses is not defeated.

3. Mortgages ⟸86(3)—Evidence held not to show duress compelling execution of trust deed.

In action involving validity of trust deed substituted for mortgage in arrears, evidence that mortgagor was financially embarrassed by litigation, that he was in some degree of ill health, that he was much worried, and that the mortgagee knew these facts, and still insisted upon being paid the interest due him, and declared that he would foreclose if he was not paid, held to fall short of proof that the deed of trust was not fairly and voluntarily executed by one capable of contracting.

4. Mortgages ⟸25(2)—Deed of trust need not be supported by full consideration.

Where deed of trust is not executed under circumstances showing it not to have been freely and voluntarily made, the element of fairness in the consideration is unimportant, the most that is required being a valuable consideration.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1070(2)—Absence of finding on issue where evidence supports appellee is not reversible.

There being evidence which would support a finding of consideration for a deed of trust, the absence of such a finding is not reversible error on the mortgagor's appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Fred H. Taft, Judge.

Action by James G. Cortelyou and wife against H. Oscar Vogel and another. From judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

M. M. Meyers and Leslie E. Clawson, both of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Oscar Lawler and James E. Degnan, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

CRAIG, J. The contract, whose construction forms the basis of this litigation, consists of a grant deed, trust instructions, and a declaration of trust. There can be no question but that the parties intended these instruments to be read together as a single contract.

"We, the undersigned, do hereby certify and declare that the foregoing declaration of trust No. 3758 correctly and accurately sets forth and declares the trusts under and upon which said real property is held by the said trustee and do also, hereby agree to and do approve, ratify and confirm the same in all particulars.
"To be signed by:
"James G. Cortelyou,
"H. Oscar Vogel.
"[Signed] Jas. G. Cortelyou, Payor.
"Address, 5970 Hayes Ave.
"[Signed] H. Oscar Vogel, Payee.
"Address, Sierra Madre."

It will not be necessary to set forth the declaration of trust in full, but it is sufficient to say that it contains recitals of an indebtedness "from the payor," Cortelyou, to the "payee," Vogel, and of a trusteeship upon the part of the Title Insurance & Trust Company and the provisions of trust, the manner in which it should be executed, a power of sale under certain conditions and directions for the distribution of the proceeds of sale, and other provisions usually found in trust agreements. Regarding the instruments mentioned as one, they constitute a deed of trust to secure the payment by Cortelyou of $10,450, with interest thereon at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and further advances to Vogel on or before the 24th day of April, 1917. If this instrument had been executed as an original contract no question would be made as to its validity, for deeds of trust have been upheld in California decisions. Sacramento Bank v. Alcorn, 121 Cal. 379, 53 Pac. 813; Kinard v. Kaelin, 22 Cal. App. 383, 134 Pac. 370. But as we understand appellant, he contends that because the deed of trust was substituted for a note and mortgage the deed of trust is inoperative as such, and that it will be considered in equity as a mortgage. Therefore, he claims that Vogel has an equity of redemption.

[1] It is a fact that a note for $10,000 with interest thereon at 8 per cent. per annum, and mortgage to secure the same had been executed dated July 3, 1915, and that on April 4, 1916, Cortelyou was six months in arrears in the payment of the interest; that the mortgage contained the usual provision that upon the default of any installment of interest the mortgagee might declare the whole sum of the principal and interest due and payable, and proceed with foreclosure, and that Vogel had so declared, and had notified Cortelyou that unless payment was made at once foreclosure proceedings would be instituted. The parties then agreed that instead of filing a suit in foreclosure this trust agreement should be executed; that Vogel would cancel the note and mortgage held by him; that the interest then due thereon should be added to the principal in the deed of trust, and that Voggel should be authorized to make further advances to protect the title of the property conveyed, which he did to the amount of over $6,000; that such advances should also be secured by the deed of trust, and that no equity of redemption should be allowed Cortelyou under the deed of trust after sale of the property under its power of sale; and that he might pay the indebtedness at any time up to and including April 24, 1917. This agreement was carried out, and the note and mortgage were canceled by Vogel. Cortelyou and his wife executed a grant deed by which the legal title to the premises was conveyed to the trustee. Cortelyou made out and signed the trust instructions and the trust company executed its declaration of trust in conformity therewith, and entered upon the performance of its trust. It may be especially noted that after April 24, 1917, Cortelyou signed his approval of this declaration in the language quoted above.

[2] Assuming that the parties to this deed of trust were compos mentis and acting freely and voluntarily, no sufficient legal reason is presented, and we know of none which would prevent them from thus contracting with one another. Section 2889 of the Civil Code has no application to such a case, for it only purports to apply to original transactions. This is clear from the language of the section itself, and our Supreme Court in Watson v. Edwards, 105 Cal. 70, 38 Pac. 527, and Garwood v. Wheaton, 128 Cal. 399, 60 Pac. 961, so held. Appellant cites Henlay v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22, and other authorities as holding that—

"The test of whether or not the transaction is a continuing mortgage is, Is there a subsisting continuing debt from the grantor to the grantee?"

But in each of these cases the test thus applied was to determine whether or not the contract in question was a deed or a mortgage. None of them hold that such a test should be applied in determining the question here involved, to wit, whether or not the parties intended, and had the legal right to substitute a deed of trust for a mortgage. Where parties to a mortgage, by an agreement subsequent to and entirely independent of the original transaction, moved by new consideration, substitute a deed of trust for a mortgage, such a new contract is legal and binding upon the parties to the deed of trust as a recognized form of security; when it contains a power of sale it gives the grantee thereunder a right to collect his debt either by foreclosure or by sale under the power contained and until he has exercised his option to use the power of sale as a means of securing repayment of the debt the equity of redemption which the mortgagor possesses is not defeated. Bell Silver & Copper Mining Co. v. First National Bank of Butte, 156 U. S. 470, 15 Sup. Ct. 440, 39 L. Ed. 497.

As we view it, the appellant proceeds upon the erroneous premise that the grant deed executed April 24, 1916, is a contract in itself, and, being absolute upon its face, may be set aside as an attempted disposition of the equity of redemption possessed by Cortelyou under the original mortgage agreement. The deed being only a part of the entire contract made up of the instruments heretofore mentioned, and which, taken together, constitute a deed of trust, it is apparent that the authorities cited by appellant to support his various contentions, except those bearing upon the alleged threats and compulsion claimed to have been used by Vogel against Cortelyou are irrelevant to the issues in this case.

[3] We now proceed to a consideration of the objections to the findings 4 and 6. They are as follows:

Finding 4:

"That it is not true that said litigation caused the plaintiff James G. Cortelyou so much worry and anxiety that he was partially or at all unfitted, during the months of March and April, 1916, to properly carry on his business; that it is not true that said defendant H. Oscar Vogel knew that said plaintiffs were mentally distressed or financially embarrassed by reason of said litigation; that it is not true that said H. Oscar Vogel well, or at all, knew that the financial resources of plaintiffs were being drawn upon to meet and defray the necessary expenses of said litigation."

Finding 6:

"That it is not true that said grant deed mentioned in said complaint, and marked 'Exhibit C,' and made a part thereof, was executed by plaintiffs because of any threats or compulsion on the part of said defendants, or either of them, but, on the contrary, it is true that said deed was executed freely and voluntarily by said plaintiffs, as herein set forth, and not otherwise."

It is claimed that the evidence does not support these findings. Assuming that the plaintiff was financially embarrassed by litigation in the state of Washington; that he was in some degree of ill health, although nothing in the evidence indicates that this was of a serious nature; that he was much worried, and that the defendant knew these facts and still insisted upon being paid the interest due him, and declared that he would foreclose the mortgage if it was not paid, nevertheless these facts fall far short of proof that the deed of trust was not fairly and voluntarily executed by one entirely capable of contracting. Courts must respect the general principles of contract and the strong effort of the law to protect the right to contract from impairment. It may be that the findings complained of contain some redundant matters, but there is no prejudicial error in them. Bradbury v. Davenport, 114 Cal. 593, 46 Pac. 1062, 55 Am. St. Rep. 92, is cited as holding that—

"Whenever the relation of mortgagor and mortgagee is once shown to exist, the court views with distrust and disfavor any arrangements between them, by which it is proposed to transfer the equity of redemption to the mortgagee, and the parties will be held to their original relation, unless the transaction appears to be perfectly fair, and no advantage is taken by the mortgagee of the mortgagor by reason of his incumbrance."

But this and numerous other authorities cited to the same effect deal with the exceptional case of equity's jealousy in preventing the immediate transfer of an equity of redemption, a condition not involved in the case at bar.

[4, 5] Another objection which appellant makes is that the evidence does not support the finding that "there was full value and consideration for the execution and delivery of the grant deed." Having determined that the instrument was a deed of trust, and that it was not executed under such circumstances as to show it not to have been freely and voluntarily made, the element of fairness in the consideration is unimportant. Hall v. Crowley, 12 Cal. App. 30, 106 Pac. 426. The most that could be required would be a finding that a valuable consideration was received by Cortelyou, and the evidence would amply justify such a finding. Under such circumstances its absence is not reversible error. Murphy v. Bennett, 68 Cal. 528, 9 Pac. 738; Krasky v. Wollpert, 134 Cal. 338, 66 Pac. 309.

There is no merit in the contention that the sale under the deed of trust was not valid because it was not assented to by Ella B. Cortelyou, the wife of James G. Cortelyou. This transaction was completed June 21, 1917. At that time a husband had full power of disposition of the community property. Section 172, Civ. Code.

Certain rulings of the trial court excluding evidence are relied upon for a reversal. In the main these rulings are not erroneous, and no error is found which could affect the substantial rights of the parties.

The judgment is affirmed.

SEALE v. BALSDON et al. (Civ. 2276.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 5, 1921.)

1. Subrogation ⟸3(4) — Tenant in common paying charge against property entitled to subrogation.

The liability of cotenants, as between themselves, for the payment of liens against the common estate, is proportionate to their respective interests, and a cotenant relieving the common property from a lien or charge for the joint benefit of the tenants in common is entitled to an equitable lien by subrogation, and to contribution from his respective cotenants of their respective interests in the common property.

2. Statutes ⟸263 — Not given retrospective operation unless legislative intent is clear.

Statutes will not be given a retrospective effect unless the intention of the Legislature that such should be the case is clearly apparent from the context of the act.

3. Waters and water courses ⟸231 — Amendment providing for apportioning assessments of subdivided tracts held not retrospective; "shall have been;" "validated;" "manner."

The amendments of Pol. Code, § 3460, in St. 1915, p. 1286, and St. 1917, p. 1204, providing that when any tract upon which an assessment "shall have been" made shall be subdivided, the assessment thereon shall be reapportioned, do not apply to reclamation district assessments made, under sections 3459, 3462, 3465, before the amendments took effect, for the expression "shall have been" relates to the future perfect tense, something which is to be done and perfected after the date of the enactment of the law in question, and at the time of these amendments section 3466 was also amended by adding the provision that assessments heretofore made in any reclamation district shall be "validated" and collected in the "manner" provided by law at the time such assessments were made; the effect of the word "validated" being to irrevocably fix upon the land a lien for the amount of assessment or assessments theretofore levied, and not upon the several parcels thereof, but upon the land as an entirety and as returned in the assessment lists, and the word "manner" referring to the method of procedure.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Petition by Jessie D. Seale for writ of mandate directed to J. H. Balsdon and others, as trustees of Reclamation District No. 108. From order denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Order affirmed, and petition denied.

John T. Carey, of San Francisco, and Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for appellant.

Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, and Thomas Rutledge, of Colusa, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. The petitioner is now, and since the 28th day of December, 1916, has been, the owner of 439.74 acres of land situate within the exterior boundaries of reclamation district No. 108.

In the month of August, 1913, an assessment known as and mentioned in the pleadings in this case as assessment No. 1 was levied upon a larger tract of land, including the lands above referred to as belonging to the petitioner, then owned by the plaintiff and other persons as tenants in common.

In the month of August, 1914, another assessment, known as and called assessment No. 3, was levied upon the tract of land owned by the plaintiff and certain others as tenants in common. In this last assessment 663 acres was assessed as one parcel, and out of this 663 acres has been carved or partitioned the lands belonging to the petitioner by deeds of conveyance executed by the tenants in common owning the larger tract prior to the execution of said deeds in December, 1916.

Of assessment No. 1 levied upon the lands belonging to tenants in common, of which the plaintiff was one, and including the land now belonging to the plaintiff, 40 per cent. has been paid by tenants in common, other than the petitioner herein.

Prior to the beginning of this action the petitioner calculated the amount of the assessments which she deemed to be her proper proportion of the assessments then delinquent and payable on account of assessments Nos. 1 and 3, and tendered the same to the treasurer of Colusa county. The tender of payment was refused.

On the 4th day of October, 1917, the petitioner, in writing, demanded of the respondents, as trustees of the defendant reclamation district No. 108, that a reapportionment be made of the assessments herein referred to in such a manner as would charge the parcel of land then owned by petitioner, and also the parcels owned by her former cotenants in the larger tract, with a just proportion of the balance due of the said assessments Nos. 1 and 3, so as to charge each parcel with its proportionate share of the assessments previously laid upon the larger tracts. The trustees of the reclamation district declined to make this reapportionment, and were proceeding to enforce payment of the assessments as originally levied, by advertising the 663-acre tract of land for sale in the manner provided by section 3466 of the Political Code, when this petitioner instituted this action praying for a writ of mandate herein, and obtained an injunction restraining further proceedings by the trustees until the termination of this action.

In 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 1286) and in 1917 (Stats. 1917, p. 1204) section 3460 of the Political Code was amended by adding thereto the following:

"When any tract of land upon which an assessment or assessments shall have been made shall be subdivided into smaller parcels, the board of trustees of the district shall reapportion the assessment or assessments upon such tract in such manner as will charge each of said smaller parcels with a just proportion of assessment or assessments previously made upon said tracts so subdivided. Said board of trustees shall file with the clerk of the board of supervisors of the county a list or lists of the charges assessed against each of said parcels. Said reapportionment shall be approved by the board of supervisors in the manner provided in section 3462 of this Code. Said lists after such approval shall be filed with the county treasurer of the county and shall have the same effect as on original assessment."

The only difference between the two amendments lies in the designation of the persons, or body of persons, who should make the reapportionment and report to the board of supervisors.

The Legislature in 1917 (St. 1917, p. 1196) also amended subdivision 17 of section 3454, specifying the duties of trustees of reclamation districts, and, among other things, authorizes them "to reapportion the assessment or assessments upon any tract of land that has been subdivided into smaller parcels in such manner as will charge each of said smaller parcels with a just proportion of assessment or assessments previously made upon said tracts so subdivided, in the manner provided by section 3460 hereof."

At the time these amendments were made, section 3466 of the Political Code was also amended by adding thereto the following provision:

"Assessments heretofore made in any reclamation district shall be validated and collected in the manner provided by law at the time such assessments were made." Stats. 1917, c. 671.

The assessments involved in this action were both made a considerable period of time before the Code amendments just referred to. All the proceedings specified to be taken by sections 3459 and 3465 of the Political Code had been taken as said sections existed at the time of levying, hearing of objections, and validating assessments, and proceedings were being further taken by the trustees to enforce payment as the law existed in relation to said assessments at the time of their levying, validating, and subsequent delinquency.

Do the amendments and additions to the section referred to, made by the Legislature in 1915 and 1917, apply to the assessments levied in 1913 and 1914? If so, the writ of mandate should issue; if not, the petition should be denied.

[1] In the first place, it may be conceded that the law is well settled that the liability of cotenants, as between themselves, for the payment of liens against the common estate, is proportionate to their respective interests, and that a cotenant relieving the common property from a lien or charge for the joint benefit of the tenants in common is entitled to an equitable lien by subrogation, and to contribution from his respective cotenants of their respective interests in the common property. 38 Cyc. 46, and cases there cited.

[2] In Endlich on the Interpretation of Statutes (1st Ed.) § 272, it is set forth as a rule of construction that laws will not be given a retrospective effect unless the intention of the Legislature that such should be the case is clearly apparent from the context of the act.

[3] As heretofore stated, the portion of section 3460 of the Political Code here involved, as amended in 1917, three and four years, respectively, after the levying of the assessments, reads as follows:

"When any tract of land upon which an assessment or assessments shall have been made shall be subdivided into smaller parcels," etc.

The words "shall have been," grammatically construed, relate to the future perfect tense, something which is to be done and perfected after the date of the enactment of the law in question.

In State ex rel. Alden v. City of Newark, etc., 40 N. J. Law (11 Vroom) 92, the words "shall have been" and "shall be" were given interpretation; the court using this language:

"It is claimed that the words 'shall have been,' in the proviso, relate to the past; that their effect is to heal all irregularities in notices named in the act, which have occurred prior to its passage, and that the statute is intended to be retrospective. It is, however, obvious that all the terms used in this act are prospective, and apply only to the future. This is so, without dispute, in that part of the section which precedes the proviso. In the latter part of the sentence, the only words that are alleged to have a retroactive signification are those already quoted—'shall have been.' These words, and the following words 'shall be,' will not, however, relate to acts that were past when the law as enacted. 'Shall have been' is the future perfect tense, which represents an event as completed in future time, and 'shall be' represents what will take place in future time. If the Legislature had intended to make the law retroactive, it would have been easy to express it by the use of the words 'has been' or 'had been,' in the present or past perfect tense, or other equivalent words."

In Dewart v. Purdy, 29 Pa. 113, the Supreme Court, in dealing with this question, holds as follows:

"Nothing short of the most indubitable phraseology is to convince us that the Legislature meant their enactment to have any other than a prospective operation; and when they fix a future day for it to take effect, they stamped its prospective character on its face. Their language in the section before us is, 'that in all cases of partition of real estate in any court wherein a valuation shall have been made of the whole or parts thereof, the same shall be allotted to such one or more of the parties in interest, who shall, at the return of the rule to accept or refuse to take at the valuation, offer in writing the highest price therefor above the valuation returned.' * * *

"This phrase, 'shall have been made,' is an instance of the future perfect tense. It contemplates a valuation perfected, but perfected in future, and the future of this statute was all subsequent to the specified date."

To the same effect is the case of People v. Board of Education, 126 App. Div. 414, 110 N. Y. Supp. 769. In this latter case the court held that the context of the act indicated an intention on the part of the Legislature to give it a retroactive effect, and therefore controlled the interpretation which otherwise would have been given to words which indicated an act to be begun and completed in the future.

As heretofore noted, the amendment made to section 3466, Political Code, specifies that assessments heretofore made in any reclamation district shall be validated and collected in the manner provided by law at the time such assessments were made.

In 1913 and 1914 the law provided for the making of one list against the tract of land involved herein; that this list should be prepared by the commissioners theretofore appointed by the board of supervisors; that when the list was completed it should be filed with the clerk of the board of supervisors, after which event the board of supervisors were to appoint a time when the board would meet for the purpose of hearing objections to the assessment; that after all the proceedings were taken and had as provided by section 3462 of the Political Code no objection to such assessment should be considered by the board of supervisors or allowed in any other action or proceeding, unless made in writing to the board of supervisors, etc., and that, unless an action were begun within 30 days thereafter, no action or defense could be maintained attacking the legality of said assessment in any respect.

As used in section 3466 the word "validation" has a peculiar and forcible meaning. It is to irrevocably fix upon the land a lien for the amount of the assessment, or, in this case, assessments, theretofore levied, and not upon the several parcels thereof, but upon the land as an entirety and as returned in the assessment lists.

In the case of Smith v. Mayor, etc., 113 Ga. 833, 39 S. E. 327–330, the word "validation" has been given the meaning above indicated in reference to an assessment. The language there used is as follows:

"An admission, by the corporation seeking to make the issue, that the notice was regular, or that the requisite number of voters assented to the issue, is good as far as it goes; but, to irrevocably bind the taxpayer—and that is what 'validation' means—chances of mistake of either law or fact must be eliminated, and without the ascertainment and finding that the particular facts necessary to render the issue of bonds legal under the constitutional requirement exist validation should be refused. When the facts appear in such a manner as to evoke a judgment that the requirements of the law have been met, validation follows, under the terms of the act, but general admissions in pleadings do not authorize a judgment of validation."

In the case at bar all the proceedings requisite to validation appear to have been taken and had. Hence we conclude that the lien held by the district for the amount of the assessments theretofore levied had, under the provisions of the section referred to, become irrevocably fixed.

The amendment last referred to also specifies that the assessments shall be collected in the manner provided by law at the time such assessments were made. As here used, the word "manner" has a definite meaning. It refers to the method of procedure. The manner of doing a thing has reference to the way of doing it—to the method of procedure. See Bankers' Life Insurance Company v. Robbins, 59 Neb. 169, 80 N. W. 484–486; 26 Cyc. 516.

The manner of validating and collecting assessments levied prior to the amendments of 1915 and 1917 were to be had as the various sections of the Code existed at the time of the levying of the assessments in question.

In 1913 and 1914 the board of trustees of reclamation district No. 108 had nothing to do with fixing the amount of the assessment charges of any tract of land lying within the exterior boundaries of the district. The fixing of the charges was, in the first instance, to be made by commissioners appointed for that purpose. The commissioners reported to the board of supervisors, and the assessment so reported was validated as the law then stood. The method of procedure, as the section now stands, specifies that the board of trustees of the district shall, upon application therefor, where lands have been subdivided, apportion the assessment upon the different parcels in accordance with the benefits found by the board of trustees to inure to the respective parcels of land from the work done or contemplated, constituting the basis of the assessment. This proceeding would set aside the procedure had in reference to the assessments in question in this action. It reopens and sets aside a lien which otherwise has become irrevocably fixed upon the lands and premises belonging to the cotenants at the time the assessments were made, and affords a second opportunity to contest the same.

Being remedial in character, it is urged that as no time is fixed for the taking effect of the various sections of the Political Code referred to herein, they are operative immediately, and that such proceedings may be invoked at any time. If this is true, it is evident that an owner of a large tract of land lying within a reclamation district might, by the simple process of subdivision, not only indefinitely delay the collection of an assessment but reopen any judgment, or judgments, that might have been entered by any court adjudging the validity of an assessment as provided by section 3462 of the Political Code, and also give an indefinite number of opportunities to go before the board of supervisors and raise objections to an assessment.

Admitting, without deciding, that such is the law as it now stands, no reason is furnished thereby for holding that the Legislature, by the amendments referred to, intended to give the sections amended any retroactive effect; on the contrary, it furnishes a very strong reason why the court should hold that such was not the intention of the Legislature, and that the Legislature voiced its intention that only a prospective effect should be given to the matter herein discussed by the addition made to section 3466 as set forth in this opinion.

From what has been said, the question whether partition or segregation of interests by cotenants constitutes subdivision within the meaning of section 3460 of the Political Code is apparently immaterial, and for that reason, though discussed in the briefs of counsel, is not further considered herein. The result would be the same if we were to admit in this case that partition or segregation of interests by the cotenants owning the land at the time of the assessments amounted to subdivision within the contemplation of the Code.

The order of the trial court in denying appellant's petition for a writ of mandate will be and the same is hereby affirmed, and the petition denied.

CROSS v. THIELE et al. (Civ. 3110.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. March 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 16, 1921.)

1. Landlord and tenant ⊂=233(1)—Failure to find that rent had not been paid held not fatal.

In action for rents, judgment for the landlord was not reversible because there was no finding that the rent had not been paid, where it was stated in the conclusions of law that plaintiff was entitled to judgment in the exact amount alleged in the complaint not to have been paid, this conclusion being inconsistent with the idea payment had been made, and therefore equivalent to a finding that it had not been made, and where, furthermore, the entire evidence and theory of the trial were that payment had not been made.

2. Trial ⊂=395(4)—Finding of fact may be stated as a conclusion.

Where an ultimate fact is to be ascertained, it is none the less a finding of fact because it is stated as a conclusion from other stated facts.

3. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1033(7)—No reversal for failure to make finding adverse to appellant.

Where, if a finding had been made on a certain issue, such finding must have been adverse to appellant, failure to make the finding is not reversible.

4. Partnership ⊂⊃8 — Lease provision for share of profits did not create partnership.

A hotel lease provision requiring the lessee to pay lessor one-third of the net profits derived from the operation of the hotel, in addition to the payment of a fixed rent charge, held not to create a partnership limiting the lessor, on lessee's default, to the remedy of suing in equity for an accounting and preventing him from maintaining an action for the fixed rental.

5. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃208(1)—Where lease is assigned assignor becomes surety.

Where a lease is assigned, the assignor becomes a surety for the assignee under the obligation of the assignee to pay the rent to the lessor.

6. Principal and surety ⊂⊃123(1)—Surety liable without notice of principal's default.

A surety is liable without notice of the default of his principal.

7. Landlord and tenant ⊂⊃208(1)—Assignor of lease liable for rent irrespective of notice of assignee's default.

Liability of the assignor of a lease for payment of the rent thereunder on which his assignee has defaulted is not dependent upon notice to the assignor, as surety, of the assignee's default.

8. Evidence ⊂⊃441(4)—Conversation between landlord and lessor's agent properly stricken as varying terms of lease.

Where hotel lease contained the usual provisions that lessor might re-enter on nonpayment of rent, and the landlord's consent to the assignment by the lessee provided that the assignor should not be released from any of the obligations of the lease prior to January 1, 1919, and, on the assignee's default in payment of rent between May 1 and October 1, 1918, lessor entered on the last-named day, the court in lessor's action against the original lessee for the rent did not commit error under Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, in striking testimony of the lessee's agent that at the time of the execution of the lessor's written consent to the assignment of the lease the lessor told him that he would notify the lessee before taking any action if the assignee defaulted in the payment of rent, and in such case would give the assignor a chance to go in and run the house himself; the testimony being but an attempt to vary the terms of the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Wellborn, Judge.

Action by L. E. Cross against T. B. Thiele, J. S. Thoma, and M. T. Thoma. From judgment for plaintiff, M. T. Thoma appeals. Affirmed.

Francis G. Burke and Earle & McLaughlin, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal by the defendant M. T. Thoma from a judgment against her for the recovery of rents. Appellant leased from respondent, for a term of years, a certain furnished hotel. The lease provided for a monthly payment of a fixed rental and also contained a clause to the effect that the lessee should pay to the lessor as rental, but in addition to the fixed rent charge, one-third of the profits arising from the operation of the property. After she had been in possession of the hotel for a part of the term, appellant assigned the lease to the defendant Thiele. He retained possession until he was in arrears in the payment of the fixed rental for a period of five months, whereupon he surrendered the property to respondent, long before the expiration of the original term, without the knowledge of appellant. This action was commenced to recover the fixed rental due for the five months.

[1-3] The appellant's first contention is that the allegation of the complaint that the rent had not been paid, was denied by the answer, and that there is no finding upon that issue. There is some doubt whether the denial in the answer meets the allegation of the complaint in the respect mentioned, but we pass that question and take up the claim that there was no finding upon the subject. There was no such finding, in terms, but there are several reasons why a reversal of the judgment need not result on that account. In the first place, it was stated in the conclusions of law that respondent was entitled to judgment in the exact amount alleged in the complaint not to have been paid. This conclusion was inconsistent with the idea that payment had been made, and was therefore equivalent to a finding that it had not been made. Where an ultimate fact is to be ascertained, "it is none the less a finding of fact because it is stated as a conclusion from other stated facts." Jones v. Clark, 42 Cal. 180; Harlan v. Lambert, 19 Cal. App. 349, 125 Pac. 1079. As a further reason why a reversal could not result from the failure expressly to find on the issue, it is to be noted from the bill of exceptions upon which the case comes to us that the respondent testified that the amount mentioned in the complaint had not been paid; that it was stipulated at the trial, immediately after the giving of that testimony, that demand was made upon appellant, prior to the bringing of the action "for the rent due and unpaid"; that appellant offered no evidence tending to show payment; and that the entire examination of the nonappealing defendant J. S. Thoma, husband of appellant, the only witness offered by the defendants, was conducted upon the theory that the rent had not been paid, the witness being questioned by the counsel for appellant. Under these circumstances there could have been but one finding on the issue, and the rule is that, upon a failure to find, "the judgment will not be reversed, if the finding omitted must have been adverse to the appellant." People v. Center, 66 Cal. 551, 5 Pac. 263, 6 Pac. 481; Gerth v. Gerth, 7 Cal. App. 735, 95 Pac. 904. In short, there having been no controversy on this question in the trial court, there can be none here.

[4] Because of the provision in the lease requiring appellant to pay to respondent one-third of the net profits derived from the operation of the hotel, in addition to the payment of the fixed rent charge, appellant contends that a partnership was created, and that respondent must have sued her in equity for an accounting, and that therefore he cannot maintain the present action for the fixed rental. It is sufficient to say, upon this head, that the provision did not make appellant and respondent partners. Nofsinger v. Goldman, 122 Cal. 609, 55 Pac. 425.

[5-7] It is insisted by appellant that the complaint in the action was defective because it did not allege that notice had been given to appellant that Thiele had defaulted in the payment of rent, and that, accordingly, the general demurrer to the pleading should have been sustained. This claim is based upon the contention that appellant was but a surety for Thiele with respect to the latter's obligation to pay the rent. It is well settled, certainly, that where a lease is assigned the assignor becomes a surety for the assignee under the obligation of the latter to pay the rent to the lessor (Samuels v. Ottinger, 169 Cal. 209, 146 Pac. 638, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 830); but a surety is liable without notice of the default of his principal (Treweek v. Howard, 105 Cal. 435, 39 Pac. 20; Carpenter v. Furrey, 128 Cal. 665, 61 Pac. 369); and the rule has been applied in a case of suretyship like the one now under consideration (Goergen v. Schmidt, 69 Ill. App. 538; Crowley v. Gormley, 59 App. Div. 256, 69 N. Y. Supp. 576). The complaint is not subject to the criticism advanced by appellant.

[8] The defendant J. S. Thoma acted as the agent of appellant in procuring respondent's consent to the assignment of the lease to Thiele; that consent being necessary under the terms of the instrument. Thoma testified that at the time of the execution of the consent, which was in writing, respondent told him that he would notify Thoma before taking any action if Thiele defaulted in the payment of rent, and that, in case of such default, he would give Thoma a chance to go in and run the house himself. This evidence was stricken out on motion, and appellant claims that the ruling was erroneous. The lease contained the usual provisions that the lessee would quit and surrender the property at the end of the term or at the time of any earlier termination of the lease, and that it should be lawful for the lessor to re-enter and remove all persons from the premises in the event that any rent should become due and be unpaid. These convenants, as is apparent from a reading of them, allowed to respondent very definite ways and means by which to protect himself if at any time the rent were not paid. The lease itself, of course, provided for no notice before respondent resorted to his rights under the provisions mentioned, nor did the assignment, nor did the consent to the assignment. Not only so, but the consent contained a specific provision that appellant should not be released from any of the obligations of the lease prior to January 1, 1919. Thiele's default in the payment of the rent occurred between May 1 and October 1, 1918, and respondent re-entered on the last-named day. It is plain, therefore, that the offer of the conversation between Thoma and respondent was but an attempt to vary the terms of the lease and of the consent, and the ruling of the trial court in granting the motion to strike was proper. Code Civ. Proc. § 1856.

The judgment is affirmed.

In re POLITO'S ESTATE.

POLITO v. McCURDY. (Civ. 3765.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 16, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators ⊂=294—Probate court without power to set off debt due estate against undivided interest of debtor as heir.

The probate court has no power, in distributing an estate, to set off against a debt due the estate by an heir the undivided interest of said heir in the real estate of the estate which is the sole subject of distribution.

2. Courts ⊂=198—Probate court has limited jurisdiction.

While the superior court is a court of general jurisdiction, the powers which it exercises in proceedings in probate are entirely statutory, and in the administration and distribution of estates it exercises a special limited jurisdiction, and in the exercise of such jurisdiction it is not authorized, in the absence of express statutory authority, to determine controversies which do not strictly arise within the course of its probate procedure.

3. Judgment ⊂784—Judgment lien against an heir's share in estate held prior to subsequent judgment secured against him by decedent's estate.

Where the creditor of the heir of an intestate had obtained and duly docketed a judgment against such heir, which had thus become a first lien upon the interest of the heir in the intestate's real estate, such judgment was prior to the lien which the estate acquired upon such interest by its judgment thereafter obtained, for an estate in course of administration has no lien upon the undivided interests of the heirs or devisees in the real property of the estate arising out of the fact that such heir or devisee may be indebted to the estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; George E. Church, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Louis L. Polito, deceased. From a decree of distribution in favor of Sarah A. McCurdy, Rosa Polito, as administratrix, and also as surviving heir, appeals. Affirmed.

Kitt Gould, of Clovis, and C. K. Bonestell, of Fresno, for appellant.

Keyes & Erskine, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution, and is prosecuted by the appellant, Rosa Polito, in her capacity as administratrix of the estate of Louis L. Polito, deceased, and also as a surviving heir of said deceased.

The facts are these: Louis L. Polito was the owner during his lifetime of certain real estate which upon his death without a will descended to his heirs. One John L. Polito was one of these heirs, and was entitled under the law of succession to a one-tenth interest in said real estate. Shortly after the death of said Louis L. Polito Sarah A. McCurdy commenced an action against said John L. Polito to recover an indebtedness due from him to her in the sum of $2,000, evidenced by a promissory note, and in said action attached the said interest of John L. Polito in the estate of his father, and thereafter recovered a judgment therein for the sum of $4,452.45, which judgment was duly docketed on or about January 24, 1919. On July 14, 1919, Rosa Polito, as administratrix of the estate of Louis L. Polito, deceased, commenced an action against John L. Polito upon an indebtedness due by him to his said father, and on September 13, 1919, recovered a judgment against him in said action for the sum of $1,409.25. Thereafter said Rosa Polito, as such administratrix, petitioned the probate court having jurisdiction of said estate for the distribution thereof. It appeared by said petition that all of the residue of the estate consisted of said real estate, and it also appeared therefrom that the said Rosa Polito had succeeded to the interests of all of the other heirs of the estate with the exception of John L. Polito, and she therefore petitioned the court to distribute to her the whole of said estate. Upon the hearing of said petition said respondent Sarah A. McCurdy appeared to assert her claim to have the portion of the estate to which John L. Polito had succeeded distributed to him subject to the lien of her judgment against him. Upon the hearing of said petition and the opposition thereto it appeared that the appraised valuation of the said interest of John L. Polito in said estate was the sum of $1,213.56. The trial court refused to distribute to said Rosa Polito the interest of said John L. Polito in said estate according to the prayer of her petition, but made its decree distributing the same to John L. Polito, and it is from that portion of said decree that the appellant herein, in her capacity as administratrix of said estate, and also as surviving heir of said decedent, has prosecuted this appeal.

[1, 2] It is the contention of the appellant that since John L. Polito was indebted to the estate in an amount exceeding the value of his distributive share therein, it was the duty of the probate court to set off the said indebtedness to the estate against his share in said estate. In making this contention the appellant chiefly relies upon the Estate of Gamble, 166 Cal. 253, 135 Pac. 970. An examination of that case, however, discloses that as to its facts it differs in a number of material respects from the case at bar. The most important of these consists in the fact that in that case there were no intervening rights of a third party involved. Another essential difference lay in the fact that in that case the court undertook to set off a judgment which the administrator had obtained on behalf of the estate against a legacy in favor of the judgment debtor, and it was thus dealing with a condition which might properly be held to come within the provisions of section 440 of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the set-off of cross-demands. In the case at bar, however, we are dealing with the question of the right of the probate court in distributing an estate to set off against a debt due the estate by an heir the undivided interest of said heir in the real estate of said estate which is the sole subject of distribution. We are satisfied that whatever may have been held touching this subject in the decisions of other jurisdictions, the probate court in this state possesses no such power. It would seem to be well settled that, while the superior court is a court of general jurisdiction, the powers which it exercises in proceedings in probate are entirely statutory, and that in the administration and distribution of estates it exercises a special limited jurisdiction, and that in the exercise of such jurisdiction it is not authorized, in the absence of express statutory authority, to determine controversies which do not strictly arise within the course of its probate procedure. Estate of Ryder, 141 Cal. 368, 74 Pac. 993; Estate of Cook, 77 Cal. 232, 17 Pac. 923, 19 Pac. 431, 1 L. R. A. 567, 11 Am. St. Rep. 267; Estate of Smith, 108 Cal. 115, 40 Pac. 1037. The two cases last above cited have by reason of the similarity of their facts a special application to the question presented for decision in the instant case, and in each of them it was decided that the probate court had no power to deduct from the distributive share of an heir of the estate of an undivided interest in personal property a debt which might be due from him to the estate. An even stronger case is presented herein, since the distributive share of John L. Polito consists solely in an undivided interest in real estate.

[3] Aside from these considerations, however, it would seem that the trial court acted correctly in refusing to accede to the petition of appellant herein, since it appears from the record herein that the respondent Sarah A. McCurdy had obtained and duly docketed a judgment against said John L. Polito for the sum of $4,452.45, which had thus become a first lien upon the interest of said John L. Polito in such real estate, and that this lien was prior to the lien which the estate had acquired upon said interest by its judgment thereafter obtained. We are directed to no provision of law and to no decision of the courts of this state which purport to give to an estate in the course of its administration a lien upon the undivided interests of the heirs or devisees in the real property of said estate arising out of the fact that such heir or devisee may be indebted to said estate. It follows that the judgment lien of the respondent herein was entitled to be satisfied out of the interest of said John L. Polito in his father's estate in so far as the value of said interest would suffice to do so, and hence that the probate court in the distribution of said estate was legally bound to distribute the interest of John L. Polito in the real estate thereof to him, subject to the prior claim of the respondent's lien.

Judgment affirmed.

ROBERTS v. INDUSTRIAL ACCIDENT COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (Civ. 3692.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. March 22, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1921.)

1. Master and servant ⟸417(7)—Finding of employment within Compensation Act reviewable.

Since the Industrial Accident Commission has jurisdiction to award compensation to employees only, its finding that applicant was an employee is subject to review to determine whether the jurisdictional facts exist, especially under Const. art. 20, § 21, as amended in 1918, which makes all decisions of the Industrial Accident Commission subject to review by the appellate courts.

2. Master and servant ⟸361—One doing specific job without supervision held not an "employee" within Compensation Act.

A porter employed by one saloon who undertook to do for another saloon keeper a specific job, to be paid for by the job, and in doing which he chose his own method and time for working, is not an "employee" of the latter saloon keeper within the Workmen's Compensation Act, § 8a, as amended by St. 1917, p. 836, even though he might not be an independent contractor, since the definition of a "servant" in Civ. Code, § 2009, which was in force when the Workmen's Compensation Amendment was added to the Constitution, requires a servant to be entirely under the control and direction of the master.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Employee.]

3. Master and servant ⟸362—Repairing plumbing held casual employment, within Compensation Act.

One who volunteered to make repairs in a saloon which proved to be a job for a plumber is in an employment both casual and not in the course of his employer's business, so as to be excepted from the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917 by section 8a thereof.

Proceedings before the Industrial Accident Commission by B. F. Banks to recover compensation for injuries opposed by Tessie V. Roberts, employer. From an order awarding compensation to the employee, the employer brings certiorari. Award annulled.

Alvin Gerlack, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco (Warren H. Pillsbury, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Certiorari to review an award of the Industrial Accident Commission in favor of one B. F. Banks and against Mrs. Tessie V. Roberts. The facts of the case as stated by respondents, and resolving all conflicts in favor of the Commission's findings, are: Banks, a saloon porter, employed in a saloon owned by a third party, frequently dropped into petitioner's saloon for a few moments from time to time to visit and loaf. On one of such occasions, May 25, 1919, it happened that the regular porter in petitioner's saloon had been endeavoring without success to clean out a urinal which had become stopped up. Some discussion ensued, as a result of which Banks intimated that he would be able to clean it out. Banks' testimony on this point is as follows:

"I happened to go in there on this date, and he (Sparman) was on watch. He had relieved his bartender, and he called me and asked me if I would clean out the urinal in the back, and I asked him what was the matter with the porter, and he said—told me Jones wouldn't do it. So I went back and seen what it was and come out and asked him for a hammer to take up a couple of boards that laid over the pipes, and he handed me the hammer, and I seen where it was stopped up at, and I went out and asked him if he had a heavy wire. Q. Did he say how much he would pay you for the job? A. He told me at the bar, when he hired me, he would pay me for it."

Banks worked several hours on the afternoon in question on the job, but did not finish it. In the course of this work, necessarily quite a filthy job, he lacerated his hand; the wound becoming infected and causing the injury for which compensation has been awarded.

Respondents concede that, if Banks were an independent contractor at the time of his injury, the award of the Commission was in excess of its jurisdiction and should be annulled. In support of her contention that Banks was an independent contractor, petitioner points out that he was left to perform the work according to his own methods and plans and that no supervision, direction, or control was exercised over him by the petitioner's agent; that he was not told when to go to work nor when to quit, and that if any payment was to be made to Banks at all it was only for the completed job and not for the time employed. "It has been said that the true test of a contractor is that he renders service in the course of an independent occupation, following his employer's desires in the results but not in the means used." Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, 176 Cal. 448, 168 Pac. 890; Flickenger v. Industrial Accident Commission, 181 Cal. 425, 184 Pac. 851. Section 8a of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act, as amended (Stats. 1917, c. 586), defines the term "employee" as used in the act as including "every person in the service of an employer * * * under any * * * contract of hire * * * but excluding any person whose employment is both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." Section 8b of the same act defines an "independent contractor," for the purposes of the act, as including "any person who renders service other than manual labor, for a specified recompense for a specified result, under the control of his principal as to the result of his work only and not as to the means by which such result is accomplished."

The foregoing definition of an independent contractor was expressly held unconstitutional by the Supreme Court in Flickenger v. Industrial Accident Commission, supra. In the same case the court reaffirmed its holding in Pacific Gas & Electric Co. v. Industrial Accident Commission, 180 Cal. 497, 500, 191 Pac. 788, to the effect that "the terms 'employers,' 'employees,' and 'employment' as used in section 21, article 20, of the Constitution, as amended in October, 1911, must be construed in the light of their meaning at the time of the adoption of the amendment, and cannot be extended by legislative definition."

[1] As the jurisdiction of the Commission runs to employees only, the finding of the Commission that the applicant was an employee is subject to review for the purpose of determining whether the jurisdictional facts exist. Donlon Bros. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 250, 252, 159 Pac. 715; Carstens v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 572, 158 Pac. 218; Roberts v. Police Court, 195 Pac. 1053. This is especially true under the amendment of 1918 to section 21 of article 20 of the Constitution, which provides:

"All decisions of any such tribunal (Industrial Accident Commission) shall be subject to review by the appellate courts of this state."

[2] A review of the evidence on this phase of the case discloses that the applicant was engaged for one particular job under an agreement that he would be paid for the job as a whole when completed and not for the time occupied; that he was left to perform the work according to his own methods and at his own pleasure; that he was not told what to do or how to do it; that at no time was he under the supervision, direction, or control of petitioner.

Respondents insist that one element of the test of an independent contractor is wanting; that is, that the applicant was not engaged "in the course of an independent occupation." At the same time they argue that the job was a "porter's" job and not a plumber's job, and it is admitted that the applicant's occupation was that of a porter. But an essential element of the test of an employee is also lacking and, as has been shown, unless the applicant was an employee, the respondents were without jurisdiction to make the award. The statutory definition of a servant found in section 2009 of the Civil Code (in force when the workmen's compensation amendment was added to the Constitution) is as follows:

"One who is employed to render personal service to his employer, otherwise than in the pursuit of an independent calling, and who in such service remains entirely under the control and direction of the latter, who is called his master."

Under this definition it is essential that the servant be "entirely under the control and direction of" the master. This element is lacking in the present case. Banks was not asked to come and work under the direction of the manager of the saloon; he was not asked to come and help the manager. He was asked if he would go and do the job himself and that was what he agreed to do.

"The test of 'control,' however, means 'complete control.' For example, the citizen who hires a taxicab to take him to a certain place exercises that amount of control over the driver, but he does not thereby become the man's employer. * * * But in weighing the control exercised we must carefully distinguish between authoritative control and mere suggestion as to detail." Western Ind. Co. v. Pillsbury, 172 Cal. 807, 159 Pac. 721.

The record here presents a case where no control was exercised and the right of control was not retained. There is no distinction between this and such cases as Flickenger v. Ind. Acc. Com., supra; Donlon Bros. v. Ind. Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 250, 159 Pac. 715; Fidelity & Deposit Co. v. Brush, supra, and Parsons v. Ind. Acc. Com., 178 Cal. 394, 173 Pac. 585.

[3] Furthermore, the applicant was not an employee within the definition of the act as his employment was "both casual and not in the course of the trade, business, profession or occupation of his employer." Section 8a, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act of 1917, Stats. 1917, p. 835. It was the work of the regular porter to clean the toilet, and in that work he was engaged in the course of his employer's business. But the repair of a broken pipe was a plumber's job not in the course of that business. As the work progressed it developed that the trouble arose from a broken pipe and that the pipe would have to be repaired. If a duly licensed plumber had been called in to make the repair under the same circumstances, it is not disputed that he would have been treated as a contractor and not an employee. The outstanding facts are that the applicant was called on in an emergency to perform a service outside of the course of business of his employer and outside the course of his regular employment as was the case in London, etc., Co. v. Industrial Acc. Com., 173 Cal. 642, 161 Pac. 2.

But it is not necessary for the decision to go upon this ground. Banks was engaged to do a single job and was to be paid on completion only. His employer did not retain the right to control him in the means by which the job was to be done, but was interested only in the result. Under these circumstances, the relation of employer and employee did not exist and the respondents had no jurisdiction to make the award.

The award is annulled.

SNIVELY v. RECORD PUB. CO. et al. (L. A. 5787.)

(Supreme Court of California. April 25, 1921. Rehearing Denied May 23, 1921.)

1. Libel and slander ⊜48(2)—Newspaper privileged as to communications regarding public officers.

Under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, declaring privileged a communication without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for communication innocent, a newspaper stands in "such relation" to the people of its community, with regard to publications therein concerning local public officers, as to afford "a reasonable ground for supposing its motive to be innocent," if the matter published has the other characteristics of a privileged communication; but this rule arises from the fact, not that the publication is made in a newspaper, but that the official conduct of public officers is a matter of public concern of which every citizen may speak in good faith and without malice.

2. Libel and slander ⊜48(2)—Communication concerning a public officer may be privileged, although made to the public only.

A communication concerning a public officer, to be privileged, need not necessarily be made only to those having the power of removal or of appointment, but may be made to the public generally.

3. Libel and slander ⊜48(2)—Privilege as to communication concerning public officer not destroyed because charge is false or charges commission of crime; "libel."

The qualified privilege, under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, protecting communications concerning the acts of a public officer, is not lost merely because the charge complained of is false or because the communication charges the public officer with the commission of a crime, in view of section 45, defining a libel as a "false and unprivileged communication."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Libel.]

4. Libel and slander ⊜5—"Malice" may be inferred from falsity of charge.

The word "malice" in the provisions of the Civil Code upon the subject of libel and slander means actual or express malice, as distinguished from that somewhat fictional form of malice sometimes described as "a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse," or as "the absence of legal excuse"; and actual malice may be inferred from the publication of a defamatory charge that is false in fact and not within the realm of absolute privilege, defined in section 47, subds. 1, 2, and actual malice may also be inferred where the charge is false and is libelous per se, and the defendant publishes it without having probable cause for believing it to be true and such inference is sufficient to defeat the defense of qualified privilege.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Malice.]

5. Libel and slander ⊜5—Malice may be inferred from exaggerated manner of statement.

The manner of statement is material upon the question of malice, and if the facts believed by defendant to be true are exaggerated, overdrawn, or colored to plaintiff's detriment, or are not stated fully and fairly with respect to plaintiff, malice may be inferred from such circumstances alone.

6. Libel and slander ⊜101(4)—Defendant, pleading qualified privilege, has burden of proving absence of actual malice, an essential thereof.

As absence of actual malice is an essential part of the defense of qualified privilege under Civ. Code, § 47, subd. 3, it is necessary, for a defendant pleading such privilege, to prove such absence of actual malice to sustain his defense.

7. Libel and slander ⊜16—Cartoon held equivalent to a charge that plaintiff as chief of police had been guilty of accepting bribes or was ready to do so.

In an action against a newspaper for libel by chief of police a cartoon, depicting the chief as holding with his right hand a halo above his head and extending behind him his left hand, in which is apparently being deposited a sum of money tied to the end of a stick, held clearly a libel as having the natural effect to expose him to contempt, ridicule, and obloquy at the least, and as readily to be understood as charging that plaintiff had been guilty of accepting bribes or was ready to do so.

8. Libel and slander ⊂⊃110(3)—Plaintiff's bad reputation admissible in evidence.

In action by chief of police against a newspaper for a libelous cartoon, defendants had a right to prove that plaintiff's general reputation for efficiency and competency as chief of police was bad, such trait of his character being put in issue by the pleadings, and the cartoon being susceptible of an interpretation to the effect that he was inefficient and incompetent, and his general bad reputation upon any trait of character in issue being a proper subject of proof by defendants in mitigation of damages.

9. Libel and slander ⊂⊃110(3)—Proof of dereliction of duty of special policemen inadmissible in libel action by chief of police against newspaper.

In action by chief of police against newspaper for libelous cartoon, proof by defendants of offenses and dereliction of duty on the part of certain special policemen would not be relevant or competent, unless it was also shown that plaintiff had some knowledge thereof at the time, or that, after being informed thereof, he failed to take the proper action in regard thereto.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by C. E. Snively against the Record Publishing Company and another. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

John H. Perry, of New York City, and Leon R. Yankwich, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. H. Allen, Vincent Morgan, and Porter, Morgan & Parrot, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment. The complaint purports to state a cause of action in damages for a libel published by defendants of and concerning the plaintiff. The alleged libel consisted of a cartoon published in a daily newspaper in Los Angeles, known as the "Los Angeles Record." The Record Publishing Company was the publisher, and Dana Sleeth was the editor of said paper. The complaint averred that the plaintiff was chief of police of Los Angeles at the time of said publication, and that said cartoon was "meant and intended by the said defendants, and each of them, to make the plaintiff appear ridiculous, dishonest, and unfit for public office"; that it was intended by the defendants to mean, and did mean, that the plaintiff, personally and as chief of police was posing and pretending to be honest and upright, whereas he was actually, personally, and as chief of police, dishonest, "and was receiving money secretly and surreptitiously * * * for uplawful purposes and in violation of his oath of office"; and that it was intended to mean and did mean, and was understood by all persons who saw the cartoon and read the language therein to mean, that "the plaintiff was a grafter, to wit, a dishonest public official."

The answer admitted the publication of the cartoon by the defendants, as alleged, and that the plaintiff was then the chief of police aforesaid. It denied that the cartoon was meant or was intended by the defendants to make the plaintiff appear ridiculous or dishonest and unfit for public office, or that it was so understood by those who saw the cartoon and read the language therein. It also denies that defendants intended to or did mean that the plaintiff, as chief of police or personally, was posing or pretending to be honest, whereas he was personally and as chief of police dishonest and unfit to be chief of police, or that he was receiving money secretly or surreptitiously for unlawful purposes and in violation of his oath of office, or that the cartoon was so understood by those who saw and read it.

The answer further alleged as affirmative defenses: First, that the facts represented in said cartoon, so far as they relate to the plaintiff, were and are true in several particulars which it is unnecessary to state in detail, because this defense is not involved in this appeal; and, second, that the facts on which the cartoon was based were matters of public interest, because the plaintiff was then chief of police as aforesaid, that the Los Angeles Record was then a newspaper of general circulation, wherefore it was the right and duty of the defendants, as publishers and editor thereof, to inform the people of facts concerning the official conduct of the plaintiff and to draw inferences from such facts, and that the cartoon concerned the plaintiff solely in his official capacity and was published without malice.

At the time the case came on for trial the complaint contained allegations to the effect that the defendants acted with express malice toward the plaintiff in making the said publication concerning him, and claimed a large sum of money as punitive damages. At the opening of the trial the plaintiff by leave of the court struck out of the complaint the allegations relating to malice and the prayer for punitive damages. The trial was thereafter conducted upon the theory that no express malice was alleged, and that no punitive damages were prayed for.

The main contention of the defendants is that, since the charge of malice was thus wholly withdrawn from the case, and since the cartoon complained of related solely to the plaintiff in his capacity as chief of police, the publication was privileged. A libel is defined in the Civil Code as:

"A false and unprivileged publication by writing, printing, picture, effigy, or other fixed representation to the eye, which exposes any person to hatred, contempt, ridicule, or obloquy, or which causes him to be shunned or avoided, or which has a tendency to injure him in his occupation." Civ. Code, § 45.

Section 47 of the Civil Code defines five classes of publications which are declared to be privileged. The present case, if it is privileged, falls within subdivision 3 of that section. This declares that—

A privileged publication is one made "in a communication, without malice, to a person interested therein, by one who is also interested, or by one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive for the communication innocent, or who is requested by the person interested to give the information." Section 48 declares that in privileged communications coming within this class, "malice is not inferred from the communication or publication."

An important question arising from this definition of privilege as applied to the present case is whether or not the defendants, as publishers of the Los Angeles Record, a newspaper of general circulation in Los Angeles, in making the publication concerning the chief of police of that city, occupied the position of "one who stands in such relation to the person interested as to afford a reasonable ground for supposing the motive of the communication innocent"; the persons "interested" in this case being the citizens of Los Angeles. We will discuss the law on the subject of privileged communications before taking up the question of the meaning and effect of the cartoon in question. It is apparent from these sections of the Code that if the cartoon complained of constituted a privileged communication by the defendants to the citizens of Los Angeles and was published without malice it was not libelous.

[1] It is apparently conceded by both parties that a newspaper stands in such relation to the people of the community in which it is published and circulated that, with regard to publications therein concerning local public officers, it comes within the scope of that part of subdivision 3, requiring "a reasonable ground for supposing the motive of the communication innocent," if the matter published has the other characteristics of a privileged communication. This is the correct rule, but it does not arise from the fact that the publication is made in a newspaper. It is based on the fact that the official conduct of public officers, especially in a government by the people, is a matter of public concern of which every citizen may speak in good faith and without malice. The privilege of the newspaper is in no wise different from that of any citizen of the community. Palmer v. Concord, 48 N. H. 216, 97 Am. Dec. 605. This is not the universal rule, and in some jurisdictions it is not accepted, but we think the prevailing and better opinion is in accordance with what we have just said. Walsh v. Pulitzer P. Co., 250 Mo. 153, 157 S. W. 326, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 985; Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 711, 98 Pac. 281, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 361, 130 Am. St. Rep. 390; Scripps v. Foster, 41 Mich. 745, 3 N. W. 216; Palmer v. Concord, supra; Mott v. Dawson, 46 Iowa, 537; Express P. Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 358; Newell on Slander and Libel (3d Ed.) § 633; Odgers on Slander and Libel, p. 193; Folkard on Slander and Libel, pp. 149, 171; 25 Cyc. 400, 403; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 1041; Schomberg v. Walker, 132 Cal. 229, 64 Pac. 290.

Since the conduct of public officers in the administration of their offices is a matter in which every citizen of the community which they serve is interested, the publication in question, if otherwise privileged, must be considered as one made to persons interested, and on an occasion which would ordinarily afford reasonable grounds for supposing that it was made from innocent motives. The publication, therefore, appears to come within this part of the definition of privilege as given in subdivision 3 aforesaid.

[2] It appears that the chief of police is not an elective officer, but is appointed by the Mayor of Los Angeles, and is not subject to recall, but may be removed by the mayor. There are some decisions which hold that a communication concerning a public officer which is not made to those having the power of removal or of appointment, but is made to the public generally, is not privileged. We are of the opinion, however, that this rule should not be followed. It is the result of ancient decisions made before the effect of popular government became fully appreciated. Every citizen has the right to apply to the mayor in such a case for the removal of an unfit or corrupt officer, and we are of the opinion that communications made in good faith and without malice to the public generally respecting the conduct of such officer, come within the spirit and purpose of the statute regarding privileged communications. They tend to promote knowledge concerning such officers, and give citizens a basis for their petitions to the mayor.

[3] The plaintiff contends that the privilege does not protect one in making a false charge against a public officer, however innocent the motive, and especially that it does not protect one who charges a public officer with the commission of crime.

There are many cases in this state and elsewhere which support this claim. The plaintiff relies on the decisions of this court in Dauphiny v. Buhne, 153 Cal. 759, 96 Pac. 880, 126 Am. St. Rep. 136, and Jarman v. Rea, 137 Cal. 350, 70 Pac. 216.

Jarman v. Rea, supra, was decided in 1902. The court below had instructed the jury that—

"A candidate for office is as much entitled to protection from defamation as any other citizen. Whoever charges him falsely with the commission of a crime, * * * must make good the injury thereby occasioned. He may not avoid this just responsibility by the claim that he acted in good faith without malice."

The opinion in the case states that "where a crime is imputed malice is presumed"; that the presumption is not rebutted by showing that the words were uttered in the belief that they were true, and that "nothing short of alleging and proving their truth will rebut the inference of malice." In support of these statements the court cited and quoted from Sweeney v. Baker, 13 W. Va. 158, 31 Am. Rep. 757, Seeley v. Blair, Wright (Ohio) 358, 686, Root v. King, 7 Cow. (N. Y.) 613, King v. Root, 4 Wend. (N. Y.) 113, 21 Am. Dec. 102, Smith v. Burrus, 106 Mo. 94, 16 S. W. 881, 13 L. R. A. 59, 27 Am. St. Rep. 329, Com. v. Clap, 4 Mass. 163, 3 Am. Dec. 212, and Rearick v. Wilcox, 81 Ill. 77. Each of these cases supports the opinion. The instruction was held to be a correct interpretation of subdivision 3 of section 47 of the Civil Code.

In Dauphiny v. Buhne, supra, the plaintiff was a member of the council of Eureka and a candidate for re-election. The publication complained of in effect charged the plaintiff with soliciting a bribe as a member of such council. The answer alleged that the publication was made without malice and for the promotion of the public interest and welfare. The evidence on the subject was, in effect, that the publication was made without malice, in the belief that it was true and for the information of the public. The trial court instructed the jury substantially in the language of subdivision 3 aforesaid, that if the publication was made as the above evidence indicated it was privileged. This was held to be error, and the opinion states that when a false charge of criminal misconduct is made against an officer, or a candidate for office, the publisher thereof cannot "escape liability on the ground that the charge was made with good intentions and for justifiable ends without malice, and under even an honest belief that the charge is true, and that the occasion of his candidacy called for its publication"; that "there is no privilege of publication under the Code, or general law, which will exempt one from responsibility for falsehood," and that "one can justify the publication of a libel against a candidate for office upon privilege only by proof that the accusation is true."

We are unable to reconcile these decisions with the aforesaid provisions of the Code on the subject. In denying a rehearing from the District Court of Appeal in Adams v. Cameron, 27 Cal. App. 641, 150 Pac. 1005, 151 Pac. 286, we refused approval of the doctrine stated in the above-mentioned cases, which that court had followed. We take this opportunity of stating our reasons for holding those decisions erroneous.

Since a libel is "a false and unprivileged communication" (section 45), it follows that the publication must be both false and unprivileged in order that it shall constitute an actionable libel. The allegation and proof that it is true in the sense intended constitutes one defense. Allegations and proof that it was privileged upon any of the grounds set forth in section 47 also constitute a defense. The defense of privilege under subdivision 3 of section 47 does not depend at all on the truth of the defamatory charge. With respect to that form of qualified privilege the Code does not require that the publication shall be true in order to bring it within the protection of the privilege. The language of the Code clearly implies that the publication may be privileged, although it is untrue. To hold that it is necessary to allege and prove the truth of the charge in order to establish the defense that it was privileged under this subdivision would destroy the distinction between the defense of truth and defense of privilege, and would render the defense of privilege entirely useless, since the proof that it was true would be a complete defense without proof of any other facts, and without proving the absence of actual malice.

Furthermore, the proposition that one is not liable for damage if, without malice, he states something to another which under the circumstances he is lawfully authorized to tell him, necessarily implies that the statement made may not be accurate; that is to say, that it may be untrue, but that under such circumstances the plaintiff cannot recover damages. This is the established law in many cases of privilege, and no question is ever made about it. For example, if one is about to employ a servant and inquires of a former employer about his character, the former employer is excused for any information he may give in answer to such inquiry, providing he makes the statement in good faith, believing it to be true, and without malice, although the statements may in fact be untrue. This is true in almost any relation where one person is under a duty to give information to another, and does so in good faith and without malice. The failure to give accurate statements does not of itself render him liable for damages in an action for libel or slander. Almost all the cases holding that the statement must be true are cases involving public actions in newspapers regarding public officers or candidates for public office. There is no just ground for any distinction between that class of cases and those above mentioned. The Code places them all under the same rule.

While there are many decisions in other states which support the rule laid down in Dauphiny v. Buhne and Jarman v. Rea, there are others holding the contrary. In Coleman v. MacLennan, 78 Kan. 729, 98 Pac. 281, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 361, 130 Am. St. Rep. 390, the court said:

"We think a person may in good faith publish whatever he may honestly believe to be true and essential to the protection of his own interests, or the interests of the person or persons to whom he makes the publication, without committing any public offense, although what he publishes may in fact not be true, and may be injurious to the character of others."

In Palmer v. Concord, supra, the court says that one who makes a publication in a newspaper upon a privileged occasion "is not guilty of libel if the facts alleged were true, or if he had probable cause to believe, and did believe, that they were true." In Mott v. Dawson, supra, the words were spoken on a privileged occasion, and the court said that if they were spoken without malice, believing them to be true, and having reasonable cause so to believe, the defendant was not liable. This implies that they may have been false. In Express P. Co. v. Copeland, 64 Tex. 358, the court said respecting privileged publications, that they "must be confined to the truth, or what in good faith and upon probable cause is believed to be true" and that if the statements were false the defendant could only defeat the action by showing that they were made in good faith in the belief of their truth, and upon just and reasonable grounds for that belief. There are many other cases of similar import, and we need not multiply citations on the point. These decisions cannot be reconciled with the theory that it is always necessary to prove the truth of a publication in order to bring it within the defense that it was privileged. We are satisfied that Dauphiny v. Buhne and Jarman v. Rea went too far in declaring that a privileged communication must be true in order to make it privileged, and that they should be overruled so far as they so declare.

With regard to this form of qualified privilege, no logical distinction can be made between a false charge of crime and a false charge of any other fact of a defamatory character. The occasion and the relations between the one making the charge and those to whom it is made being such that the communication would be privileged, the right of the publisher to speak or write is complete and unqualified, under the Code, except that he must speak or write "without malice." When under these conditions he honestly believes that the person of whom he speaks or writes is guilty of a crime of a nature that makes the fact material to the interests of those whom he addresses, it is as much his right and duty to declare to them that fact as it would be to tell them any other fact pertinent to the occasion and material to their interests. If the publisher of a newspaper honestly believes that a public officer has committed crime of a nature which would indicate that he is unfit for the office he holds, we think he is not liable for damages under the Code in a civil action for libel when, without malice, and so believing, he publishes a statement to that effect to the community served by the officer.

[4] The word "malice" in the provisions of the Civil Code upon the subject of libel and slander means actual or express malice, as distinguished from that somewhat fictional form of malice sometimes described as "a wrongful act done intentionally without just cause or excuse," or as "the absence of legal excuse." This was decided upon a very elaborate discussion of the subject in Davis v. Hearst, 160 Cal. 155–168, 116 Pac. 530. The court there held that—

"A full recovery in compensatory damages may be had under our civil law of libel without the pleading of malice, without the proof of malice, and without the existence of malice."

The court was careful to say that it was here speaking of express malice or actual malice, and not of the fictional malice referred to, which, in some jurisdictions, but not in this state, is held to be a necessary ingredient of libel. With regard to actual or express malice, it was decided that it was material only where the plaintiff alleged it in the complaint as the foundation of a claim for punitive damages, or where the defendant in his answer alleged the absence of such malice as one of the necessary conditions of the defense that it was a privileged communication under one or more of the three varieties of qualified privilege described in subdivisions 3, 4, or 5 of section 47 of the Civil Code. Actual malice was there defined as:

"A state of mind arising from hatred or ill will, evidencing a willingness to vex, annoy, or injure another person," and * * * "the motive and willingness to vex, harass, annoy, or injure."

It was said that—

Such actual malice could be established either by direct proof of the state of mind of the person, or by indirect evidence so satisfying to the jury that they may from it infer and find the existence of this malice in fact; that the evidence "may be direct * * * going to declarations, acts, and conduct of the defendant, showing personal ill will toward the plaintiff, but it will more usually be indirect or inferred, * * * and to this end of proving malice inferentially all legitimate evidence is admissible bearing upon the general course of conduct of the defendant toward the plaintiff, the internal evidence furnished by the character of the libel, and any other specific facts and circumstances not in direct proof of the malice, but from which the existence may be logically inferred, herein including the circumstance, if it be found to exist, of wanton recklessness and heedlessness of plaintiff's rights."

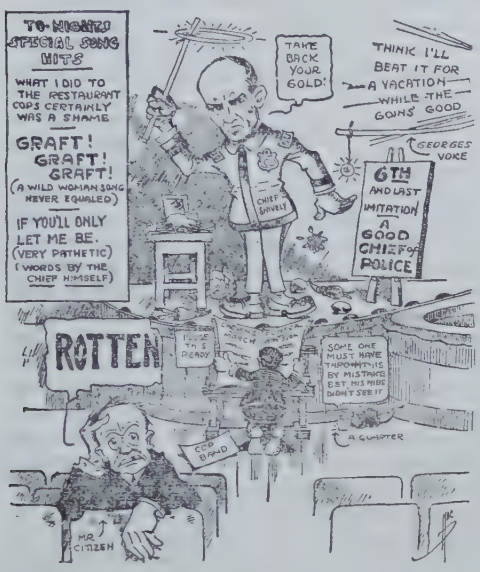
It is further said that actual malice may be inferred from the publication of a defamatory charge that is false in fact and not within the realm of absolute privilege defined in subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 47. Actual malice may be inferred by the court or jury where the charge is false and is libelous per se and the defendant publishes it without having probable cause for believing it to be true, and such inference is sufficient to defeat the defense of qualified privilege. Smedley v. Soule, 125 Mich. 192, 84 N. W. 63; Quinn v. Scott, 22 Minn. 456; Carpenter v. Bailey, 53 N. H. 590.

[5] On the subject of actual malice it is important to note further that, while one may, on a privileged occasion and without malice, publish to the interested persons what may be false, if he honestly believes it to be true, he is not by this rule given a license to overdraw, exaggerate, or to color the facts in his communication. The manner of statement is material upon the question of malice, and if the facts believed to be true are exaggerated, overdrawn, or colored to the detriment of plaintiff, or are not stated fully and fairly with respect to the plaintiff, the court or jury may properly consider these circumstances as evidence tending to prove actual malice, and they may be sufficient for that purpose without other evidence on the subject.

[6] Upon the trial there appeared to be some confusion concerning the issues involved, and in view of the necessity for a new trial it is proper to state our understanding on the subject. The plaintiff, as we have said, struck out of his complaint the allegations that the publication was made with actual malice, and the prayer for punitive damages. So far as the plaintiff's case was concerned, this eliminated the issue of malice, and he could recover without introducing any evidence on that subject. But by averring in their answer that the publication was on a privileged occasion and was made without malice, the defendants directly put in issue the question of actual malice. As absence of actual malice was an essential part of that defense, it was necessary for the defendants to prove such absence in order to sustain this defense. The withdrawal by the plaintiff of his claim for punitive damages and the striking out of the averments of actual malice from the complaint did not establish the fact that defendants published the cartoon without actual malice, nor excuse them from the necessity of proving absence of such malice, if they desired to establish that defense. Neither party appears to have understood this; the plaintiff's attorney announced that plaintiff "waived all malice", and the court said to the jury at the beginning of the trial that "malice has nothing to do with the case." The defendants introduced no evidence to show the absence of actual malice on their part in publishing the cartoon. The effect of the proceedings and remarks during the trial was equivalent to an admission that the publication was made without malice. If it had not been for this admission and the instructions of the court about to be stated, the jury would have been at liberty to have inferred actual malice from the cartoon itself.



[7] The court instructed the jury to the effect that it was for it to determine the meaning and effect of the cartoon, and that if it was reasonably susceptible of conveying to the ordinary person the meaning that the plaintiff was officially dishonest, or that he was guilty of accepting a bribe, or was ready to accept a bribe, then the publication was not privileged, and the plaintiff was entitled to recover compensatory damages. The answer did not attempt to state as a defense that the cartoon was true if it was susceptible of the meaning just stated, and no evidence was given to that effect. The court in giving these instructions took cognizance of the admission of the plaintiff that the publication was without malice, but assumed, on the authority of Dauphiny v. Buhne, supra, and Jarman v. Rea, supra, that there could be no privilege unless the charge made by the cartoon in the sense above stated was true, and that it was incumbent upon the defendants to prove such truth. Our conclusion in regard to this point demonstrates that the court erred in this instruction, and for this reason it is necessary to reverse the judgment.

The court further instructed the jury in effect that it could not consider the publication as privileged, and that it had nothing to do with that defense. This was evidently also based on the authority of the two cases last cited, and it was erroneous for the reasons above given.

The defendants earnestly insist that the cartoon is not susceptible of the meaning contended for by the plaintiff, and suggested by the court in the instructions above referred to, and claim that it did not refer to the plaintiff personally or officially except to suggest that he was incompetent and inefficient, and that so far as it suggested dishonesty or crime, it referred exclusively to a number of special policemen appointed by the plaintiff and detailed to attend upon certain places in the city during the nighttime, and that it was so understood by those who saw and read it. Upon this theory, the answer set up in justification that these special policemen were guilty of dishonesty and bribery, but it did not aver that the plaintiff participated therein or had any guilty knowledge thereof. Since we must order a new trial, it is proper to consider these claims and other objections to rulings made upon the trial.

The cartoon was as follows:

On its face this picture is clearly a libel upon the plaintiff as chief of police. Its natural effect would be to expose him to contempt, ridicule, and obloquy at the least. It is also obvious that it might readily be understood by any person who saw it as the equivalent of a charge that plaintiff had been guilty of accepting bribes or was ready to do so. We do not perceive how it could be otherwise understood by any person who had no knowledge of the alleged offenses of the special policemen mentioned in the answer, and we think that even a person who had some knowledge thereof would understand the cartoon to suggest that the plaintiff was a participant in or had a guilty knowledge of those offenses. It is unnecessary to dilate upon this point. A look at the cartoon is sufficient.

[8] The defendants had a right to prove that the plaintiff's general reputation for efficiency and competency as chief of police was bad. That trait of his character was put in issue by the pleadings, and the cartoon was susceptible of an interpretation to the effect that he was inefficient and incompetent. His general bad reputation upon any trait of character in issue was a proper subject of proof by the defendants in mitigation of damages. Newell on Slander and Libel, 3d Ed., p. 1068; Hearne v. DeYoung, 132 Cal. 362, 64 Pac. 576. We are not certain from the transcript whether this kind of evidence was excluded absolutely by the court below, or whether it was excluded because of the fact that it was not understood that it was offered in mitigation of damages.

[9] Proof by the defendants of offenses and dereliction of duty on the part of the special policeman aforesaid would not be relevant or competent unless it was also shown that the plaintiff had some knowledge thereof at the time, or that, after being informed thereof, he failed to take the proper action in regard thereto. The court did not err in rejecting such evidence where it was admitted by counsel that they had no intention of following it up by proof connecting the plaintiff therewith.

As it may be necessary prior to a new trial for both plaintiff and defendants to amend their pleadings, it is unnecessary to consider here the objections made to the refusal of the court to allow the defendants to file a fourth amended answer.

A number of other rulings are objected to and presented in the briefs, but we do not find them of sufficient importance to justify a discussion thereof.

The judgment is reversed.

SAN FRANCISCO BAR ASS'N v. SULLIVAN. (Cr. 2347.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 5, 1921.)

1. Attorney and client ⊂=52—Accused called upon to meet only specific charges in proceeding for disbarment.

In a proceeding in the Supreme Court to disbar an attorney under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, the accused is called upon to meet only the specific charges made against him by the accusation, and the court is confined to the specific charges.

2. Attorney and client ⊂=49—Proceeding to disbar not criminal prosecution.

A disbarment proceeding is not a prosecution for crime.

3. Attorney and client ⊂=53(2)—Guilt must be clearly established in disbarment proceeding.

In disbarment proceedings, while it may not be necessary as in strictly criminal prosecutions that guilt be established beyond all reasonable doubt, a finding of guilt should be made only upon such proof as clearly and satisfactorily establishes guilt in the minds of the judges, and in such a proceeding all intendments should be in favor of innocence, and where two or more equally reasonable inferences may be drawn from a fact shown, that inference leading to a conclusion of innocence should be accepted rather than one leading to a conclusion of guilt, especially where the charge is accepting a bribe, a charge constituting a felony involving the grossest of moral turpitude and subjecting offender to imprisonment in state prison and disqualifying him from holding any office in the state, under Pen. Code, § 98, and Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5.

4. Attorney and client ⊜53(2)—Evidence insufficient to show acceptance of bribe by a police judge in disbarment proceeding.

In a proceeding to disbar a police judge as an attorney and counselor for conduct involving moral turpitude consisting of accepting bribes, under Code Civ. Proc. § 287, subd. 5, evidence held insufficient to satisfy the court of the truth of the charges against accused.

Sloane and Lawlor, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

In the matter of the accusation of the San Francisco Bar Association for disbarment of John J. Sullivan, an attorney and counselor. Proceeding dismissed.

Max J. Kuhl, M. C. Sloss, John O'Gara, and Jos. J. Webb, all of San Francisco, for plaintiff.

Walter H. Linforth, Bert Schlesinger, and Lewis F. Byington, all of San Francisco, for defendant.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a proceeding instituted in this court for the disbarment of John J. Sullivan, an attorney and counselor, for conduct involving moral turpitude. Defendant was at all the times mentioned in the accusation one of the police judges of the city and county of San Francisco, and all the charges against him are for acts and conduct on his part with relation to matters coming before him as such police judge; our law providing that an attorney and counselor may be removed "for the commission of any act involving moral turpitude, dishonesty or corruption, whether the same be committed in the course of his relations as an attorney or counselor at law, or otherwise." Subdivision 5, § 287, Code Civ. Proc. Three separate, specific charges against the accused are made by the accusation. Each charge involves the most serious accusation that can be made against a judicial officer, viz. that of agreeing to receive and receiving money upon the corrupt understanding and agreement that his official conduct shall be thereby influenced. All of the charges were denied by the accused by verified answer filed herein. This court retained jurisdiction of the matter instead of transferring it to a District Court of Appeal, because of the seriousness of the charges and the official station of the accused. By order of the court, the evidence in support of and against the charges was taken by the Chief Justice, and the transcript of the evidence so taken has received the careful consideration of each member of the court.

[1-3] No serious question of law is presented. It is conceded, of course, that by this accusation the accused was called upon to meet only the specific charges made against him therein, and that we are confined to those specific charges, viz. agreeing to receive and receiving money upon the corrupt understanding alleged, in the matters and proceedings specified in the accusation. No other misconduct is alleged in the accusation or included in the charges filed. On the other hand, it is clear that, if it is satisfactorily shown that with regard to any of the proceedings specified in the accusation the accused either agreed to receive or received any money upon any such corrupt understanding as is alleged, the accusation should be held to be sustained and the accused disbarred. Some question is raised as to the degree of proof essential to warrant a conviction; i. e., whether the rule applicable in criminal prosecutions that guilt must be shown beyond all reasonable doubt obtains in such a proceeding as this. So far as appears, this precise question has never been determined by this court. A disbarment proceeding is not a prosecution for crime. In some states, however, it has been held that the charges must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt to warrant disbarment. In discussing a question of the sufficiency of an accusation this court has said:

"This accusation is in the nature of a criminal charge, and all intendments are in favor of the accused. The accusation is not sufficient if, all its statements being true, the accused could be innocent." Matter of Haymond, 121 Cal. 385, 388, 53 Pac. 899, 900.

And again:

"A judgment against the respondent will deprive him of personal and property rights. Unless we are clearly satisfied of respondent's guilt, we ought not to remove or suspend him from the practice of his profession. As we are not so satisfied, we decline to strike his name from the roll." Disbarment of Houghton, 67 Cal. 511, 517, 8 Pac. 52, 57.

This, of course, means that something more than the mere preponderance of proof that will suffice in the ordinary civil cause is essential. While we may concede that it may not be necessary, as in strictly criminal prosecutions, that guilt be established beyond all reasonable doubt, we are satisfied that a finding of guilt should be made only upon such proof as clearly and satisfactorily establishes guilt in the minds of the judges. It seems, furthermore, clear that in such a proceeding all intendments should be in favor of innocence, and that, where two or more equally reasonable inferences may be drawn from a fact shown, that inference leading to a conclusion of innocence should be accepted rather than one leading to a conclusion of guilt. In re Application of Alameda County Bar Association, 35 Cal. App. 534, 536, 170 Pac. 432. Especially does this seem true where the charge is of acts constituting a felony involving the grossest of moral turpitude, and a conviction of which in a strictly criminal prosecution not only subjects the offender to imprisonment in the state prison, but also forever disqualifies him from holding any office in this state. Section 98, Pen. Code.

The specific charges contained in the accusation are as follows:

First. That in two felony matters pending before him as a committing magistrate, each against one Bernardino Catterini, charged with assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder, the accused, on or about January 12, 1918, did agree to receive and did receive $150 in money, "as a bribe, from one Peter P. McDonough, upon the corrupt understanding and agreement" between him and said McDonough that he, as such police judge, should thereby be corruptly and unlawfully influenced in his decision of said two cases, and that he was thereby corruptly and unlawfully influenced and dismissed said cases corruptly and unlawfully. This matter will hereinafter be referred to as the Catterini matter.

Second. That on or about September 23, 1918, while one Tony Spinelli was in custody on a charge of assault with intent to commit murder, the accused agreed to receive and did receive $50 in money from one C. Vincent Riccardi upon the corrupt understanding and agreement between himself and Riccardi that his action and decision in the matter of the approval of a certain bail bond for $5,000 signed by Angelo Cosenza and Malina Cosenza then presented should thereby be corruptly influenced, and that he should in return for said money approve said bond and order the release of Spinelli from custody, and that he was thereby corruptly influenced to do so, and did approve said bond and make said order for release. This matter will be hereafter referred to as the Spinelli matter.

Third. That in a misdemeanor prosecution against one Pastiango, who was charged with violating the provisions of an ordinance prohibiting lewd and lascivious acts, the accused, on or about November 28, 1919, agreed to receive and did receive $40 money as a bribe from said Riccardi, upon the corrupt and unlawful agreement between them that in return for said money he would discharge said Pastiango from custody upon his own recognizance immediately after finding him guilty and sentencing him to 90 days' imprisonment in the county jail, all of which he did. This matter will be hereinafter referred to as the Pastiango matter.

At the outset it should be stated that as to all the charges the only direct evidence of guilt of the accused is that of one C. Vincent Riccardi, who was at all the times referred to in this proceeding a duly admitted attorney and counselor at law. Probably no witness has ever appeared before a judicial tribunal who was shown to be less worthy of credit in the absence of substantial corroboration than this witness. According to his own testimony, he was for many months a voluntary and active participant, for his own private and personal financial gain, in a system of disposing of matters in the police courts of San Francisco by the bribery of judges thereof, and he was the instigator and prime mover in the particular corruption charged against the accused in this proceeding. That his reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in the community in which he lived is bad is established by many reputable witnesses, and not denied. Moreover, a motive for the giving by him of sensational evidence relating to conditions in the police courts is most clearly apparent. Early in the year 1920 he was convicted of felony embezzlement in the superior court of San Francisco, and on such conviction adjudged to suffer imprisonment in the state prison. His activities in the matter of disclosures relative to police court conditions immediately followed such conviction. His imprisonment on such conviction was postponed by an appeal, and he has been at large on bail. At the time he testified before this court the judgment had not become final. It had been affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, but the matter was still pending on application for hearing in this court. In all his activities in the matter of disclosures he has known that in the event of the affirmance of the judgment against him his only chance of escape from imprisonment was the granting of executive clemency. His own testimony on this matter showed very clearly that he fully realized that by giving the character of sensational evidence relative to corruption in the police courts that he was giving before the grand jury, the bar association committee, and in this proceeding he might create the feeling that he was rendering so great and impressive a public service as to make a pardon in his own matter a proper recognition and reward. That he had such a hope he freely admitted, as well as that, by reason of his disclosures, he had already received some assurances of friendly interest. Of course, these were given him in view of a belief on the part of those giving them that he was telling only the truth. But it is obvious that he fully realized that no movement for executive clemency in his own behalf could be inspired by a story on his part that was devoid of sensational exposure of official corruption. Hence we find here the strongest kind of a motive for false accusation against the police judges. We think it is self-evident that no statement of this witness can be accepted as true simply because he testifies to its truth. It may or may not be true, but, uncorroborated, it cannot produce conviction in an unprejudiced mind.

With these observations we proceed to discuss the evidence relative to the various charges, taking up first the Pastiango matter.

Pastiango was first charged with a felony in having violated section 288 of the Penal Code. The matter was pending before accused as a committing magistrate, and Riccardi was acting as his attorney. The matter was heard on November 13, 1919, Mr. Maundrell, assistant district attorney, appearing for the people, and Riccardi for the defendant. But one witness was presented by the prosecution, the girl upon whose body the alleged acts were charged to have been committed. According to her testimony, she was 3 months and 2 days short of being 14 years of age at the time of the commission of the alleged crime. Her testimony being concluded, further hearing was continued until November 17, 1919. On that day when the matter came on for further hearing, Mr. Maundrell said:

"From the testimony of the complaining witness in this case the prosecution fails as far as section 288 of the Penal Code is concerned. And at this time I will recommend that the defendant be arrested under Ordinance 1059," an ordinance prohibiting any lewd, indecent, or obscene act or conduct, and making a violation of its terms a misdemeanor.

The accused then announced that the felony charge would be dismissed, and continued the matter for dismissal to the next day, presumably to give time for the institution of the misdemeanor prosecution. On the next day the dismissal was made by the accused. A prosecution under the ordinance was instituted, and it was in relation to the disposition of this prosecution that the bribe was alleged to have been agreed to be given and accepted. The only direct evidence as to this is that of Riccardi. He is rather vague and indefinite as to the time when the agreement was made, except that he said several times it was before "the dismissal," by which he must mean the dismissal of the felony charge, for this was the only "dismissal" in that matter. In fact, Riccardi testified on direct examination here that the agreement between him and the accused included the dismissal of the felony charge, but subsequent testimony on cross-examination would indicate that his alleged talk with the accused about the matter was during the pendency of the misdemeanor prosecution. This dismissal, we have seen, was recommended by the prosecuting officer for failure of evidence to establish the crime alleged under section 288, Penal Code. Substantially the alleged agreement was that in return for $40 to be paid to the accused judge Pastiango was to be given what was called "a suspended sentence," meaning that, although he was to be found guilty and sentenced, execution of that sentence was to be suspended. The misdemeanor case was subsequently submitted to the accused judge upon evidence conceded to be the same as that given upon the felony charge, a transcript of which is in evidence here. The accused found the defendant guilty, sentenced him to 90 days' imprisonment in the county jail, and suspended execution of sentence. Riccardi says that while the case was pending he agreed to give the accused $40 in this matter in payment for such action on his part, and that on the day the matter was disposed of he gave him the money. The accused denies absolutely any arrangement whatever with Riccardi in the matter, and denies that he was paid any money by Riccardi.

The only pretense of corroboration of Riccardi's evidence which is here claimed is the action of the accused in the Pastiango case in view of the evidence given therein, and his statements on cross-examination here as to his reasons for suspending execution of the judgment. Of course, it is not claimed that mistakes in acts and decisions of a judge that may reasonably be attributed simply to bad judgment or even gross carelessness in the discharge of official duty constitute evidence of bribery of the judge. And yet, at best, we have no more here in regard to the disposition of the Pastiango matters. The dismissal of the felony charge was asked by the prosecuting attorney, as to whom there is no insinuation of misconduct. There was room for an honest difference of opinion as to whether the special offense defined by section 288, Penal Code, was sufficiently shown by the only evidence produced, presumably the only evidence obtainable, to warrant holding the defendant for trial thereon in the superior court, and the situation was such that not even a suspicion of corrupt influence arises from the mere act of the accused in acceding to the request of the prosecuting attorney.

As to the suspension of execution of the judgment in the misdemeanor matter, the law of this state authorizes such action, and we know that it is a course very frequently, perhaps too frequently, followed. Whether or not in any particular case the circumstances are such as to warrant such a disposition is peculiarly one for the trial judge. Personally we should feel that, if Pastiango was guilty of soliciting this girl by word or act to engage in lewd, indecent, or obscene conduct with him, the case was not one for suspension of execution of the judgment. But we cannot say from the evidence before us that the accused did not in good faith consider it a proper case for such action. Some of his reasons for his action in this case given in justification when being pressed by able counsel on cross-examination in this court certainly do not appeal to us as being good reasons. It is, however, only fair to the accused to say that among his reasons given for suspending execution of the judgment was that in view of the testimony of the girl, and the manner of her testifying and the circumstances of the case generally, he was not satisfied of the guilt of the defendant, and further that neither the prosecuting officer nor the arresting officer objected to the course followed. We cannot find in either his conduct in the case or in his testimony any corroboration of Riccardi's evidence with relation to a bribe. As we look at the matter, in so far as agreeing to accept or accepting a bribe is concerned, it is simply Riccardi's word against that of the accused, with the result that we are not satisfied of the guilt of accused of the offense charged.

As to the Spinelli matter: Spinelli had been arrested on a charge of assualt with intent to commit murder. The matter had been assigned to Police Judge Brady's department, and application was made by Riccardi to the accused at his residence during the evening of September 23, 1918, to approve a $5,000 bond offered for the release of Spinelli. Riccardi testified that during the day he had arranged with accused to meet him at his home that evening, both to fix the bail at $5,000 and to approve the bond offered, and that he was to pay him $50 for so doing. The accused testified that he had heard nothing about the case until Riccardi with others called at his house that evening and requested approval of the bond. He further testified that according to his recollection Judge Brady had fixed the bail at $5,000. There is no evidence other than Riccardi's as to the fixing of the bail by accused, or as to any previous arrangement with accused for the approval of the bond. It is a common occurrence for police judges to approve bail bonds out of office hours at their homes. Riccardi, who had the bond prepared at his office, even to the signatures of the sureties, went with the sureties to the home of the accused and proffered the bond to the accused with a request for its approval. It was approved by accused, who affixed his signature either then or the next day to the jurat on the affidavit of each surety, and also to the certificate of acknowledgment and approval, signed an order for release, which he gave to Riccardi, and retained the bond. Riccardi testified that in pursuance of his agreement he then gave the accused $50, and the accused testified that there was no arrangement for any payment and that no money was paid. As to this it is simply Riccardi's word against that of the accused. The only alleged corroboration of Riccardi's testimony is in the circumstances attendant on the approval of the bond. Riccardi testified that the accused did not examine or swear the sureties, and one of the sureties, Angelo Cosenza, whose knowledge of the English language was so defective that he was compelled to testify through an interpreter, testified that the accused said nothing to him and talked only to Riccardi. The accused testified that he must have sworn the sureties, as this was his universal custom. We are not prepared to hold that he did not purport to do this in the informal way that unfortunately is adopted very often by careless officials, so informal in fact in some cases as to fail to bring to the knowledge of the witness the fact that an oath is being administered. It is admitted by the accused, however, that he did not examine the sureties as to their sufficiency, confining his questioning to Riccardi and relying wholly upon Riccardi's assurances as to their sufficiency and qualification. He apparently believed that he was fully justified in so doing. In thus doing he was guilty, of course, of gross neglect of duty. Nor could he have carefully examined the bond, for a reading of the affidavits of the sureties, who were husband and wife, disclosed that the property described in the affidavit of each as "his property" that "stands of record in his name," and stated to be of the value of $9,000, was the same identical property, a lot in San Jose. Cosenza testified here that this property was worth only $2,000, and an examination by the accused of the sureties would doubtless have disclosed that fact. But this is not a proceeding against accused based upon a charge of neglect of official duty. The question is whether, in view of Riccardi's testimony, it sufficiently warrants an inference of the alleged bribery. We are perfectly satisfied that it does not. It may much more reasonably be attributed to a careless method of transacting official business, in acting solely upon the assurance of another in lieu of the personal investigation that a proper conception of official duty and responsibility requires. To our minds it affords no evidence whatever of the specific charge of bribery, with the result that as to the bribery charge we have nothing but Riccardi's word, and are not satisfied of the guilt of the accused thereof.

As to the Catterini matter: The charge here is that accused agreed to receive and did receive $150 from one Peter P. McDonough, upon the corrupt agreement between them (McDonough and accused) that his conduct in such matter should be influenced thereby. Riccardi was the attorney for Catterini. His dealings in the matter of the alleged corrupt arrangement were with McDonough alone, his testimony being to the effect that, there being $1,500 obtainable from Catterini, he arranged with McDonough that the latter should have the bail fixed at $1,000 cash, and the case subsequently dismissed, and that the $1,500 should be divided, $500 to McDonough, $500 to the accused, and $500 for himself. McDonough testified that there was no arrangement relative to the case between himself and Riccardi, except that in the course of his business as a bail bond broker he at the request of Riccardi, and for the usual commission of 10 per cent., furnished the bail money. He further testified that he never spoke to the accused about the case and never paid him any money on account thereof. The accused testified that McDonough never spoke to or communicated with him about the case and never paid him any money on account thereof. According to his own testimony, Riccardi's only talk with the accused about the matter was some time after the dismissal, when he asked him how much McDonough gave him in the Catterini matter, and the accused, on being told by Riccardi that he was to receive $500, said that McDonough gave him only $150. The accused denied that any such conversation occurred.

Catterini was arrested the evening of January 1, 1918, voluntarily surrendering himself into the custody of an officer on learning that he was being looked for on two charges of assault with intent to commit murder, alleged to have been committed between 12 and 1 a. m. of the same day.

On January 2, 1918, bail was fixed by accused on the two charges at a total of $2,000, or $1,000 cash, and, the cash being deposited, Catterini was released from custody at 11:55 a. m. According to Riccardi's uncorroborated word, he had asked the accused to fix the bail, and accused had declined to do so at the moment, in view, as he stated, of the seriousness of the charge, and Riccardi had then gone to McDonough and solicited his assistance, with the result that the bail was fixed. The order fixing bail was filled in, except for the amount, in the handwriting of the clerk of the court, a Mr. Hagan, who testified that he had never made out an order fixing bail unless the court was in session. The amount and signature of the judge are in red ink, and the accused testified that he knew the signing was done in court for the reason that all signatures while on the bench were made in red ink, and all while off the bench in black ink. He further testified that he fixed the bail at Riccardi's request. There is absolutely nothing to show any communication, direct or indirect, from McDonough to accused prior to the making of such order, except in so far as one may speculate in view of the intimate relations existing between accused and McDonough and the amount of bail fixed. To hold that there was such communication would be to indulge in the purest of guesswork. Certainly we may not in a judicial proceeding fairly infer therefrom any arrangement between them for a bribe. It is as reasonable to infer in view of the circumstances we have stated that the bail was fixed in court solely at Riccardi's request, as testified to by the accused, as it is to infer that this action was had because of some possible communication from McDonough.

Riccardi's testimony as to the amount of money paid by Catterini is flatly contradicted by that of Catterini, who impressed the court as honestly endeavoring to tell the truth. He said that he paid $225 in cash and Liberty bonds, and $800 on a note that he signed on January 12, 1918, being $1,025 in all. He also contradicted Riccardi as to ever having been taken to McDonough's place of business, testifying that he never saw McDonough until long after the dismissal of the charges against him. There is some corroboration of Riccardi's testimony as to having some sort of arrangement with McDonough to be found in the fact that the $800 note signed by Catterini was payable to Mrs. Riccardi (the mother of Riccardi) and McDonough jointly, although McDonough testified that his connection with the matter was solely for the purpose of accommodating Riccardi in obtaining cash for his fee, and that he received $80 for his indorsement of the note and the giving of his name as security. This was in addition to the $100 which he received for furnishing the $1,000 cash bail on which Catterini was released. But, whatever the arrangement between Riccardi and McDonough, no conclusion adverse to the accused can be based thereon in the absence of evidence connecting him with the matter.

Catterini having been released on bail, the hearing on the charges was continued from time to time, testimony being taken on several of the days on which the matter came on for hearing, until finally, in April, 1918, the charges were dismissed by the accused. At these various hearings the people were represented by an assistant district attorney, Mr. Maundrell. The case was fully heard, and nothing out of the ordinary course of procedure appears in the transcript of the proceedings. Some point is made of the fact that the accused, with the attorneys, went to the hospital to take the evidence of the woman who, it was alleged, was shot by Catterini. To our minds there is absolutely nothing, except the testimony of Riccardi, to indicate that this was done at the instance of McDonough, or otherwise than in regular course. When the taking of testimony was fully concluded, the matter was submitted to the accused for decision. The transcript of the proceedings is before us, and it shows that at that time the following occurred:

"Mr. Riccardi: We have not any further evidence, your honor.

"Mr. Maundrell (assistant district attorney): The case of the people is in in this matter.

"The Court: How do you feel about it yourself, Mr. District Attorney?

"Mr. Maundrell: There is a question in my mind that there might be a probable cause for a holding. I will submit the matter to the court.

"The Court: There is a question in my mind, and it is reinforced by the fact that the defendant surrendered himself. That isn't ordinarily the act of a guilty man, nor is it indicative of a consciousness of guilt. The identification by the complaining witness, or the injured person, is entirely unsatisfactory, and the identification of a necktie and pin and a pair of shoes. It seems that a person who was present committing an act of that character would have rendered some other mark of identification which could have been made more complete and satisfactory.

"Mr. Maundrell: I understand there is a $10,000 damage suit upon file against the man three weeks ago.

"Mr. Riccardi: He has property. He will pay if he loses. That is what they wanted in the first place.

"The Court: Dismissed."

It appears from the foregoing that the assistant district attorney was doubtful as to the advisability of holding the defendant for trial in the superior court, and certainly did not urge or request a holding. It appears from his evidence given in this proceeding that he, as prosecuting officer, talked with the accused in his chambers that morning before the case was dismissed as to what should be done with it, and a fair reading of his evidence here indicates that it was his recollection that he then expressed to the accused his doubts as to the propriety of a holding for trial. The question in the cases was as to the identity of the man who in fact made the assaults; the defendant denying that he was that man. There was positive identification by the woman assaulted and her little daughter, the other person assaulted, but this was somewhat weakened by matters educed on cross-examination, and there were also one or two other circumstances pointing to defendant as the guilty party. On the other hand, there was an apparent absence of motive on the part of defendant, good evidence as to his reputation for honesty, integrity, industry, peace, and quiet, his absolute denial of the charge, and some evidence in support of his claim that he was elsewhere when the assault was committed. It also appeared that a civil action for damages on account of this assault had been instituted against him and was then pending. From the cold record of the evidence given on the preliminary examination it would seem to us that a committing magistrate might well have concluded that there was probable cause for holding defendant for trial before a jury. But the record of proceedings before accused is not such as to satisfy us that the accused did not in good faith think otherwise. It seems that the assistant district attorney who conducted the case, and who consulted during the course of the proceeding with a private attorney interested in the prosecution who attended the proceedings, thought otherwise, and the police court transcript in the case is not such as to warrant the inference of improper influence upon the accused in the matter, and much less the conclusion that his action was due to an agreement for a bribe.

But one other alleged item of corroboration remains to be noticed. The evidence does disclose an unfortunate and deplorable intimacy between accused and McDonough, one certainly calculated to bring the accused and his court into disrepute. The two had been friends for many years; the friendship dating from a time long prior to the accession of the accused to the police bench. McDonough has been for many years engaged in the business of furnishing cash bail for persons charged with public offenses, especially in the police courts, and his volume of business in the police courts was very large. By reason of the character of his business he was necessarily much interested in the fixing of bail for defendants, and also likely to be interested on occasions in the final disposition of their cases. The friendship of earlier years continued after accused became police judge, something as to which, of course, no one can justly complain, but it was accompanied by an intimacy which, in view of the nature of the business of McDonough and its association with the matters with which the accused was called upon as a judicial officer to deal, was almost bound to create suspicion of improper influence. Indeed, the intimacy was of such a character that, according to the evidence of both McDonough and accused, McDonough had occasionally presumed to speak to accused about some "misdemeanor" case pending before him, never a "felony" case, they said, but occasionally some small misdemeanor case, involving some friend, such, for instance, as an alleged violation of the law regulating traffic on public highways. In so far as the matter of gross impropriety is concerned, we must confess we can see no distinction between such conversations with relation to misdemeanor cases and conversations with relation to felony cases, and we doubt if the line between the two classes would be sacredly observed by a judge and another person whose relations were such that they discussed any matter at all pending before the judge. The confessed showing in regard to this is such that we may feel that in the Catterini matter, or, indeed, in any other matter coming before the accused that might be under inquiry, McDonough may have spoken to the accused with a view to influencing his action. There is nothing in the record, however, upon which to found such an inference with reference specifically to the Catterini matter except the possible interest of McDonough therein, in view of the testimony of Riccardi and the testimony concerning the note given to Mrs. Riccardi and McDonough. In any event, with nothing tangible in the conduct of accused with relation to the case to indicate the presence or effect of improper influence, we are not warranted in inferring anything in the nature of an agreement on his part to accept a bribe or the acceptance by him of a bribe in that matter, or even that he was in any way improperly influenced therein. In so far as he is concerned, the only evidence to connect him with any misconduct in that matter is the absolutely uncorroborated evidence of Riccardi as to an admission by him that he received $150. That uncorroborated evidence absolutely fails to produce even the slightest measure of conviction in our minds. The specific charge against accused with relation to the Catterini matter must be held to be not proved.

[4] None of the specific charges against accused having been sustained by evidence sufficient to satisfy us of its truth, it follows that the order to show cause must be discharged, and the proceeding dismissed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: SHAW, J.; LENNON, J.; WILBUR, J.

OLNEY, J. I concur in the judgment and the majority opinion, but, in order to prevent so far as possible any misunderstanding, I would epitomize what, as I understand it, is the final attitude toward the cause of the majority of the court and what is certainly my own attitude.

The question involved is, of course, purely one of fact, and is to be determined by each of us in accordance with the final impression made upon his mind by the evidence. The impression made upon my mind is one of very strong suspicion that the defendant was guilty in the Catterini case, at least of the act of corruption with which he was charged. But mere suspicion, even a strong one, is not enough to warrant a positive finding of guilt, and I find that, in spite of the strength of the circumstance to which Justice LAWLOR adverts, the dismissal by the defendant of the charge against Catterini in the face of the direct evidence against him presented to the defendant, I have not that certainty of conviction which would justify me in affirmatively finding the defendant guilty of corruption. Though this is my final conclusion, I feel free to voice my suspicion of the defendant in view of the wholly inexcusable manner in which he performed his judicial duties in general and conducted himself in particular in his relations with McDonough, who from the very nature of his business must have constantly appeared before the defendant, directly, and indirectly, as an applicant in matters of bail where it was so easy for the defendant to dispense, not impartial justice, but judicial favors with or without a monetary consideration.

SLOANE, J. I dissent. If satisfactory proof of the specific offense of accepting a bribe is necessary to the disbarment of the accused under the charges in this proceeding, I would be compelled to concur in the majority opinion. The only direct evidence of such bribe-taking rests on the testimony of Riccardi, and his unsupported word can carry little or no weight, and, as to the actual passing of any money between the parties here there is no corroborating evidence.

But the gist of this accusation for disbarment is not the crime of bribery, but the commission of an act of moral turpitude in the manner of disposition of certain criminal cases pending in the court over which the accused presided, and if the acts complained of are shown to have been influenced by some other corrupt motive than that of bribery, the variance in the proof in that respect ought not to defeat a judgment.

The substance of the charges here, taking the Catterini case as an example, is that in certain felony matters pending before him as a committing magistrate the respondent was corruptly and unlawfully influenced by a bribe in his decision and disposition of said cases.

Now, bribery is not the crux of the matter, but rather the gravamen of the offense is the moral turpitude of disposing of these cases under the influence of some corrupt motive. Bribery is merely an incident of the charge, which is fully met by the proof, if it is satisfactorily established, of some motive for the wrongful act not in itself unlawful. The accused might, for instance, have been charged with favoring the defendants as a simple act of personal friendship to them or their attorneys or sureties. Friendship is a very commendable trait in itself, but as a motive for disposing of criminal prosecutions by a magistrate it would involve an act of moral turpitude. The motive charged here happens to be bribery, a criminal act in itself, but that is not the controlling element of the accusation.

The purpose of the proceeding here is not to convict the respondent of bribery, or of any other specific criminal act, but of wrongfully administering his official duties in the particular matters charged, under some corrupt influence involving moral turpitude.

I have no question under the evidence that the respondent under some or all of the charges filed disposed of the matters before him in conscious disregard of his duties as a magistrate. The array of incriminating circumstances is too strong and convincing to be disposed of on the mere ground of coincidence. They strongly tend to corroborate Riccardi's testimony in support of some sort of a prearranged program, and, when thus supported, Riccardi's testimony, although that of a self-confessed criminal, may not be wholly disregarded.

Whether this program for the discharge of the various defendants was influenced by bribery, or politics, or favoritism, or friendship, is entirely immaterial. With any motive other than a purpose to faithfully discharge official duty it involved moral turpitude.

We do not even need to resort here to the analogy of the criminal procedure which incorporates the lesser offense within an information charging the greater. If the defendant were on trial for murder alleged to have been committed for pay, could it be held a fatal variance if the proof showed the act was committed for revenge? At any rate, there can be no room for such technicality in a proceeding of this nature.

It may be conceded at once that the rules of criminal procedure apply here to the extent that the respondent cannot be charged with one offense, and be convicted of another, but when we consider that the vital element of the accusation is the corrupt and wrongful disposition of certain cases pending in his court, and not the particular means by which the official action of the accused was influenced, it becomes apparent that the salutary rule referred to is not violated by accepting the proof as showing some other wrongful influence than that of bribery. The test of materiality of variance in an information or indictment is whether the pleading so fully and correctly informs the defendant of the criminal act with which he is charged that, taking into consideration the proof which is introduced against him, he is not misled in making his defense. People v. Freeman, 29 Cal. App. 543, 156 Pac. 994; Harrison v. U. S., 200 Fed. 662, 119 C. C. A. 78.

The respondent here was fully notified by the accusation of the entire subject-matter of investigation involving his relations with Riccardi and McDonough in connection with these criminal prosecutions.

It may be urged that, if the evidence does not establish bribery, it does not disclose specific wrongful inducement. I do not think that such is the fact. The circumstances are convincing to my mind that there was some prearranged and agreed plan to dispose of these cases in a certain manner, which agreement was acted upon by the respondent. Such a state of facts establishes moral turpitude without giving the moving cause a specific name.

There is nothing in the Code provisions or the decisions in this state relating to disbarment to invest this proceeding with such a degree of technicality that should prevent a judgment against respondent if the evidence is such as to clearly prove that the acts complained of were influenced by any corrupt and dishonest motive, whether amounting to bribery or not.

I think the majority opinion tends too much to minimize the effect of the evidence against the accused. Under each of the three separate counts of the accusation the action taken by the respondent was such as to shock the sense of judicial integrity. His own explanation of his conduct is far from satisfactory, and in the Pastiango case almost incriminating, and the fact that the program was substantially carried out in the manner that Riccardi had announced tends strongly to corroborate the testimony of the latter that it was all in accordance with a prearranged agreement, whether influenced by a bribe or some other ulterior inducement.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. I am convinced from the evidence, tested by the rules of law declared in the main opinion, that the direct testimony of Riccardi as to the three acts of bribery are sufficiently supported by the other evidence to warrant the disbarment of the accused.

Speaking from the impressions I received from the record, I cannot, upon any theory consistent with his innocence, account for the refusal of the accused to hold Catterini for trial upon the evidence presented. In connection with all the other circumstances, considering the grave condition of Mrs. Nanni, and the evidence that bail was to have been denied in the beginning, the fixing of the bail at $500 cash on each of the two charges is not without significance. The gist of the crime of assault with intent to commit murder is the specific intent to take life, since the only element of murder which is lacking is the failure to execute the deadly intention. The perpetrator of such an offense is as much possessed of a malignant and abandoned heart as if he had not shown bad marksmanship, and, keeping in view the hour of the assault, that the woman and child were left to die, and the other surrounding circumstances, it does not appear that those essentials of murder were lacking in this instance.

Two questions are presented on a preliminary examination: Has a crime been committed, and is there sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof? Section 872, Pen. Code. "Sufficient cause" has been held to have the same meaning as "probable cause" as used in section 1487 of the Penal Code. Ex Parte Heacock, 8 Cal. App. 420, 97 Pac. 77. It was declared in Yaner v. People, 34 Mich. 286, 289:

> "The examining magistrate is not to be required to nicely weigh evidence as a petit jury would, nor to discharge the prisoner where there is a conflict of evidence, or in case of a mere reasonable doubt of his guilt."

Upon the facts in this case the corpus delicti proved itself, so that the only question to be determined from the evidence was whether there was sufficient cause for believing Catterini was the assailant. In determining this question, the committing magistrate is not to finally determine the weight of the evidence, nor to resolve conflicts therein, but only to decide whether there is sufficient cause to hold the defendant for trial. In judging the state of mind of the accused in this matter it is inconceivable to me that he, an experienced practitioner and judge of the police court successively for nearly 20 years, did not know and understand it was his plain duty to hold the defendant so that a jury, under the sanctions of a trial on the merits, where all the evidence is presented, could determine whether he was the guilty party. Of course, a mere mistake of judgment, or gross carelessness, yielding to influence, sympathy, or the like, on the part of the magistrate, would not constitute bribery as charged herein, but in the presence of evidence such as was adduced in this case the weightiest consideration should be given to the failure of the accused to hold Catterini so that he could be tried in the superior court.

A brief reference to some of the salient features of the evidence will, I think, demonstrate this. Catterini had lived in the Nanni household, eating at the same table with the family for several months. While the room where the shooting occurred was dark, in the struggle both the woman and the child were given an opportunity to determine the identity of the assailant. Light came through a crack in the window shade. The woman tore from the throat of the assailant a necktie which was identified as belonging to Catterini. One of his shoes was afterwards found in the room. Catterini's defense, in addition to proof of good character, was an alibi. The crimes were committed in a house in the Mission district. The alibi witness was the keeper of a dance hall on the Barbary Coast, where Catterini testified he was at the hour of the shooting and during the rest of the night. When first interrogated he said he was in a room a block away when the bells announced the new year. He admitted that a revolver with three empty barrels and showing recent bloodstains, which was found in his trunk by an officer, belonged to him. He first admitted he was out in the Mission about 7:30 or 8 o'clock, but denied he was at the Nanni house on that day or night. Detective Officer Thomas Fuhrman testified Catterini told him he was in the Nanni home for a few minutes about 8 o'clock. Mrs Nanni testified that about a month before the shooting Catterini had threatened to take her life, and while admitting the incident, his version of what took place is that she requested him to kill her. When questioned about the tie and pin, Catterini said they were in his trunk, whereupon he was shown these articles by the officer. Then he said he did not know how the officer got the pin, but stated he left the tie at the Nanni household some time before.

The principal reason assigned by the accused for discharging Catterini was that he voluntarily surrendered. The surrender took place some 17 hours after the shooting and about the same length of time before the services of the facile Riccardi were engaged, and the work of blocking justice began. Catterini's action in surrendering may have comported either with his guilt or his innocence; for, if he were guilty, going into hiding or seeking flight would be strong evidence against him, and the question ought to have been left to a jury to decide. The accused also remarked when he discharged Catterini:

"It seems that a person who was present committing an act of that character would have rendered some other mark of identification which could have been made more satisfactory."

Is not the reason given by the accused for going out of his province as a committing magistrate and passing upon the merits of this case strongly indicative of an intention to exonerate the defendant for some reason other than a lack of evidence?

Riccardi testified that the reason the preliminary examination was opened at the hospital was because of two conversations he had with McDonough, the latter saying in the first he would speak to the accused about the case, and the second that he had done so; the point being that, as the case would be heard in the "woman's court," which the accused would preside over during the current month (each judge, it seems, holds the court for a month alternately), he would "lose jurisdiction of that case, and once he loses jurisdiction we are in a nice hole." As to the $800 promissory note: McDonough admits that he received $80 commission out of a transaction he testifies was a mere accommodation to Riccardi, in addition to the $100 commission he obtained from the bail money. To my mind the entire story of McDonough as to how he came to indorse the note is palpably improbable and not entitled to credence. Assuming this testimony to be fabricated, it must be taken as inferential proof that the entire bail transaction was tainted with corruption. Why resort to an invention if the note transaction was as McDonough testified? Why was there need for McDonough furnishing security to the bank? Mrs. Riccardi had about $4,000 on deposit there. According to McDonough, he had known Riccardi the three or four months the latter had been practicing in the San Francisco police courts. The accused also knew Riccardi. Riccardi tells of meeting the accused in saloons, including McDonough's, and in his court chambers, and talking over cases with him. It may be inferred that Riccardi's identity with the "system" about which he has testified was becoming known, and, of course, even an honest judge on that bench would not fail to appreciate that the due administration of justice was imperiled by the nefarious methods of so gifted a crook as Riccardi. It may also be inferred that Catterini was not in ignorance of the system. The evidence impresses me that Catterini was neither frank nor unsophisticated. He had property, and he evidently knew what to do and where to go in order to get results. Riccardi and McDonough were soon seen in action, the judicial machinery appeared to function harmoniously, and everything moved rapidly except the decision itself. Must we shut our minds to the plain import of the evidence simply because one of the guilty participants has chosen for reasons of his own to reveal the shameful conditions shown to hedge the administration of justice in the police courts?

Riccardi has been attacked as a witness in all the modes known to the law. His testimony gives me the impression that he has no scruples which would induce him to tell the truth in a matter of importance to himself if it seemed to his detriment to do so. He probably hoped, because of his willingness to expose the system, that some concession might be made to him by the public authorities. But, notwithstanding that witnesses such as Riccardi are to be distrusted, it is nevertheless the solemn duty of courts of justice in weighing their evidence, and especially where matters affecting the public good are at stake, to endeavor to extract from their testimony as much of the truth as is possible—to sift the false from the true, for we learn as judicial officers that justice is often served from the lips of guilty participants in great public wrongs.

Now, I do not accept the reasoning of the majority opinion as to how Riccardi expected to be benefited by the testimony he gave. He is presented in this proceeding by a committee of the Bar Association of San Francisco, composed of earnest and sincere members of the bar faithfully endeavoring to vindicate the ethics of the profession and purge it of disreputable members, and the bench of venal judges. But it is plain to me that Riccardi realized he could only help himself by satisfying the committee that he had told the truth. According to the evidence, the committee refused to make any promises of help to Riccardi, and certainly, since the Bar Association had taken up the work of cleansing the police courts, the committee would neither advocate nor tolerate any leniency being shown him if it believed he had given false testimony against a judicial officer. Moreover, the effect of sensational disclosures on the public mind is so diffused I do not think as shrewd a man as Riccardi would expect any tangible results from that source. In my opinion, Riccardi testified under circumstances peculiarly calculated to induce him to tell the truth. He was in the toils of the law with a long term of imprisonment ahead of him. There is no evidence of personal hostility on his part toward the accused. And, considering all that there is at stake to the accused and to McDonough in this proceeding, I think there is strong reason for closely scrutinizing their testimony, and especially that of the former, whose denials of the acts of bribery are couched in stereotyped and colorless phrase. I do not understand that my learned Associates who have signed the majority opinion entertain any doubt that the conditions Riccardi described as the "system" did not in fact exist. But apparently because he, an admitted actor in the system, comes before us to tell the miserable story, his testimony must be practically discarded when it comes to the question whether the accused was a factor in the system. If Riccardi's story of the system is true, it follows, of course, that judges in the police courts have been debauched. I apprehend that once it is believed the accused was a part of the system there could be no hesitation in finding sufficient support for Riccardi's testimony that he acted corruptly in this particular case.

In cases of criminal confederation evidence of close relationship between the members of the enterprise is always regarded as of a most persuasive character. That an intimate relationship existed between McDonough and the accused, and that they discussed cases which came before the latter, is admitted by them. I shall not pause to dwell on what is urged upon us in extenuation of their indiscretions. For 15 years McDonough was a professional bail bond broker, conducting the business in his saloon, which was in the neighborhood of the criminal courts. In my view, this constituted a menace to the administration of justice. It must be so regarded by every right-thinking person, whether a judicial officer or a private citizen. As a bail bond broker McDonough did a very large business and was daily brought into contact with judges and other officials who had to act on the bail he furnished. Such contract is very apt to breed contamination, and for that reason, in my judgment, professional bondsmen should not be accepted by courts of justice. McDonough kept track of the volume of his bail brokerage business for income tax purposes, but otherwise preserved no record of bail transactions. In this proceeding he was not able to fortify his testimony by books of account of any sort. It is not difficult to understand why he kept no records. When bail has been declared forfeited the sureties may seek to have the order of forfeiture discharged. Sections 1305–1307, Pen. Code. Is it not inherently probable that in such matters McDonough would use every means within his power to avoid the loss of his money? His bail bond business is as much on trial in this proceeding as is Riccardi's credibility or the integrity of the accused. In view of all the surrounding circumstances it is against every rule of probability that the relationship between the accused and McDonough was of the character they have both described. It must shock the sense of propriety of every one that a relationship could exist between a judge and a bail bond broker under the circumstances shown, for it would tend to scandalize the administration of justice, create suspicion, forfeit public confidence and respect, invite corruption, and be directly responsible for the very conditions described in the evidence in this proceeding.

I am of the opinion that there is sufficient evidence which is not "purely guesswork" to support the testimony of Riccardi that the accused was bribed in this case through the medium of McDonough, and that the conversation between Riccardi and the accused as to the amount of the bribe did take place. This, in itself, would constitute an admission of guilt. I have not attempted to reconcile with the evidence in the Catterini case the action of the prosecuting officer as to the sufficiency of the evidence to hold Catterini for trial, and I shall therefore leave him to his own explanations.

Under the evidence in the Pastiango case every reason is shown for and no reason against holding the defendant for trial. The accused testified he believed the defendant was guilty of the act, but that it was not done with an "impure motive." But, notwithstanding this, after the felony charge was dismissed, the defendant was prosecuted and convicted under ordinance 1059 upon the identical evidence offered under the felony charge. This ordinance prescribes an offense where any lewd, indecent or obscene act is committed. The meaning of section 288 (the felony statute) is "lewd and lascivious" conduct, when accompanied by a certain specific intent. But, even if we assume the accused dismissed the felony charge for the reasons given, upon what theory can his action in suspending the sentence of 3 months on the misdemeanor charge, thereby permitting the defendant to go unwhipped of justice for tampering with a girl under 14 years of age, be explained or defended? I think this case also furnishes corroborating evidence.

Even assuming in the Spinelli matter that the accused did not fix the bail, do not the surrounding circumstances tend to corroborate the testimony of Riccardi? No satisfactory explanation is given by the accused for taking up the question of bail in this case. This fact, however, standing by itself, might not be significant. But it does not seem likely that Riccardi would go to the home of the accused with the sureties in the absence of some understanding or arrangement. Besides, the accused admitted that he "depended on Riccardi" as to the sufficiency of the undertaking. This admission certainly shows something more serious than "a gross neglect of duty." The transaction occurred in November, 1918, and by this time, of course, the accused knew of Riccardi's character and activities. It was stated Riccardi's gross yearly earnings from his practice in the Hall of Justice were between $40,000 and $60,000, out of which he claimed he only netted $12,000. Moreover, if Riccardi's story was an invention, it is not likely he would have placed the amount of the bribe at the insignificant sum of $50. In my opinion, the evidence in this matter is corroborative of Riccardi's testimony and explains why the accused "depended" upon him in the acceptance of the undertaking.

I have given my appraisal of the evidence. I am unable to believe that in the Catterini and Pastiango cases the accused, an experienced judge, did not reach the conclusion there was sufficient cause to hold the defendants for trial. Human life has been forfeited and the liberty of the individual taken under the forms of law upon less convincing evidence than that presented in these cases—upon a preliminary examination. But a failure by the accused to find there was sufficient cause would not, of course, call for disbarment if his action upon any hypothesis of innocence could be attributed to a mistaken conception of the law or the evidence, or an erroneous or otherwise unwarranted exercise of discretion. In none of these transactions is it claimed or suggested the accused was moved by personal appeal, sympathy, or compassion, for, if he was so influenced, his conduct would not be corrupt within the meaning of the accusation, however inexcusable it may have been. But in my study of the evidence I could not accept the conclusion announced in the prevailing opinion, for I reached a point where neither the self-confessed criminality of Riccardi nor the presumptions of innocence and that his official duty was regularly performed with which the accused stood clothed could avail against the plain import and inherent probabilities of the evidence indicative of guilt.

I am of the opinion that the accused should be disbarred.

185 Cal. 606

WHITE v. SCHADER et al. (L. A. 5561.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 2, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⟸419(4)—Agreement to assume mortgage may be shown, notwithstanding deed recital that property is granted subject thereto.

An agreement to assume and pay a mortgage not being inconsistent with a deed reciting that the property is granted subject to the mortgage, such an agreement may be shown by parol evidence, as showing the consideration for the deed.

2. Mortgages ⟸281 — Where payment of a mortgage forms part of the consideration, grantee must discharge it.

Where the payment of a mortgage forms part of the consideration for a conveyance, the grantee is bound to pay the same.

3. Judgment ⟸744—Finding that defendants assumed payment of a mortgage held a conclusive adjudication.

Where, in a previous action for rescission of a contract, whereby plaintiff and defendants exchanged incumbered property, plaintiff, the defendant in that action, filed a cross-bill seeking specific performance which set up the adequacy of consideration, a judgment finding that the contract obligated each party to discharge the mortgage on the property received, and that the consideration was adequate, was a conclusive adjudication, binding in an action by plaintiff to compel defendants to pay deficiency resulting on foreclosure sale of the mortgage on the property which had belonged to plaintiff.

4. Mortgages ⟸292(3)—Where foreclosure sale results in deficiency, mortgagor, without first paying deficiency, may sue grantee who assumed payment.

Where foreclosure of a mortgage resulted in a deficiency, the mortgagor, without first paying the deficiency, could bring action against his grantee, who assumed payment of the mortgage, for the mortgagor's right to reimbursement had then accrued.

5. Mortgages ⟸292(1)—That mortgagor was not personally served in foreclosure action does not preclude relief where deficiency resulted so that mortgagor's payment was not voluntary as respects recovery from grantee primarily liable.

Though the mortgagor was not personally served in foreclosure proceedings, service being had by publication, the mortgagee did not, where deficiency resulted on sale, lose his rights against the mortgagor; hence the mortgagor's subsequent payment of the amount of the deficiency was not voluntary, so as to preclude relief against a grantee to assumed payment.

6. Mortgages ⟸280(4)—Agreement to pay attorney's fees included in agreement to assume mortgage.

An agreement by the grantee to assume and pay a mortgage on the property conveyed includes an agreement to pay attorney's fees, which were included in mortgage foreclosure.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by A. Stanley White against Carl F. Schader and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Tanner, Odell & Taft, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Oscar C. Mueller and Alfred Wright, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The parties herein had exchanged two pieces of real estate, each subject to mortgage. The mortgage upon the property of the plaintiff was afterwards foreclosed by the mortgagee, and sold in satisfaction thereof, leaving a deficiency of $2,264.90. The mortgagee thereupon brought suit against the plaintiff for the amount of the deficiency, and the plaintiff in turn brought suit against the defendants, alleging that the defendants in the transaction for the exchange of properties had assumed and agreed to pay the mortgage, and were therefore liable to him for such deficiency. Subsequent to the beginning of the suit, the plaintiff paid the amount of the deficiency, and, by way of supplemental complaint, set up the fact of such payment. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Defendants' main contention on the appeal is that the written agreement for the exchange of the real properties of plaintiff and defendants, and the deeds which were exchanged in pursuance thereof, provided that each party should take the property transferred to it subject to the mortgage thereon. That, as there was no agreement either in the deeds or in the written contract for exchange by which the defendants agreed to assume the mortgage upon the property transferred to them, oral evidence that such an agreement was entered into is inadmissible, for the reason that the writing between the parties must be considered conclusive as to the agreement between them.

[1] It is well settled by the authorities that an agreement to assume and pay a mortgage is not inconsistent with a deed reciting that the property is granted subject to a mortgage. Consequently, such an agreement may be shown by parol evidence. Hopkins v. Warner, 109 Cal. 133, 41 Pac. 868; Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Dickinson, 167 Cal. 616, 140 Pac. 265; Dodds v. Spring, 174 Cal. 412, 163 Pac. 351; Arp v. Ferguson, 175 Cal. 646, 166 Pac. 803; Jones on Mortgages, §§ 748, 750; 27 Cyc. 1344,D; Swarthout v. Shields, 185 Mich. 427, 152 N. W. 202; Ordway v. Downey, 18 Wash. 412, 51 Pac. 1047, 52 Pac. 228, 63 Am. St. Rep. 892; see note, page 84, 78 Am. Dec.; McDill v. Gunn, 43 Ind. 315, 319; Drury v. Tremont Improvement Co., 95 Mass. (13 Allen) 168; Moore v. Booker, 4 N. D. 543, 62 N. W. 607. As this court stated in Hopkins v. Warner, supra:

"It is not necessary that there should be a formal promise, on the part of the grantee, to pay the mortgage debt, in order to render him liable therefor, if his intention to assume the debt appears from a consideration of the entire instrument. The obligation may be made orally or in a separate instrument; it may be implied from the transaction of the parties, or it may be shown by the circumstances under which the purchase was made, as well as by the language used in the agreement."

See, also, Andrews v. Robertson, 177 Cal. 434, 438, 170 Pac. 1129.

The theory on which such oral evidence is permitted, notwithstanding the contents of the deed, is that the purpose of such evidence is to show the consideration for the transfer, and that this may be done by parol evidence. In McDill v. Gunn, supra, the Supreme Court of Indiana thus stated the rule:

"Parol evidence may be given to show the real consideration of a deed, and that the purchaser took the conveyance subject to incumbrances and agreed to discharge them in addition to the consideration stated in the deed. Allen v. Lee, 1 Ind. 58; Rockhill v. Spraggs, 9 Ind. 30; Pitman v. Conner, 27 Ind. 337; Robinius v. Lister, 30 Ind. 142."

Upon the same subject, the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, in Drury v. Tremont Improvement Co., supra, stated:

"The plaintiff contends that the deed is conclusive evidence of the contract between the parties, and that no other evidence is admissible on the subject. But as to the consideration which was paid, the deed is not conclusive. The acknowledgment of payment may be controlled by parol evidence of an additional or a different consideration. Paige v. Sherman, 6 Gray, 511; Miller v. Goodwin, 8 Gray, 542."

Further authorities will be found in the note, 25 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1202. The following cases therein cited may be referred to as particularly applicable to the facts in the case at bar: Herrin v. Abbe, 55 Fla. 769, 46 South. 183, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 907; Perkins v. McAuliffe, 105 Wis. 582, 81 N. W. 645; Johnson v. Elmen, 94 Tex. 168, 59 S. W. 253, 52 L. R. A. 162, 86 Am. St. Rep. 845; Morgan v. South Milwaukee Lake View Co., 97 Wis. 275, 72 N. W. 872; Langan v. Iverson, 78 Minn. 299, 80 N. W. 1051.

It is clear from the foregoing authorities that, if the rights of the parties are determined with relation to the deed and the oral testimony concerning the assumption of the mortgage, the parol evidence with reference to the assumption of the mortgage was admissible, and the judgment of the trial court must be sustained.

The foregoing, however, is not entirely decisive of the case, for the reason that the deed in question was based upon a previous written agreement of exchange, which agreement was subsequently enforced by a decree of specific performance wherein the parties hereto litigated their respective rights under said agreement. In determining the rights of the parties in this action, we have to take into consideration the effect of such contract and such decree. It is therefore necessary to state additional facts in order to arrive at a conclusion upon that subject. The parties entered into an agreement for exchange of real estate on the 23d of November, 1911. Under the terms of this agreement, the Schaders agreed to deliver to White a grant deed, on or before the 23d of December, to three lots in Santa Monica, with a certificate of title—

'showing the title of said property to be free and clear of all incumbrances in Nellie M. Schader, except a mortgage for $7,500 payable to Mrs. Mary B. Hook, due approximately two years from date, and also subject to the restrictions of said Carl F. Schader 'Seaside Terrace' tract above referred to, as follows. * * *"

They also agreed to deliver to White a bill of sale of all the furniture contained in the residence erected thereon, and to deliver possession December 22, 1911, on payment of $4,000. White agreed to deliver to the Schaders on or before December 23, 1911, a warranty deed to certain real property in the city of Seattle, Wash., and to deliver a certificate of title showing the title of the premises to be in White, "free and clear of all incumbrances, except a certain mortgage for $7,000 dated April 20, 1910, running for five years, at 7 per cent. interest per annum, in favor of Margaret A. Campbell" and excepting also certain assessments, etc. It was further agreed that the Schaders should pay the interest on the note and mortgage of $7,500 in favor of said Mary B. Hook to date (November 23, 1911), and that White should pay the interest on the $7,500 mortgage in favor of Margaret A. Campbell to date. It was further agreed that White should pay the Schaders $4,500. It should be observed that this contract calls for a grant deed from the Schaders and a warranty deed from White, the effect of which deeds would be that each grantor should discharge the incumbrances upon his own property. It is to be further observed, however, that each grantor was to furnish evidence of title showing the property subject to the particular incumbrances referred to in the agreement.

Subsequent to the delivery of possession of Schaders' property to White, they brought a suit to recover possession and for rescission of the contract of exchange. White, by cross-complaint, sought to specifically enforce the contract, and the Schaders, in their answer to the cross-complaint, sought to reform the agreement of exchange. In the complaint for a specific performance, it was necessary that the cross-complainant allege, as he did, that the consideration was adequate. This allegation was denied, and formed one of the issues in the case. The finding of the court upon that subject is as follows:

"That said agreement hereinbefore referred to was and is a just and reasonable agreement as between the plaintiff and the defendant, and at the time said agreement was made the said property of the defendant in the city of Seattle, and the sum of $4,500 paid by the defendant to the plaintiff, together with the difference in plaintiff's favor in the mortgages assumed by the plaintiff and the defendant respectively, constituted, and were, a fair, just, and adequate consideration for the said property of the plaintiff in said city of Santa Monica."

It was in pursuance of this finding as to the entire transaction between the parties and the effect of the deed tendered by White to Campbell that the decree was rendered requiring the Schaders to specifically perform the agreement by the delivery to White of their deed to the property in Santa Monica.

[2, 3] This action between the parties was pending at the time of the bringing of the action at bar, the former action having been tried, and judgment rendered, and the case was on appeal. In defendants' answer, they stood upon the pendency of that case as a ground of abatement, but previous to the trial the former action had been terminated by an affirmance of the judgment. Schader v. White, 173 Cal. 441, 160 Pac. 557. The judgment roll in the prior case was introduced in evidence. Inasmuch as the question of the consideration passing between the parties in the transaction was involved in the previous action, and was determined by the findings and judgment in that case, the proposition that the assumption of the mortgage in question was part of the consideration running to respondent is res adjudicata, and it is well settled that, where the payment of a mortgage forms part of the consideration of a conveyance, the grantee is bound to pay the same. The rule is thus stated in Brosseau v. Lowy, 209 Ill. 405, 70 N. E. 901:

"It is well established that when a party purchases premises which are incumbered to secure the payment of indebtedness, and assumes the payment of the indebtedness as a part of the purchase money, the premises purchased are in his hands a primary fund for the payment of the debt, and it is his duty to pay it. Lilly v. Palmer, 51 Ill. 331; Russell v. Pistor, 3 Seld. 171. And the rule is the same, although there be no assumption of payment of the indebtedness, if the purchase be made expressly subject to the incumbrance, and the amount of the indebtedness thereby secured is included in and forms a part of the consideration of the conveyance. Lilly v. Palmer, supra; Comstock v. Hitt, 37 Ill. 542; Fowler v. Fay, 62 Ill. 375; Russell v. Pistor, supra; Ferris v. Crawford, 2 Denio, 598."

See, also, Tichenor v. Dodd, 4 N. J. Eq. 454.

In considering the question as to whether the findings and judgment in the prior action between the parties are conclusive upon the question of the assumption of the mortgage in question, it should be stated that the appellants rely upon the statement contained in the findings that "* * * said contract contains the whole agreement of the parties thereto. * * *" This clause is a part of the sentence in the findings disposing of Schader's contention in that case that there could have been a mutual mistake in the drafting of the contract in omitting the following words: "That said A. Stanley White is to pay the taxes on the premises in the city of Seattle for the years 1911–12," and it was in that connection that the court found that these words were not omitted by mistake, and, incidentally, that the contract contained the whole agreement of the parties. This general statement, of course, is modified, in so far as the assumption of the mortgage in question is concerned, by the express finding that the parties agreed to assume the mortgages upon the properties deeded to them respectively.

In view of the fact that the question of the assumption of the mortgage is res adjudicata under the circumstances of this case, it is unnecessary to consider whether the parol evidence introduced with reference to the assumption of the mortgage was properly receivable, or sufficient in legal effect to establish such assumption.

[4] Defendants claim that the action was prematurely filed, for the reason that the plaintiff had not at that time paid the deficiency; that therefore the order permitting the filing of the supplemental complaint was erroneous, and that proof thereunder should not have been received. There is no merit in the contention, for the reason that the right of the plaintiff to reimbursement had accrued when suit was brought. At that time the mortgaged property had been applied to the debts by the mortgage foreclosure sale, and there was an unpaid balance. Stichter v. Cox, 52 Neb. 532, 72 N. W. 848; Callender v. Edmison, 8 S. D. 81, 65 N. W. 425; Adams v. Symon, 6 N. Y. Supp. 652; Merriam v. Lumber Co., 23 Minn. 314; Burbank v. Roots, 4 Colo. App. 197, 35 Pac. 275; Williams v. Fowle, 132 Mass. 385; Sparkman v. Gove, 44 N. J. Law, 252; Kreling v. Kreling, 118 Cal. 413, 50 Pac. 546; Jones on Mortgages, vol. 1, § 769. The case of O'Neal v. W. H. H. Hart, 116 Cal. 69, 47 Pac. 926, is cited as authority for an opposite conclusion. It is merely held in that case that the grantor was not entitled to a judgment against the grantee in the mortgage foreclosure case where the mortgagee had asked no relief against the grantee, and that the vendor and grantor could only be entitled to such judgment upon the payment of the deficiency, if any. This does not purport to determine the rights of the vendor and grantor in a separate action against the grantee and vendee, who has assumed and agreed to pay a mortgage upon the premises transferred.

[5] Appellants contend that the mortgagee waived her rights against the mortgagor, the plaintiff herein, by failing to secure a deficiency judgment in the mortgage foreclosure case. In that case service was obtained by publication. Jurisdiction was not acquired over the person of the plaintiff, and the effect of the decree was to apply the property to satisfaction of the mortgage. It was in no sense a waiver of the rights of the mortgagee against the mortgagor. The payment by the plaintiff to the mortgagee was therefore not voluntary.

[6] Appellants claim that the judgment is excessive, at least to the extent of the attorney's fees which were included in the mortgage foreclosure. The agreement to pay these attorney's fees was included in the agreement to assume and to pay the mortgage debt. Williams v. Moody, 95 Ga. 8, 22 S. E. 30; Johnson v. Harder, 45 Iowa, 677.

Judgment affirmed.

WHITE v. HENDLEY. (Sac. 2981.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 4, 1921.)

1. Deeds ⊜56(2)—Intent to transfer title is essential to conveyance.

To constitute a valid transfer of real property by deed, the delivery of the instrument of conveyance must be attended by an intent to transfer the title and the existence of such intent is to be determined by a consideration of all the evidence bearing on that issue.

2. Deeds ⊜206—Evidence held not to sustain court's finding that parties did not intend conveyance of title.

In a suit to set aside an absolute conveyance of mining property which was accompanied by a contract manifesting an intention that the grantee should have the title subject only to the right of the grantor to support and that the property should be reconveyed to the grantor if he survived the grantee, evidence held insufficient to warrant an inference that the conveyance of the title was not intended by the parties, so that the trial court's finding against the conveyance was so clearly against the preponderance of the evidence that it must be reversed.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; Ernest Weyand, Judge.

Action by Joseph Hendley against Joseph W. Hendley to set aside a deed to mining property, in which Richard White, as executor of the last will of Joseph Hendley, was substituted as plaintiff after the death of the original plaintiff. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 35 Cal. App. 267, 169 Pac. 710.

George F. Jones, of Oroville, for appellant.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for respondent.

LENNON, J. This action, instituted for the purpose of setting aside and canceling a deed to certain mining property in Butte county, Cal., arose from the following facts: The plaintiff's testate, Joseph Hendley, like other adventurous spirits, came to San Francisco as a sailor in the year 1847. He remained in California and later began traveling the trails to the different mining camps in the interior, eventually locating in Morris ravine, a few miles from Oroville, in the county of Butte. Here he spent the rest of his life, living in a cabin by himself, after the custom of so many of the early mining pioneers, and procuring title to the mining land referred to in the pleadings in this action.

In 1910 Joseph W. Hendley, a nephew of the pioneer Joseph Hendley, came to California from Illinois and visited his uncle. Desiring that his mine remain in the Hendley family and also wishing to see the mine developed in his own lifetime, the uncle went with his nephew, on April 26, 1910, to the office of an attorney in Oroville and executed the papers which are the source of the present controversy. These papers consisted of a deed and an agreement. The deed was executed by the uncle and purported to convey to the nephew the uncle's one-half interest in the mining land in question; it appears that in 1896 the uncle had transferred a one-half interest in the land to a Mrs. McIntyre. The agreement, wherein the nephew is referred to as the party of the first part and the uncle as the party of the second part, provides as follows:

"Whereas the said party of the second part has this day granted and conveyed unto the said party of the first part by deed absolute and without condition all the real estate of said party of the second part situated in the county of Butte, state of California, consisting of all the right, title and interest of the party of the second part in and to that certain mining property situate in Morris ravine, in said Butte county, and commonly known as the 'Joe Hendley mine and mining property,' and

"Whereas, it is understood that the said party of the second part shall during his lifetime occupy said premises as a place of residence, and shall obtain therefrom such income as may be necessary to afford him a comfortable livelihood and living in accordance with his desire and condition in life, and that during his lifetime said property shall be advantageously developed in a proper and systematic manner as a mining claim for the benefit of said party of the first part, and also for the benefit of the party of the second part for the purpose hereinabove stated:

"Now therefore it is hereby mutually agreed that the party of the first part will undertake the opening up and developing of said property as a mining claim at his own expense and free of cost and expense to the party of the second part, and in case, either before or after the full development of said property as a mining claim, in the judgment of the party of the second part it shall be advantageous to sell and dispose of said property for a valuable consideration and at a sum in excess of the amount expended thereon by the party of the first part, then and in that event the party of the first part will consent to such sale and join in executing any conveyance necessary therefor, provided that in case of such sale said party of the first part shall be reimbursed from the proceeds thereof for all moneys expended by him or expenses which he may have incurred in connection with the development of said property and a reasonable rate of interest thereon, it being further understood and agreed that the party of the first part is to have and receive the whole of the proceeds from the sale of said property except such amount thereof as may be necessary to provide for the care and maintenance of said party of the second part during his lifetime.

"It is fully understood and agreed that the intention of the parties herein is to give to the party of the first part the full and entire benefit of all the property of the party of the second part this day conveyed, with the right to proceed with the opening up and development thereof, and to obtain the full benefit to be derived therefrom, save and except that the party of the second part is to be provided for during his lifetime.

"It is further understood and agreed that in case said party of the first part shall not survive the party of the second part, then and in that event the property described in said deed is to be reconveyed to the party of the second part, subject, however, to the reimbursement of the party of the first part for the amounts expended by him in the development of said property as hereinbefore agreed.

"The terms of this agreement are to be binding upon the heirs, successors or assigns of both parties hereto."

The agreement was deposited in a bank in Oroville, with escrow instructions to the effect that, upon the death of either the uncle or nephew, the agreement should be delivered to the survivor.

In 1914 the uncle commenced an action against the nephew to set aside the deed, claiming that the clauses in the agreement relating to the development of the mine by the nephew constituted conditions subsequent, the failure of the performance of which entitled plaintiff to a cancellation of the deed. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, but was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, which held the clauses in question to be mere covenants. White v. Hendley, 35 Cal. App. 267, 169 Pac. 710. Plaintiff thereupon amended his complaint and proceeded upon the theory that there was no intention on the part of the uncle at the time of the signing and acknowledgment of the deed, or at any time, to divest himself of title to any of the lands described in the deed or to vest title thereto in the nephew. The plaintiff again prevailed in the trial court, and this is the second appeal by the defendant. Pending the litigation, the uncle died, and his executor was substituted as plaintiff.

Fraud is not charged in this case and no evidence of fraud was presented; no question is raised on this trial as to the effect of a failure to comply with the provisions of the agreement in regard to the development of the mine during the lifetime of the uncle, for that point was determined on the first appeal. Intention was the sole issue of fact on the second trial, and we are of the opinion that appellant is correct in his contention that there is no substantial evidence to sustain the finding of the trial court on that issue.

[1, 2] To constitute a valid transfer of real property by deed, the delivery of the instrument of conveyance must be attended by an intent to transfer title, and the question of the existence of such an intent is determined by a consideration of all the evidence in a given case bearing upon that issue. Williams v. Kidd, 170 Cal. 631, 638, 151 Pac. 1, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 703. Therefore the question to be determined in the instant case is whether the parties intended to effect a transfer of title or whether it was contemplated that no such transfer should take place and that the uncle should continue to be the owner thereof until his death. The written instruments embodying the transaction of the parties, namely, the deed and agreement, are the most potent evidence of intention. The uncle testified that he voluntarily executed the deed to the nephew. This deed, which was in form an absolute conveyance, was not retained in the possession or control of the grantor, but was recorded and then mailed to the grantee with the knowledge and consent of the grantor. The agreement accompanying the deed begins with a recital that all of the interest of the uncle in the property has been conveyed to the nephew by deed "absolute and without condition," and, after setting forth an understanding that the nephew will open and develop the mine at his own expense, provides that the uncle shall, during his lifetime, be entitled to a sufficient amount of the income from the property or proceeds thereof, in the event of a sale, to afford him a comfortable livelihood. It then states that the intention is to give the nephew the full and entire benefit of all the property "conveyed," except only that the uncle is to be provided for during his lifetime, and closes with the provision that, in case the nephew should die before the uncle, then the property should be "reconveyed" to the latter. The provision in the event that the uncle should survive the nephew is relied upon by respondent in support of the argument that it was the intention that title should pass to the nephew only upon the death of the uncle. However, this provision itself and the entire agreement clearly negative the existence of any intention to postpone the taking effect of the deed. The only permissible construction of the agreement is that the salient objects in the mind of the uncle were the immediate passing of title to the nephew subject only to the life interest of the uncle. The very language of the provision for the return of the property in the event that the nephew predeceased the uncle recognized title as having vested in the nephew, for the agreement was that the property should be "reconveyed," thus acknowledging that a legal transfer would be necessary to vest title in the uncle. The efficacy of such a provision is of no import in the present case and we do not pass upon the validity of the provision, but consider it merely for the purpose of ascertaining intent. Despite respondent's disparagement of the agreement as "a gem in the way of camouflage," it furnishes incontestable proof that the parties contemplated a passing of title at the time of the execution of the deed.

The circumstances, concurrent and subsequent to the execution of the deed, point conclusively to the fact that there was no intent to postpone the vesting of title. The deed was not withheld, but was delivered to the grantee and recorded. Moreover, on August 1, 1911, sixteen months after the signing of the deed which is the subject of this action, Joseph Hendley, the uncle, executed and delivered to his nephew a deed conveying to him .112 of an acre, referred to in the testimony as the outlet to the mine, which was adjacent to the property described in the previous deed and which was inadvertently omitted from that instrument. Seven days later he executed and delivered to his nephew a deed to the water rights, there being some doubt in the minds of the parties as to whether or not the original deed covered the water rights. The execution, delivery, and recording of these supplementary conveyances furnishes additional proof of the intention of the grantor to divest himself of title to all of the property in question.

Further glimpses of this intention are revealed by the correspondence which ensued between the parties after the execution of the deed and agreement. That the uncle understood the general legal effect of a deed is evidenced by the following statement, in reference to another matter, contained in a letter to his nephew, "A deed, my dear nephew, is absolute title." In a letter from the uncle to the nephew, dated December 16, 1913, is the statement: "You are the owner of the property." Numerous references and passages in the correspondence indicate that the parties regarded the title as having passed to the nephew on the execution of the deed.

The evidence relied upon by respondent in support of the judgment of the trial court consists mainly of so-called inferences from the evidence adduced. Thus, it is claimed that the placing of the agreement in escrow, with instructions to deliver it to the survivor, demonstrates that no title had passed, but that, upon the mere return of the agreement, the whole transaction would be wiped out. Such cannot reasonably be deemed the purpose of the escrow. It will be noted that the agreement did not provide for the mere redelivery of the deed or agreement, but recognized the necessity of a reconveyance of the property in the event that the nephew predeceased the uncle. Clearly, the only purpose of the escrow was to provide the uncle with evidence of the agreement of the nephew in the event of the prior death of the latter. Respondent also points out that the nephew in one or two letters reminds the uncle that he had spoken of making a "will" and that the evidence shows that the uncle possessed no real property other than that in controversy. From these facts, it is argued, the inference is permissible that it was understood by the parties that the uncle should transmit the property to the nephew by will. In view of the conduct of the parties these facts are, in and of themselves, insufficient to support the inference contended for. The vague references to the execution of a will cannot be permitted to overturn the previous unequivocal acts of the parties. It is entirely reasonable to assume that the uncle had in mind the disposition of his personal belongings by will.

Counsel for respondent also relies upon the following testimony of the nephew upon cross-examination:

"Q. And he and you (uncle and nephew) talked it over and went to Mr. Jones' office for the purpose of having the papers drawn up so that in case you should die before he would, that he would still own the property? A. Yes, sir."

It is claimed that, by admitting that it was the understanding that the uncle was "still" to be the owner of the property in the event that the nephew died first, the nephew practically admitted that the intent was that title was to pass to the nephew only upon the uncle's death. This particular excerpt from the testimony, taken alone, might support such an inference, but not so when viewed in the light of all of the facts of the case and the other testimony of this witness.

The inferences attempted to be drawn from the evidence in support of the findings upon which the judgment rests are unreasonable, illogical, and strained, and cannot, therefore, avail to overcome the effect of the delivery of the deed, which the circumstances show to have been made with full knowledge of the legal consequences thereof. Therefore the finding of the trial court on the question of intent, and the judgment based thereon, cannot stand, for "the evidence is so clearly preponderating against the finding as made that it can be said that there is no substantial evidence to sustain it." Williams v. Kidd, supra.

The judgment is reversed.

52 Cal. App. 1

PETERSON v. WAGNER et al.
(Civ. 2263, 2264.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 21, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 19, 1921.)

1. Cancellation of instruments ⊜24(1)—Where plaintiff was damaged by defendant's breach in excess of the amount defendant paid, no restoration is necessary.

The general rule that, in all actions either to rescind or cancel a contract, the party seeking relief must restore to the defendant whatever of value he has paid or given under it, is subject to exception where plaintiff, seeking cancellation of contract for the sale of three seasons' hop crops, was damaged by the defendant's breach in excess of the amount defendant had paid.

2. Equity ⊜66—Maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity does not require offer to do equity by restoring consideration where defendant has caused plaintiff loss greater than amount received.

Although plaintiff's suit to cancel the contract for the sale of hops was neither in tort nor for damages for breach, nevertheless the allegation in the complaint of damages caused by defendant's breach may be considered, and the maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity will be held not applicable where it clearly appears that in the transaction plaintiff has suffered a loss equal to, if not in excess of, any loss defendant has suffered from payments under the contract.

3. Evidence ⊜416—Parol evidence is admissible to prove that three writings constituted one contract.

In view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1856, and Civ. Code, §§ 1625, 1698, 1642, 1647, relating to varying the terms of a written contract by parol testimony, it may be shown by parol evidence that three written contracts for three different seasons' crops were one and the same agreement, where such evidence was not in conflict with the writings.

4. Sales ⊜87(3)—Evidence held to show that three writings for sale of three different years' hop crops constituted but a single contract.

In action to cancel a sale of three seasons' hops, parol evidence held sufficient to support the trial court's finding that the separate contracts for sale of each year's crops constituted but a single indivisible contract for the sale and purchase of hops for three years.

5. Sales ⊜110(2)—Evidence held to show plaintiff damaged in the sum of $9,000 by breach of contract.

In an action to cancel a sale contract for three years' hop crops, evidence held to show that plaintiff seller was damaged in the amount of $9,000 by the defendant's breach of contract for the first year.

6. Sales ⊜92—Evidence held sufficient to show that sale contract was canceled by mutual agreement.

In an action to cancel a contract of sale of crops for three years, evidence including defendant's refusal and failure to make advances as required by the contract held sufficient to support the trial court's finding that the contract was mutually canceled.

7. Sales ⊜174—Buyer's failure to make advancements held not excused.

Where defendant buyer, contracting with plaintiff for purchase of crops of hops for three years, agreed to make advances for the purpose of harvesting the crops, knowing of plaintiff's prior contract with another party for a certain amount of the first year's crop, refused to make an advancement as required, defendant cannot successfully urge that such failure did not violate the contract on the ground that the money might be used to harvest crops for the other buyer, where the contract did not limit the use of advances to crops harvested for defendant.

8. Estoppel ⊜110—Must be pleaded.

In an action to cancel agreement for sale of three years' hop crops, an objection by the assignee of the contract for the two last years that the maxim that, when one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he by whose negligence it happened must suffer, Civ. Code, § 3543, is inapplicable, where estoppel is not pleaded.

9. Estoppel ⊜58—Assignee claiming estoppel held not pecuniarily prejudiced.

In seller's action to cancel a sale agreement which amounted to a mortgage on the crops sold, where an assignment from buyer recites a consideration of $1, the presumption is that that amount was the actual sum paid by the assignee for the assignment, so that the defendant assignee cannot be said to have been pecuniarily prejudiced by the transaction so as to justify estoppel as against seller.

10. Estoppel ⊜118—Acts of seller held not to have misled buyer's assignees so as to create estoppel.

In seller's action to cancel a contract for sale of three seasons' hop crops, which contract was a mortgage thereon, where buyer assigned the contract to other defendants, record held not to show that the assignees had been misled to their prejudice by any act or conduct of the plaintiff, so as to estop plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Paul E. Peterson against C. A. Wagner and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants C. A. Wagner and A. A. Merkeley and Ben F. Hall appeal. Affirmed.

Driver & Driver, of Sacramento, and G. W. Bedeau, of Marysville, for appellants.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an appeal by separate defendants (C. A. Wagner and A. A. Merkeley) and defendant B. F. Hall from a judgment terminating, invalidating, and voiding three written instruments for the purchase of hops for the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, and also for injunctive relief, enjoining and restraining defendants, their agents, attorneys, and assignees from doing any act which would prevent plaintiff from having peaceful possession and enjoyment of the property mentioned in said instruments.

There are two appeals growing out of the same transaction, and presented here upon two separate and distinct records. The appeal in the case we are now considering (No. 2263) is by the defendants Wagner and Merkeley, from the judgment in favor of the plaintiff, and is supported by a transcript of the testimony and proceedings taken at the trial, as authorized by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure. The other appeal (No. 2264) is by defendant Ben F. Hall, from the judgment rendered and entered as against him in favor of plaintiff, and is brought to this court upon a bill of exceptions.

The parties have stipulated that, inasmuch as the legal points involved in both cases are identical, the two appeals may, for the purposes of convenience, be heard together, and that the briefs filed by the respective parties in both cases may be considered in disposing of both appeals.

The agreement between the parties called for the delivery by plaintiff to Wagner of 40,000 pounds of hops for each of the years 1918, 1919, and 1920. The three written instruments evidencing said agreements are identical in form, with the exception that the price agreed to be paid for the hops for the years 1918 and 1919 was 16 cents per pound, while for the 1920 crop of hops 15 cents per pound was the stipulated price. Omitting the preliminary or explanatory provisions of the instruments, we here present the following as the salient terms of the agreement:

"In consideration of the covenants of said seller herein contained, the said buyer agrees to pay to said seller for said hops that are up to the requirements of this contract the sum of 16 cents per pound net upon delivery thereof.

"Should there be any dispute between the parties hereto respecting the quality or condition of any hops tendered hereunder, or as to any fact involved in the performance of this contract, such fact in dispute shall be determined by two competent arbitrators, one of whom shall be selected by each party hereto, and if such arbitrators are unable to agree, they shall select an umpire, and the decision of any two so chosen, as to such fact, shall be conclusive and final. Such arbitrators shall be men experienced in the cultivation, growing, and curing of hops.

"And to assist said seller to cultivate, harvest, and prepare said hops for delivery, as aforesaid, said buyer further agrees to advance to said seller during the year of this agreement, if said seller shall so request, the following sums of money, to wit: $800 on or about the 1st day of March, 1918, $800 on or about the 1st day of May, 1918, for cultivating purposes, and $1,600 on or about the 15th day of August, 1918, for harvesting, curing, and baling purposes.

"All of said moneys so advanced shall, at the time of the delivery of said hops, constitute and be deemed as part payment upon the purchase price thereof. And said sums of money, so advanced as aforesaid, and all other sums that may be advanced, shall bear interest from the date when the same are made, and up to the time of delivery of said hops upon which such advances are made, at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum. Provided, that in the event that said hops are not delivered in accordance with the provisions of this contract, then such advances shall be repayable by said seller to said buyer at the time when such delivery should have been made, and the repayment of such sums and all other obligations of said seller under this contract shall be evidenced by his promissory note or notes, and are secured by a mortgage lien in favor of said buyer upon all of said hops; and this instrument shall and does constitute such mortgage upon said hops in favor of said buyer for the purpose aforesaid, and shall stand as such mortgage and as a contract for the sale of such portion of said hops as are necessary to reimburse said buyer for all sums of money so due to said buyer under this contract. If, however, during the year of this contract, the growing hops herein referred to are not in such condition at the proper season to produce the quantity and quality of hops above specified and agreed upon, then said buyer may give notice in writing to said seller that said buyer will not make any advances or further advances to said seller and in such event said buyer shall be discharged from any obligation to make any advance of any money and if any advances have been made, the same shall be repayable when the above facts are ascertained.

"That said seller shall keep said hops insured at all times for an amount not less than the advances made to him under this contract, insurance policy to be delivered to the buyer, and loss made payable thereunder to the buyer as his interest may appear. If the seller fails to keep said hops insured as above provided, the buyer may insure same, at the expense of the seller, for which purpose the seller hereby constitutes the buyer his authorized agent.

"This agreement shall bind the heirs, devisees, executors, administrators, and assigns of all parties hereto."

The complaint alleges that, although the agreement entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant was evidenced by three separate instruments, said instruments—

"relate to the same matter, are between the same parties, are parts entered into at the same time, and constitute, in fact, one contract; that said instruments are and were not distinct and severable; that the consideration expressed in each of said instruments is and was not distinct and severable; that the consideration entering into each of said instruments was the agreement to buy and sell said hops for said three years as set forth in said three instruments; that the entire consideration for each of said separate instruments is the entire consideration contained in said three separate instruments; that, in pursuance of said contract, plaintiff did plant, cultivate, and raise a crop of hops on the land described in said contract for the year 1918; that said crop so planted and raised on said land, during the year 1918, was in excess of the 40,000 pounds of hops agreed to be furnished under said contract; that said crop of hops was of the kind and quality stipulated in said agreement; that defendant Wagner, in pursuance of said contract, on or about the 1st day of March, 1918, advanced and paid to plaintiff the sum of $800, and on the 1st day of May, 1918, the sum of $800 for cultivating purposes; that said agreement provides that defendant C. A. Wagner, should advance to plaintiff the sum of $1,600 on or about the 15th day of August, 1918, for harvesting, curing, and baling purposes; that said defendant C. A. Wagner advanced to plaintiff, under said contract, the sum of $500 on August 17, 1918, and the sum of $600 on August 31, 1918, for harvesting, curing and baling purposes; that on or about the 31st day of August, 1918, and thereafter until the 15th day of November, 1918, the market price of hops mentioned in said contract was 8 cents per pound; that during all of said time defendant C. A. Wagner refused to advance to plaintiff the sum of $500, or any other sum, or any sum at all, for harvesting, curing, and baling purposes; that on the 31st day of August, 1918, and thereafter until the 15th day of November, 1918, defendant C. A. Wagner continually repudiated said agreement, and refused to carry out or perform any of the terms of conditions thereof; that, on account of the prevailing low market price of said hops, from August 31, 1918, to November 15, 1918, plaintiff was unable to procure money enough to harvest all his crops from any source, and did not have money or other means of harvesting, curing, and baling said crop of hops; that all of said crop of hops was not harvested, and that 450 bales of the same were totally destroyed; that on account of defendant C. A. Wagner's refusal to advance said sum of $500 to plaintiff, plaintiff was unable to harvest all his crop for the year 1918; that during said time plaintiff repeatedly demanded of defendant C. A. Wagner that he advance to him the sum of $500 to allow plaintiff to harvest said crops, but defendant, C. A. Wagner, repeatedly refused to advance said sum of $500, or any other sum at all, for said purpose, and repeatedly repudiated said contract, and repeatedly told plaintiff that plaintiff was released from said contract, and that said contract was at an end; that on account of the refusal of defendant C. A. Wagner to so carry out the terms of said contract, all of said crop of hops was not harvested, and 450 bales of the same were totally lost and destroyed; that said contract was terminated by defendant C. A. Wagner's repudiating the same and the acceptance of said repudiation by plaintiff; that after the signing of the armistice between the allies and their enemies, on or about the 15th day of November, 1918, the market price of hops began to rise, until, on or about the 18th day of December, 1918, the market price of hops mentioned in said agreement was 25 cents per pound; that on or about the 18th day of December, 1918, said defendant C. A. Wagner began to assert and claim that said contract was still in full force and effect; that on the 18th day of December, 1918, said C. A. Wagner had said instrument, relating to the crop of hops for the year 1919, recorded in the county recorder's office of Sacramento county, and that on or about the 24th day of January, 1919, he assigned said instrument, relating to the crop of hops for the year 1919, to defendant Ben F. Hall; that defendant Ben F. Hall has notified plaintiff of said assignment of said contract, and now contends that the same is in full force and effect, and that plaintiff is obligated to deliver the hops mentioned in said instrument to him; that each of said defendants now claim that said instrument, relating to the crop of hops for the years 1919 and 1920, is in full force and effect. It is further alleged that said instruments, relating to the crops of hops for the years 1919 and 1920, now constitute a cloud and an incumbrance upon plaintiff's crops for said years, and that the same, unless canceled and annulled by a decree of the court, will hinder and annoy plaintiff in the peaceable possession and enjoyment of said crops of hops for said years, and that they do now hinder, delay, and prevent plaintiff from contracting for the sale of said hops for said years, or of selling or disposing of the same. The prayer is for a judgment declaring said agreement terminated and canceled, and that said instruments, relating to said crops of hops for 1919 and 1920, be declared null and void, and that defendants, and each of them, their agents, attorneys, successors, and assigns, be restrained and enjoined from attempting to enforce either of said instruments or assert the validity of the same, or to transfer the same."

It further appears from the pleadings that prior to the time of the execution of the three instruments just referred to the plaintiff had contracted to sell to Wm. Uhlmann & Co. 300 bales of hops, or about 60,000 pounds of the crop of 1918 to be grown on the said premises, which contract was made prior to the contract for 40,000 pounds of the 1918 crop before the court in this action, and constituted a prior obligation; that on the 20th day of February, 1918, the date of the execution of the three contracts, the defendant Wagner sold and assigned, by an instrument in writing, the contract for the sale and purchase of the crop for the year 1918 to Harry Fraser; that on the 20th day of January, 1919, said Wagner sold and assigned by an instrument in writing the contract for the sale and purchase of the crop of the year 1919 to defendant B.

F. Hall; that on January 16, 1919, said Wagner sold and assigned by an instrument in writing the contract for the sale and purchase of the crop of the year 1920 to the defendant A. A. Merkeley. It appears that Mr. Fraser, the purchaser of the 1918 crop, did not desire to have his name known in the transaction, and, accordingly, the advances of of money to assist the plaintiff in cultivating and harvesting his crop as called for by the contract for the 1918 crop were made by defendant Wagner with funds furnished for that purpose by Fraser.

The separate demurrers of the defendants Wagner, Hall, and Merkeley were overruled by the court, whereupon the said defendants filed answers denying generally the material allegations of the complaint, and asking that said contracts for the years 1919 and 1920, respectively, be adjudged "good, valid, existing, independent, and separate contracts," etc., and that the same should constitute valid liens upon the lands involved for said 1919 and 1920 crops, and for costs.

Upon a trial of the issues involved, the court made its findings of fact and conclusions of law, the latter being as follows:

(1) "That the contracts set out in plaintiff's complaint, and marked as Exhibits A, B, and C, were one entire contract; that the same were terminated by the breach and refusal of defendant Wagner to perform the same, and plaintiff's election to treat said breach as a termination of said contract; that the same were terminated by plaintiff and defendant Wagner mutually agreeing that the same should be and were terminated; that the same are now terminated, and invalid, and of no force and effect, and have no existence; (2) that the assertion by defendants of the validity of said contract and the claim of defendant to have an interest in the crop of hops mentioned in said contract for the year 1919 and 1920 prevents plaintiff from contracting to sell, or to sell, said hops for said years, and prevents plaintiff from peaceably enjoying and holding said property."

Judgment was ordered accordingly.

The appellants contend: (1) That the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that therein the plaintiff does not state that he is ready to and does restore and offer to restore to defendants the advances made to him by the defendant Wagner according to the terms of the contract; (2) that the court erred in holding that the several written instruments constituted a single contract or involved a single transaction. In this connection, it is further contended that the court erred in admitting evidence of a parol contemporaneous agreement of the parties as to the scope and effect of the three written instruments—that is, that parol testimony was incompetent to prove that the intention of the parties, unexpressed in the writings, was that the said writings were interdependent, and were to evidence the terms of a single contract relating to a single transaction, the effect of said testimony being to change or modify the terms of a written agreement; (3) that the failure of Fraser and Wagner to make the further advance of $500, mentioned in the complaint, did not constitute or involve a breach of the contract; (4) that defendant Hall was a purchaser for value without notice; (5) that there was no mutual cancellation of the contract as found by the court; (6) that findings 18 and 19 are not supported by the evidence. These findings are as follows:

18. "That defendant Wagner refused to perform said contract by his failure to advance $500 to plaintiff; that said $500 would have enabled plaintiff to have harvested the remainder of his crop; that plaintiff was unable to secure said $500, or any other sum, from any other source, and by reason thereof was unable to harvest the remainder of his crop, and 450 bales of the same (about 90,000 pounds) was totally lost and destroyed to plaintiff; that, by reason of defendant Wagner's breach of said contract, plaintiff suffered damages, and was and is damaged in the sum of $9,000."

19. "That prior to and at the time of the termination of said contract, plaintiff had performed all the terms and conditions thereof to be done and performed on his part, and was then and there ready, able, and willing to perform said contract on his part."

The contract involved in this controversy is not only one for the sale of the hops produced by plaintiff in the years 1918, 1919, and 1920, but also, by its express terms, constitutes a mortgage of said crops to secure the payment by plaintiff to Wagner of the sums advanced by the latter to the former according to the terms of the agreement.

The complaint alleges that Wagner promised and agreed to make certain advances to plaintiff for the purpose of enabling the latter to harvest the crops; that he (Wagner), after making certain advances which were short by $500 of the maximum amount which he agreed to advance, refused to advance said mentioned sum to plaintiff, and so repudiated the agreement; that, by reason of such refusal, the plaintiff was prevented from harvesting all the hops growing on his premises in the year 1918, and that he thereby lost 450 bales. It is alleged that Wagner repeatedly refused to advance said sum of $500 and repeatedly told plaintiff that he (plaintiff) was released from said contract, and that said contract was at an end, etc. From these allegations it is clear that the complaint proceeded upon the theory that there was a mutual renunciation of the agreement to sell and buy the hops, and therefore the principal object of this action was to obtain a decree removing the mortgage lien from the crops for the years covered by the agreement. It was necessary, of course, as a prerequisite to such relief, to have the contract declared void, and for that reason canceled and annulled, and this, as alleged, upon the ground that Wagner had repudiated or abandoned the contract, entailing upon the plaintiff the loss mentioned.

[1, 2] It is undoubtedly the general rule that, in all actions either to rescind or cancel a contract, the party seeking the relief must restore to the defendant whatever of value he has paid or given under it, or, in other words, the defendant must be by plaintiff restored to statu quo. Sullivan v. California Realty Co., 142 Cal. 201, 204, 75 Pac. 767. This rule follows from the equitable principle that he who seeks equity must do equity, and that upon that principle no one will be permitted to hold that which he has secured from another under a contract whose force he is seeking to destroy while it is still executory, unless he can show by his pleading and his proof that there are equitable circumstances in the case which would justify him in retaining whatever of value he has received under the contract from the other party or, in rendering it not requisite, that he should restore the other party to statu quo. In this case, however, the complaint shows that the defendant Wagner refused to live up to the terms of the contract, and this amounted to an abandonment thereof. The plaintiff seems to have acquiesced in Wagner's breach of the agreement, for he has not sued for damages for the breach, or attempted to enforce the terms of the agreement. He has proceeded upon the theory, well justified, that there was a mutual abandonment, which amounted to a rescission—indeed, the only way that a rescission may be effected by the act of the parties themselves, since the mere abandonment of the contract by one of the parties and refusal to proceed therewith cannot constitute a rescission, although such act is a ground for an action for rescission. Standing on the abandonment of the contract by Wagner and his own acquiescence therein, the plaintiff merely seeks by his complaint to secure a cancellation of the agreement, to the end that the embarrassment incident to the lien upon his crops for the years embraced in the contract and the mortgage may be removed.

But there are exceptions to the general rule that the party against whom the remedy of rescission is invoked must be restored to statu quo before the relief sought will be granted. Some of these exceptions are given in Kelley v. Owens, 120 Cal. 502, 47 Pac. 369, 52 Pac. 797, and among them is the case where, without fault of plaintiff, there have been peculiar complications which make it impossible, or not imperative, for plaintiff to offer full restoration, although the circumstances are such that a court of chancery may by a final decree fully adjust the equities between the parties. See Richards v. Farmers', etc., Bank, 7 Cal. App. 387, 393, 394, 94 Pac. 393.

While it is true, as stated, that the plaintiff does not sue in tort or for damages for the breach of the contract, we may, nevertheless, consider the allegation in the complaint that he did suffer damage by reason of the violation of the contract by Wagner for the purpose of determining the equities of the case. The maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity does not apply where, as here, it is made clearly to appear in the complaint that, in the transaction as to which relief is sought, the plaintiff, by reason of the abandonment of the contract by the defendant, has suffered a loss equal to, if not in excess of, any loss which the defendant has suffered, or would suffer, from the transaction if restoration to the latter of what he has parted with has not been made. The allegation that the act of Wagner in renouncing the contract had cost plaintiff 450 bales of hops, on account of his inability to harvest them by reason of Wagner's refusal to advance the $500, as agreed, while not direct as to the extent of his loss when measured in money, clearly enough shows, when considered in connection with the contract (which is made a part of the complaint), that the loss so suffered by him is far in excess of the sums advanced to him by Wagner. Under these circumstances, it was not necessary for the plaintiff to restore or offer to restore to the defendants the sums advanced him by Wagner to entitle him to the relief he, by his action, asks for, whether the remedy he invokes be either that of rescission or that of cancellation.

In this connection, we may with propriety further observe that the evidence does not call for the application of the equitable principle above mentioned. As above stated, the manifest object of plaintiff's action was to get rid of the mortgage lien upon his crops for the years covered by the mortgage. The court found, upon what we believe to be sufficient evidence, that the plaintiff, by reason of the failure of Wagner to complete the advancements he agreed to make to plaintiff and further, because of the failure of plaintiff to secure from any other source the sum of $500, the latter suffered the loss of 450 bales, or 90,000 pounds of hops, and that the damage so suffered by plaintiff amounted in money to the sum of $9,000. It is manifest, therefore, that, while it is true that plaintiff's action is, in effect, one to quiet title to the mortgaged crops, the equitable principle referred to, which is undoubtedly applicable in all cases to quiet title where the circumstances thereof make it appropriate (see Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 276, 17 Pac. 225) is not, upon the evidence, applicable here.

[3] The next point to which attention will be given is that the court erred in allowing parol testimony for the purpose of explaining that the three instruments involved herein were understood and intended by Peterson and Wagner to constitute a single contract respecting a single transaction. The contention of the defendants is, as has been shown, that the three several instruments were not interdependent or indivisible, but involved three distinct independent contracts, the one having no relation to or connection with the other. This, it is contended, appears from the face of the writings themselves, and hence, so it is argued, the effect of the allowance of parol testimony for the purpose above stated was to vary or modify the terms of said instruments by parol. The importance of this point is, as is obvious, that, even if the agreement as to the crop for 1918 was breached by Wagner, such breach could not effect or nullify the agreement as to the crops for the years 1919 and 1920.

The rule that the terms of a written contract cannot be changed or varied by parol testimony or evidence extrinsic to the writing itself is elementary. It has been expressly adopted into our system of laws, and is embraced in a number of sections of our codes, one of which is section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Expressly is it therein provided that "when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms," and therefore neither the parties to such agreement nor their representatives or successors in interest can introduce evidence of the terms of the agreement other than the contents of the writing, except:

"(1) Where a mistake or imperfection of the writing is put in issue by the pleadings; (2) where the validity of the agreement is the fact in dispute."

But said section contains this qualification:

"But this section does not exclude other evidence of the circumstances under which the agreement was made, or to which it relates, as defined in section 1860, or to explain an extrinsic ambiguity, or to establish illegality or fraud."

The Civil Code (section 1625) also lays down a familiar rule relative to written agreements as follows:

"The execution of a contract in writing, whether the law requires it to be written or not, supersedes all the negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument."

Section 1698 of the last-named Code further provides:

"A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise."

It is the provisions of the foregoing sections which appellants insist were offended by the allowance of the parol testimony referred to. This theory is founded on a misconception of the effect of the testimony upon the writings in question. The testimony, the legal propriety of which is here challenged, cannot justly be held to have had the effect of varying or changing in any particular or in any sense the terms of the written instruments. The essential or vital terms of the latter were that the plaintiff would sell a certain specified number of pounds of the hops produced by him in each of the years mentioned in said instruments at a specified price to be paid by the buyer, and that Wagner would advance to plaintiff certain sums of money to be used in cultivating and harvesting the crops for the years covered by the agreement. It is obvious that the testimony objected to had no bearing whatever upon the terms of the agreement. The simple question was whether the three instruments were intended by the parties to constitute one, or a single contract. Upon their face they appeared to represent three distinct or several contracts, but the plaintiff, in his complaint, in effect alleged that they were intended and understood by and between him and Wagner, before and at the time of their execution, to represent one single transaction, and one single contract, and that it was that specific understanding and agreement that moved him to enter into the contract with Wagner upon the terms therein expressed; that, in brief, it formed part of the consideration inducing him to enter into the contract.

Section 1642 of the Civil Code declares:

"Several contracts relating to the same matters, between the same parties, and made as parts of substantially one transaction, are to be taken together."

Section 1647 of the same Code provides:

"A contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates."

Jones on Evidence (vol. 3, by Horwitz, § 439) declares this to be the rule:

"The general rule is not violated by allowing parol evidence to be given of the contents of a distinct valid contemporaneous agreement between parties which was not reduced to writing, when the same is not in conflict with the provisions of the written instrument."

Again, the same author (pages 178, 179, § 439, of the same volume) states the rule in this fashion:

"The law is that agreements or representations made prior to the written contract under which the party was induced to sign the contract may be shown; in other words, where the parol contemporaneous agreement was the inducing and moving cause of the written contract, or where the parol agreement forms part of the consideration for a written contract, and where the written contract was executed upon the faith of the parol contract or representations, such evidence is admissible."

The books contain many cases in which the principles above stated have been applied. Indeed, in the case of Torrey v. Shea,

29 Cal. App. 316, 155 Pac. 820, in which the opinion was prepared by Mr. Justice Lennon, then a member of the Court of Appeal of the First district, but now of the Supreme Court, we have a concrete application of the rule recognizing the legal propriety of, as well as the necessity for, the allowance of parol testimony as in aid of the ascertainment of the real intention of the parties to a written contract, where the same is itself characterized by more or less obscurity in that particular, or where it is otherwise made to appear that the real intent of the instrument cannot be made known except by proof of a contemporaneous parol agreement. Like the case here, the action in that case involved a contract for the sale and purchase of hops produced by the plaintiff for three successive years. The contract, as here, was made into three different instruments, each covering a different one of the three years included in the agreement. The parties to the action in that case occupied, as litigants, positions reverse to those of the parties in the case at bar, the seller having breached the agreement by refusing to deliver the hops to the buyer thereof as agreed. The latter, as plaintiff, maintained, as does the plaintiff here, that the three instruments constituted a single contract, or but one transaction, and that such was the intention as was made manifest in their oral negotiations accompanying and directly resulting in the execution of the contract. The trial court in that case ruled—

"That the defendants were entitled to show by parol evidence that the three instruments were intended and executed by the parties thereto to cover but one transaction, and that the controlling consideration for the execution of the particular writing in suit, contracting for the delivery of hops during the year 1911, was the contemporaneous execution of two other instruments calling for similar deliveries in the years 1909 and 1910."

The appellate court, upholding the ruling of the trial court, with clearness expounds the rule sanctioning, under such circumstances as were existent in that case, and as are present in the instant case, parol proof of contemporaneous oral agreement disclosing the intention of the parties as to whether two or more writings, apparently independent of each other, were to constitute a single transaction. Indeed, so much is said in the opinion that applies with singular cogency to the question in hand, that the temptation to reproduce herein an extensive excerpt therefrom is difficult to resist; yet to do so would extend this opinion to a much greater length than is desirable, and we shall, therefore, content ourselves by a mere reference to the case. It should be stated, however, that the Supreme Court denied a hearing of the case, and later, in the case of Merkeley v. Fisk, 179 Cal. 748, 178 Pac. 945, cited Torrey v. Shea upon the very proposition discussed in the latter case, and it is sufficient to make the following excerpt from the later case named:

"Obviously, the most certain criterion of the completeness of an individual writing will be found within the writing itself. It is therefore the general rule that two or more separately executed instruments may be considered and construed as one contract only when, upon their face, they deal with the same subject-matter, and are by reference to one another so connected that they may be fairly said to be interdependent. Of course, this rule is not so rigid as to be absolutely unyielding in the face of a suggestion contained in the writing itself that it is not complete, or of circumstances which call for the application of a well-defined exception to the rule that 'a contract may be explained by reference to the circumstances under which it was made, and the matter to which it relates.' Civ. Code, § 1647. This is so, we apprehend, because, while ordinarily the subject-matter and identity of the parties to several instruments will be disclosed by a reference to the instruments themselves, nevertheless, 'the question of whether or not several instruments between the same parties were * * * intended * * * to cover a single transaction ofttimes cannot be ascertained from an inspection of the instruments themselves, and, consequently, if the intention of the parties be either not expressed or doubtfully expressed, resort may be had to extrinsic evidence which will show the circumstances under which the several instruments were made for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the parties concerning the scope and effect of the several instruments' "—citing Torrey v. Shea, supra.

See the very recent case of Stern v. Sunset Road Oil Co. et al., 190 Pac. 651, holding that the intention of the parties is the determining factor in the ascertainment of whether a contract evidenced by several or separate writings is or is not divisible. See, also, upon the same proposition, Richter v. Union Land & Stock Co., 129 Cal. 367, 62 Pac. 39; Sterling v. Gregory, 149 Cal. 117, 120, 85 Pac. 305; Los Angeles Gas & Elec. Co. v. Amal. Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 779, 106 Pac. 55.

While the precise question before us was not, as we judge from the opinion therein, before the court in Sterling v. Gregory, supra, nevertheless, the court (Mr. Justice Sloss writing the opinion) used this significant language:

"It must be remembered that the question whether a contract is entire or whether its various stipulations are to be regarded as severable is a question of construction. The court seeks to determine the intent of the parties from a consideration of all the circumstances surrounding the making of the contract."

In that case, Judge Sloss approves the following from Wooten v. Walters, 110 N. C. 251, 14 S. E. 734, 736, characterizing it as a sound statement of the rule:

"A contract is entire, and not severable, when by its terms, nature, and purpose it contemplates and intends that each and all of its parts, material provisions, and the consideration, are common each to the other and interdependent. * * * On the other hand, a severable contract is one in its nature and purpose susceptible of division and apportionment, having two or more parts, in respect to matters and things contemplated and embraced by it, not necessarily dependent upon each other, nor is it intended by the parties that they shall be. * * * It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the contract is entire or severable in such cases, and there is great diversity of decisions on the subject, but on the whole, the weight of opinion, and the more reasonable rule would seem to be that where there is a purchase of different articles at different prices at the same time, the contract would be severable as to each article, unless the taking of the whole was rendered essential either by the nature of the subject-matter or by the act of the parties. This rule makes the interpretation of the contract depend on the intention of the parties as manifested by their acts and the circumstances of each particular case."

How all the "circumstances surrounding the making of the contract," or the acts of the parties "and the circumstances of each particular case," other than the mere act of executing the contract, and the "circumstances" as exhibited by the writing itself, may be shown otherwise than by evidence extrinsic to the writing itself, it would, indeed, be difficult to point out.

Counsel for appellants contend, however, that the case of Torrey v. Shea is different, and therefore to be differentiated, from the present case, in that the complaint of the plaintiffs in the former specifically pleaded a collateral contemporaneous agreement to the effect that the several instruments there involved should constitute but a single and indivisible contract covering a single transaction, etc., whereas, so it is likewise asserted, the complaint in the instant case pleads no such agreement. Counsel for appellant Hall proceed in their brief: "The court, under the issue raised in the Torrey-Shea Case, quite properly, in our opinion, admitted the testimony of the defendants to establish the parol agreement alleged. * * * The evidence in Torrey v. Shea was directed to an issue raised upon allegations made in the amended answer of defendants, in accordance with which allegations the court properly found, and which findings were sustained by the evidence," while in the case at bar, having alleged no contemporaneous agreement, the plaintiff "sought rather, so it appears from the complaint, to rely upon a construction of the contracts." With this concession, so far as appellant Hall is concerned, the point sought to be maintained is surrendered, if it may justly be said that the complaint does tender an issue upon the question of the making of such an agreement, and we think, as before suggested, that it sufficiently does so, in view of the silence of the instruments themselves upon that proposition, in the allegations—

"That said separate instruments for each year are and were not distinct and severable; that the consideration expressed in each of said separate instruments is and was not distinct and severable; that the consideration entering into each of said separate instruments was the agreement to buy and sell said hops for said three years as set forth in said instruments." Paragraph 3, supra.

We have carefully examined the cases cited by counsel for the respective appellants as supporting their position that it was error to permit proof of the parol collateral agreement in question, and we find none of them in point. Nothing can be gained by reviewing those cases herein. It will be sufficient to say that in all the cases of those cited in which an attempt was made by evidence de hors the writings themselves to add to them some term or terms not expressed or provided therein, or to vary or change the terms of the instruments themselves, it was with eminent propriety held that to permit testimony having that effect would involve a violation of the rule interdicting the modification of the terms of a written agreement by parol. But, as pointed out in the outset of this discussion, that is not this case. The evidence offered and received here was not for the purpose of varying the terms of the instruments, nor could it have that effect. The vital terms of the agreement, as stated above, were the agreement to sell the crops produced by plaintiff for the years and at the prices therein mentioned, and the agreement of Wagner to make certain specified advancements to plaintiff to enable him to cultivate and harvest the crops. As to these terms, the instruments themselves, upon their face, were couched in such terms as to import a complete legal obligation, and not characterized by any uncertainty as to the object and extent of the engagement. Of course, as to those vital terms, it is to be presumed that the whole engagement of the plaintiff and Wagner, and the extent and manner of their undertaking, are embodied in the writings. Seitz v. Brewer's R. M. Co., 141 U. S. 510, 12 Sup. Ct. 46, 35 L. Ed. 837; 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 275; Jones on Evidence, § 439.

The evidence objected to here, however, as before pointed out, was intended merely as in aid of the solution of the question, not whether the terms of the agreement as expressed in the writings themselves were or were not what the parties agreed that they should be, but whether (the instruments being silent as to that matter) it was or was not the intention of the parties that the subject-matter of the three separate writings should involve or relate to and cover but a single transaction, and the instruments themselves were to constitute a single contract, and, also to show whether the fact of making a three-year indivisible contract was or was not the controlling reason (not the consideration he was to receive for the hops under the agreement to sell and deliver the same to Wagner) which induced him to enter into the agreement to sell the hops for the consideration expressed in the written instruments; in other words, whether, but for the agreement that the contract should be a single one, and indivisible for the three years' crops, he would have entered into the contract at all for the sale of the hops on the terms expressed in the three instruments.

[4] It is deemed appropriate to consider in this connection whether the testimony allowed under the ruling last above considered is sufficient to support the finding that the parol contemporaneous agreement referred to was entered into or had between plaintiff and Wagner. The appellants contend that it was not.

The plaintiff testified that, in the first conversation with Wagner, which was held over the telephone, the latter proposed to him (plaintiff) a contract for one year's crop, to which plaintiff demurred, saying that he would not enter into such a contract unless it embraced the crops for three years. This conversation occurred two or three days prior to the day on which the three instruments were executed. Subsequently, Wagner again called plaintiff on the phone and said: "I have something else for you; we have an offer that might interest you." The plaintiff asked for the nature of the new offer, and Wagner replied: "I have two more years' offer. We have 15 and 16 cents." The following morning plaintiff and Wagner, by prearrangement, met at a business house in the city of Sacramento. Plaintiff then stated to Wagner that he wanted 16 cents per pound for his hops for three years, but Wagner was willing to offer 15 cents per pound. Plaintiff thereupon offered to enter into a contract for three years upon the basis of 16 cents per pound for the first and second years and 15 cents for the third year, to which proposition Wagner assented. Wagner thereupon proceeded to prepare the agreement upon the stereotyped printed forms generally used by hop buyers for such contracts, and, observing that he was making out a separate contract for each year covered by their agreement, the plaintiff said to the former: "Mr. Wagner, this is a three-year deal," to which Wagner explained that the form of contract he had was not large enough to insert "all the dates, different prices, for the different years. While," continued Wagner, "this is a three-year deal, we will put them on different forms for convenience sake." With this understanding—that is, that it was to be a "three-year deal"—the plaintiff consented, for the sake of convenience, to have the agreement evidenced by the three instruments.

This testimony very clearly and plainly tends to show that the parties entered into the written engagement with the distinct understanding, and under an agreement, that the transaction should and was to be regarded as one, and the three instruments as evidence of a single, indivisible contract. The trial court, therefore, having accepted said testimony as revealing the truth of the transaction in that particular, was warranted in making the finding that the transaction involved but a single, indivisible contract for the sale and purchase of the hops for three years.

[5] It is not necessary to present herein the testimony upon which the court predicated findings 18 and 19. It is enough to state that an examination of said testimony has convinced us that from it the court was authorized, in the exercise of its discretion as to the weight or evidentiary value of the testimony, to conclude as a matter of fact that the failure or refusal of Wagner to advance the $500 involved a refusal by him to perform the contract; that said sum, if advanced as agreed, would have enabled the plaintiff to harvest the remainder of the crop; that plaintiff, although making an effort to do so, was unable to secure from any other source the loan of $500, to be used in harvesting the remainder of the crop; and that, as a result thereof, 450 bales of hops were destroyed and lost by reason of having been required to remain on the vines, and unharvested; that the detriment thereby sustained by plaintiff amounted in damages to the sum of $9,000; that, before and at the time that Wagner refused to further advance $500, the plaintiff had performed all the terms and conditions of the contract to be done and performed by him, and was ready, able, and willing to perform said contract on his part. Of course, the latter finding must be considered with the other findings, and, as so construed, must be held to mean that plaintiff was ready to perform his part of the contract upon a performance by Wagner of the terms of the covenant of the agreement as to advances.

[6] The finding that there was a mutual cancellation of the contract by the parties derives support from the testimony of the plaintiff that after demanding from Wagner the $500 referred to on several different occasions, on each of which Wagner stated to plaintiff that he (Wagner) could not raise that sum, the two met, when plaintiff thus addressed Wagner: "Mr. Wagner, if you do not give me that $500, that breaks the contract," to which Wagner replied: "I know it does. I cannot raise the money. I cannot help it—hops are very cheap, anyhow." Later (in the month of September) plaintiff met Wagner, when this conversation took place between them:

Wagner: "Hello, Paul; I hear you are going to bring suit against me."

Plaintiff: "Well, I ought to. I lost three or four hundred bales on your account, breaking this contract."

Wagner: "Do so, by all means. I want you to bring suit against me. I know you lost quite a number of bales."

The plaintiff continued:

"It was some time in September (1918). I do not know exactly when. I met him [Wagner] at Faust and McGinnis saloon. * * * I asked Mr. Wagner about the other two contracts. He says: 'They are a dead issue. They canceled themselves.'" (It may here be suggested that Wagner's statement to plaintiff that he wanted the latter to bring suit against him [Wagner] may be accounted for by the fact that, prior to the above-mentioned conversation, Wagner had formally assigned the contract to Fraser, who, as seen, was the real vendee in the contract of sale, Wagner having acted for Fraser in the making of the contract, and the latter having actually furnished the money for the advances provided for.)

As heretofore stated, the plaintiff made no move looking to an enforcement of the contract, and did not, and has not, asked for damages for its breach. His present action marked the first step he took respecting the broken engagement, and this move was made only after it was made known to him that Wagner, after there was a rise in the price of hops, assigned the different instruments constituting evidence of the agreement and thus indicated that he intended to maintain that the agreement still existed, and imposed a valid and binding obligation upon the plaintiff. From the testimony and the other considerations thus adverted to, we do not doubt but that the court was well within the evidence in finding that the contract was mutually canceled by the parties.

[7] The point that the refusal by Wagner to advance the said $500 did not constitute a breach of the agreement is founded upon the following situation: The plaintiff, as has already been shown, had, prior to the making of the contract with Wagner, entered into a similar contract with a hop-buying firm known as Uhlmann & Co., whereby he was to sell and deliver to said firm approximately 60,000 pounds of the 1918 crop. This contract was, of course, prior in right to the Wagner contract, and the latter was entered into by Wagner with full knowledge of that fact. It is contended that the evidence shows that the moneys already advanced to plaintiff under the Wagner contract were used, and that the $500 which defendant Wagner refused to advance would also be used in harvesting the hops which were sold and to be delivered to Uhlmann & Co., and that plaintiff was not entitled under the Wagner contract to the further advance of $500 to be used for that purpose. It is hence argued that the refusal by Wagner to advance said sum of $500 did not involve a violation of the Wagner contract.

There is no merit in the point or the argument. As stated, Wagner, when he entered into the contract with plaintiff, knew of the existence of the Uhlmann contract, and was presumably familiar with its terms. He did not, therefore, enter into the engagement with plaintiff under any misapprehension or in ignorance of the situation as it was created by the Uhlmann contract. Moreover, there is no express provision in his contract with plaintiff requiring the moneys he agreed to advance to the latter to be exclusively used in harvesting the portion of the hops that were to be delivered to him, and there is nothing in the terms of the agreement justifying the implication that such was the understanding. The agreement merely provides in general language that the defendant should advance to plaintiff a specified maximum sum of money for the purpose of enabling the latter to cultivate and harvest the hops to be produced by him, and in view of the fact that Wagner, when he made the agreement with plaintiff, had knowledge of the existence of the Uhlmann agreement, and its priority over his agreement, would seem to warrant the implication that the agreement to make the advances was made with the intention that the moneys so advanced should and would be used in harvesting plaintiff's entire crop for 1918.

[8, 9] It is lastly contended that the defendants Hall and Merkeley purchased and paid a valuable consideration for the contract in question without knowledge of the parol collateral agreement referred to, and it is insisted that as to them the rule or maxim, "When one of two innocent persons must suffer by the act of a third, he, by whose negligence it happened, must be the sufferer" (Civ. Code, § 3543), is to be applied. The contention, manifestly, involves the claim of an estoppel in pais as against the plaintiff.

There are several distinct answers to the proposition. The first is that estoppel is not pleaded by either Hall or Merkeley, and "it is, therefore, not properly in the case." Napa Val. Pkg. Co. v. S. F., etc., Funds, 16 Cal. App. 461, 466, 118 Pac. 469, 470; Chapman v. Hughes, 134 Cal. 641, 58 Pac. 298, 60 Pac. 974, 66 Pac. 982. Again, as to defendant Hall, it is to be observed that the assignment to him recites that the consideration therefor was the sum of $1, and the presumption is that that amount was the actual sum paid by him for the assignment. 13 Cyc. 613; Devlin on Deeds, § 817; Kinsell v. Thomas, 18 Cal. App. 683, 692, 124 Pac.

220. Indeed, it was admitted and stipulated by Hall that $1 only was the amount which was paid by him to Wagner for the assignment. Obviously, Hall cannot be said to have been "pecuniarily prejudiced" by the transaction, even if it were true that he was lured into purchasing Wagner's rights under the contract through the negligence or conduct of the plaintiff.

[10] The assignment to Merkeley, however, does not, save in general terms, state the consideration therefor, it merely reciting, "for a good and sufficient consideration;" and no doubt the presumption would be, in such case, that the consideration was a valuable one. But, assuming that the estoppel has been by pleading properly introduced into the case, the whole question is whether said defendants were induced to enter into the transaction through any act or words or conduct or negligence of the plaintiff. The findings and the evidence upon which they were predicated disclose, as has been shown, that the defendant Wagner broke the contract, repudiated it, and refused to proceed with it, and that the plaintiff did nothing towards compelling its enforcement until Wagner later made the assignments in question.

What else could the plaintiff have done but to sue for damages for the breach of the contract, if he had elected to stand upon it? He merely treated Wagner's renunciation of the contract as a termination of it, and allowed the matter thus to stand until Wagner undertook to revive it. There is no testimony of any acts or words of his indicating that he regarded or intended to treat it as a binding obligation after Wagner refused to proceed with it. If the agreement had been recorded, or was of record at the time of its breach and repudiation by Wagner, and plaintiff had failed to take steps before the execution of the assignments in question to have it canceled or annulled because of the termination thereof, then a different question might be presented. But at the time of the breach of the agreement none of the instruments evidencing its terms had been, or was, of record, and, presumably, in view of that fact, and his acquiescence in the termination of the contract by Wagner, the plaintiff intended to allow the transaction to stand that way, and to treat the entire contract, as Wagner expressed it, as "a dead issue."

We cannot see how it can be successfully maintained upon this record how Hall and Merkeley could have been misled to their prejudice, or at all, by any act or conduct of plaintiff. On the other hand, it seems to be clear that they themselves were negligent when entering into the transaction. The fact that the contract and mortgage (that is, the instrument covering the 1919 crop) which was executed on the 20th day of February, 1918, was not recorded until December 18, 1918, and the only one of the three several writings that was recorded, was sufficient to put Hall and Merkeley upon inquiry as to the status of the engagement between Wagner and plaintiff. They did not receive their respective assignments until January, 1919, and being, as the record shows, hop raisers and buyers, it would seem that so important a circumstance as a failure to record a contract, which also operated as a mortgage, for so long a period would at once have suggested to their minds the necessity for a full inquiry into the transaction between plaintiff and Wagner before purchasing and paying for Wagner's rights therein; and had they done so, they certainly would have learned of the true situation as to said transaction, and thus have saved themselves whatever of damage or detriment they may now be required to suffer. But, at any rate, even if it were true that a lack of diligence cannot be imputed to Hall and Merkeley, it is plain that, if they have been imposed upon to their pecuniary detriment in the transaction, it was due to no conduct or negligence of the plaintiff, but rather to the failure of their assignor to reveal to them, before executing to them the assignments, the true state of affairs between the latter and plaintiff, as it is to be gathered from the evidence and the findings.

There are some other points involving certain rulings of the court upon evidence which, after a careful consideration thereof, we have concluded are not of sufficient importance to require special notice thereof herein.

PETERSON v. WAGNER et al. (Civ. 2263.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. March 21, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Paul E. Peterson against C. A. Wagner and others, to terminate, invalidate, and avoid certain written instruments, and for an injunction. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. Finlaw Geary, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Thomas B. Leeper, of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. On the stipulation of the parties to this appeal, and those to the appeal in Peterson v. Wagner & Merkeley, Civ. 2264, 198 Pac. 25, the two appeals were considered together, so far as the points urged for a reversal are concerned. We have this day filed an opinion in Civ. 2264, affirming the judgment. In said opinion, in accordance with the stipulation mentioned, we have considered and disposed of all the points raised on both appeals which we conceived required special consideration adversely to the appellants in both appeals. Accordingly, upon the authority of Peterson v. Wagner & Merkeley et al. (Civ. 2264) 198 Pac. 25, the judgment in Civ. 2263, Peterson v. Wagner & Hall et al., is affirmed.

KLAFFKI v. KAUFFMAN et al. (Civ. 3098.)

1. Master and servant ⟸83 — Allegation of place of contract essential to recovery of penalty for nonpayment of wages.

A servant's right to penalty under St. 1911, p. 1268, § 3, as amended by Acts 1915, p. 299, for nonpayment of wages sued for, is purely statutory, and he must allege and prove that the services were contracted for or were performed in or at least were payable in this state, or, if they were not, that they were contracted for or were performed in a state having a similar statute.

2. Master and servant ⟸83 — Penalty for withholding wages depends upon law of place of contract.

St. 1911, p. 1268, § 3, amended by St. 1915, p. 299, affords the employee two remedies, each of which is for the vindication of a distinct, substantive right, namely the common-law remedy for breach of the employer's contract to pay the agreed wage when due, the statutory remedy for vindication of a statutory wrong, to wit, the penalty allowed for the withholding of wages, and, though the penalty appertains to the remedy, the right thereto depends upon the laws of the state of employment and discharge.

3. Evidence ⟸80(1)—Presumption that statutory law of another state is the same as our own does not extend to the matter of penalty.

While in the absence of proof to the contrary the law of another state will be presumed to be the same as our own, and this presumption extends to statutory as well as common law, yet there is the exception that the presumption of similarity of statutory enactment will not be indulged where the law of the forum imposes a penalty such as that for withholding wages due.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1172(5)—Where judgment is in lump sum, it may be reversed in toto, though it was in part correct.

Upon an appeal in a case where servant has recovered for both unpaid wages and penalty thereon and the recovery of wages is not contested, but the case must be reversed because the pleadings will not support the recovery of penalty by showing the case within the statute of this state or a similar statute of some other state or country, though the retrial be thus limited, the judgment may be reversed in toto because it is for one lump sum.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Roy H. Klaffki against Angela G. Kauffman and others for wages. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

C. O. Whittemore, J. R. Whittemore, Paul W. Schenck, and Richard Kittrelle, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

William J. Palmer, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an action brought by plaintiff upon his own claim and certain claims assigned to him by his fellow laborers to recover wages due for work performed for defendants. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. The evidence is not before us; the appeal being on the judgment roll alone.

[1] The action was to recover not only the wages of the men, but also the penalty provided by the act entitled "An act providing for the payment of wages," approved May 1, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 1268), as amended by the act approved April 28, 1915 (Stats. 1915, p. 299), section 3 whereof reads:

"In the event that any employer shall fail to pay, without abatement or deduction, within five days after the same shall become due under the provisions of section one of this act, any wages of any employee who is discharged or who resigns or quits, as in said section one provided, then as penalty for such non-payment the wages of such servant or employee shall continue from the due date thereof at the same rate until paid; * * * provided, that in no case shall such wages continue for more than thirty days."

In addition to the amounts found due as wages, the court found that there is due each of the several claimants a sum as the penalty provided by the act for the nonpayment of wages. The aggregate of the sums found due as wages is $372, and the aggregate found due as penalties is $532, making a total of $904, for which total amount judgment was entered against defendants. There is no controversy as to the $372 due the several claimants as wages. The only question raised by appellants is as to respondent's right, under the pleadings and the findings, to the $532 found to be due as penalties under the statute.

The complaint does not allege nor does the court find that the men were hired in California, or that they quit or were discharged therein, or that they performed their work or were to receive their wages in this state. Indeed, the pleadings and findings are wholly silent as to the place where the services were contracted for or where they were performed or were payable, or where the men quit their work. For aught that appears on the face of the judgment roll, which is all we have before us, the contract for services may have been made and the work all performed and made payable in some foreign state or country. Appellants therefore make the point that so much of the judgment as is made up of the amount found due as penalties finds no support in either the complaint or the findings. Their claim is that the right to the penalties is purely statutory, and that therefore the plaintiff must allege and prove that the services were contracted for, or were performed in, or at least were payable in, this state, or, if they were not, that they were contracted for or were payable in or were performed within some state or country that has adopted a statute similar to that of this state—a statute giving a penalty to wage-earners for nonpayment of their wages when due. The record before us constrains us to hold with appellants in this contention.

The only replies that respondent vouchsafes to appellants' contention are: (1) The penalty allowed by our statute for nonpayment of wages pertains, not to the substantive right of the wage-earner, but to the remedy afforded him in an action to recover his unpaid wages; therefore, so it is argued, the law of the forum controls, regardless of where the contract may have been made, or where the wages were earned, or where made payable; (2) in any event there is a prima facie presumption that the law of the place where the wages were contracted for, or where they were earned or made payable, is the same as the law of this state. In our opinion neither of these points is tenable.

True it is that, though the substantive rights of parties are governed by the lex loci, it is the lex fori or law of the forum that governs as to the appropriate remedy to be afforded a suitor for the enforcement or protection of his right or for the redress or prevention of a wrong done or threatened him. It is often difficult to discern whether a particular inquiry relates to the remedy or to a substantive right. But, difficult as the question may be, the wrong inflicted or the right invaded, on which the action is based, must never be confused with the redress which the law affords. It is said in Dorr Cattle Co. v. Des Moines Nat. Bank, 127 Iowa, 153, 98 N. W. 918, 4 Ann. Cas. 519, that where the plaintiff sues for the redress of a wrong, "the act complained of is always to be diagnosed in the light of the law of the place where committed, and its character determined according to that law; but the particular kind of and the extent of the remedy to be applied necessarily depends on the notions of justice entertained by the forum by which it is to be administered." (Italics ours.)

In the instant case there not only is a breach of contract—a breach of defendants' agreement to pay the wages when due—but over and beyond this mere breach of contract there is something that, by the statute of this state, is made an actionable wrong—a wrong visited by the prescribed statutory penalty. That wrong is the continuance of the employer's breach of his contract to pay the wages when due. In actions of this character the plaintiff sues to recover, not only the wages due him under his contract with his employer, but also the penalty that the statute allows him because his employer, in addition to breaching his contract, has done him a further wrong—a wrong denounced by the statute, namely, the withholding of the wages for a greater period than five days after they become due. This wrong, in the language of the above excerpt from the opinion of the Iowa court, is "to be diagnosed in the light of the law of the place where committed, and its character determined according to that law." That is, the character of the act of withholding payment of the wages for more than five days is to be determined by the law of the place where the act is committed, or, at any rate, according to the law of the place where the contract of employment was made; and therefore whether the act complained of—the act of withholding the wages for more than the five days—is in and of itself, and aside from the mere breach of the employer's agreement to pay for the work, an actionable wrong, to be redressed by the recovery of a penalty, depends upon the law of the place where the work was contracted for or where it was made payable, or possibly, upon the law of the place where the work was performed, or where the employee quit or was discharged. We are not to be considered as determining which one of these things it is that brings a case within the provisions of our statute and impresses the act of withholding the wage with the character of an actionable wrong for which the penalty prescribed by our statute may be recovered. What we do say is that under our statute some one at least of these things must have occurred in this state in order to stamp the character of an actionable wrong upon the mere act of continuing the nonpayment of the wage for more than five days after it becomes due and payable; and this actionable wrong is the basis of a right of action that is additional to the wage-earner's right of action to recover the wages due under his contract. So that the right to the penalty is based upon an additional substantive right created by statute.

[2] The penalty provided by the statute does, it is true, appertain to the remedy. But this is no more than to say that the statute affords the employee two remedies, each of which is for the vindication of a separate and distinct substantive right; that is, there is first the common-law remedy for breach of the employer's contract to pay the agreed wage when due, viz. the recovery of the wages due under the contract of employment; and there is also the statutory remedy for the vindication of the statutory wrong, viz. the penalty allowed the employee for withholding his wages for more than the five days. But each of these remedies appertains to its own separate and independent substantive right.

The situation is not like that where the statute empowers the court to impose treble damages when a tenant commits waste or in cases of forcible entry or unlawful detainer. In those cases the statute gives treble damages for the one wrongful act—the one and only wrongful act complained on in the complaint, namely, the tenant's waste, or his unlawful detainer, or the forcible entry, as the case may be. In that class of cases there is but one substantive right that has been invaded, and the treble damages allowed for the invasion of that right obviously pertain to the remedy only. But in cases arising under the act of 1911 there are two substantive rights. There is the employee's common-law right to the wages earned by him under his contract of employment; and there is also the employee's statutory right to the unearned wages which the statute awards him as a penalty for his employer's conduct in continuing to withhold his earned wages after they are due. So also there are two separate and independent wrongs. There is the wrongful violation of the employee's right to receive, when due, the wages earned by him; and there is also the statutory wrong, visited by the imposition of a penalty, which consists in the continued withholding of the wages after the expiration of the five days. To quote again from the Iowa case:

"The nature and extent of the wrong, everything relating to its essence, is one thing; the consequences which naturally flow from it quite another. The right of recovery depends on the former; the remedy to be applied, and its extent, upon the latter."

The case of Louisiana & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Phelps, 70 Ark. 17, 65 S. W. 709, is directly in point. There the plaintiff brought an action in one of the Arkansas courts to recover wages due him and likewise the penalty allowed by the Arkansas statute for nonpayment of wages. He had been employed in Louisiana and was discharged in that state. The Supreme Court of Arkansas held that plaintiff's right of action for any penalty for withholding payment of his wages accrued to him by virtue of his contract of employment and his discharge from defendant's service, and that therefore his right thereto, if any he had, depended upon the laws of Louisiana, where those acts occurred, and not upon the law of Arkansas, where the action was brought.

[3] Equally untenable is respondent's claim that, regardless of where the services may have been contracted for or where the claimants may have been discharged, it will be presumed, until the contrary is shown, that the law of that place, wherever it may be, is the same as that of this state. Without doubt, it is the established rule in this state that, in the absence of proof to the contrary, the law of another state will be presumed to be the same as our own; and this presumption extends to statutory as well as the common law. Cavallaro v. Texas, etc., Ry. Co., 110 Cal. 348, 357, 42 Pac. 918, 52 Am. St. Rep. 94. But to this rule there is a generally recognized exception, which is that such presumption of similarity of statutory enactment will not be indulged where, as here, the law of the forum imposes a penalty. Louisiana & N. W. Ry. Co. v. Phelps, supra; Grider v. Driver, 46 Ark. 50; Bird v. Olmstead (Tenn. Ch. App.) 53 S. W. 978; Chamberlayne on Evidence, vol. 2, § 1213; 22 Corp. Jur. 153. See, also, Myers v. Chicago, etc., R. Co., 69 Minn. 476, 72 N. W. 694, 65 Am. St. Rep. 579.

[4] Since there is no attack upon those findings which show that plaintiff is entitled to a judgment for the amount of the wages actually earned by the claimants, the sum of $372, there is no necessity for a retrial of any of the issues upon which those findings are based. Indeed, there seems to be no necessity for a retrial of any of the issues upon which the case already has been tried. The court has made findings upon those issues, and there is no pretense that any finding is not sustained by the evidence. The only issue upon which there seems to be any occasion for a trial, on the going down of the remittitur, is the issue that may be tendered by such amendment to the complaint as plaintiff may make in order that it shall appear that the case is within the California statute or within a similar statute of some other state or country. Though the retrial should be thus limited, and though plaintiff unquestionably is entitled, under the uncontested findings, to a judgment for $372, we think it better to reverse the judgment in toto, since it is for one lump sum.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the lower court to permit plaintiff, if he be so advised, to amend his complaint by alleging any fact or facts showing that his right to recover penalties for nonpayment of the wages is derivable from the statute of this state or is afforded him by some similar statutory provision in the enactments of some other state or country, and the court is directed to try the issue or issues thus tendered by such amendment, if any there be.

HAYNES v. DOXIE. (Civ. 3447.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 29, 1921.)

Highways ⊂=179—Plaintiff running into unlighted truck stopped in the middle of highway on dark night held not contributorily negligent.

Where defendant, on a dark and rainy night, stopped his motor truck in the middle of the road for the purpose of placing lights thereon, and plaintiff, operating an automobile ran into the unlighted rear end of the truck, sustaining damages, held, that plaintiff was not shown to have been operating his automobile at a speed which amounted to contributory negligence as a matter of law by the fact that, on account of the darkness and rain, and the slippery condition of the road, he did not see the truck until he was within 25 or 30 feet from it, when it was too late to stop; it not appearing that plaintiff was running at a rate of over 30 miles per hour.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Robert E. Haynes against G. W. Doxie. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. C. Ridgway, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. W. Hall, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. In this action the plaintiff recovered judgment against the defendant in a sum allowed as damages for injuries to plaintiff's automobile, which injuries were caused by negligence of the defendant resulting from a collision between plaintiff's automobile and a truck operated by the defendant. The defendant appeals from the judgment.

On the evening of February 20, 1920, after sundown, and at about the hour of 6 o'clock, darkness having set in, and at a time when there was a steady downpour of rain, the defendant, while operating a motor truck headed in a westerly direction on Wilshire boulevard, in the county of Los Angeles, stopped his truck at or near the middle of the road for the purpose of placing lights on the truck. This left the truck standing in the street without lights, and the defendant did not have a lighted lantern, or a light of any description, upon the rear end of the truck at the time when it was struck by plaintiff's automobile, as hereinafter stated.

In addition to the foregoing facts, the court found that at said time the plaintiff was driving an automobile in a westerly direction, on the northerly side of, and near the center of, the road; that at said time the plaintiff was driving at the rate of 18 miles per hour, and was unable to, and did not, see said motor truck until he was 25 or 30 feet from the rear end of the truck; that the plaintiff, while driving as aforesaid, ran into and collided with the rear end of the truck; that the direct and proximate cause of the collision, and of the damage suffered by plaintiff's automobile, was the negligence and carelessness of the defendant in stopping his truck in such a position that its left, or south, wheels were in the middle of said Wilshire boulevard, and also the fact that, as plaintiff's automobile approached the rear of said truck, defendant was standing to the left or southerly side of said truck, and shouted at plaintiff, which caused plaintiff to attempt to pass to the right of said truck, and that but for defendant's act in shouting at plaintiff, he might have turned to the left, and avoided a collision with the truck; that the direct and proximate cause of the collision between plaintiff's automobile and the truck was the negligence and carelessness of the defendant in not stopping his truck near the edge of the boulevard, as required by the Vehicle Act of the state of California (St. 1919, p. 191), and because of the unusual darkness and rain, and also because of the fact that defendant, by shouting, caused plaintiff to attempt to pass said truck on the right, thereby striking the rear of the truck; that the collision occurred without fault on the part of plaintiff; that it is not true that plaintiff did not exercise ordinary care or caution or prudence to avoid the collision, and it is not true that the damages sustained by plaintiff were either directly or proximately contributed to or caused by the fault or carelessness or negligence of the plaintiff; and it is not true that plaintiff operated his automobile negligently or carelessly, or at a reckless or excessive rate of speed, or at the rate of 35 or 40 miles per hour, or that, by any fault or negligence of the plaintiff, he caused his automobile to collide with the truck; that Wilshire boulevard is a county boulevard outside of the city of Los Angeles; that the boulevard extends about one-half mile in an easterly and about a half mile in a westerly direction from the place of the accident without intersecting any highway or railroad crossing, and is level for that distance in both directions from the place of the accident, all of which facts were within the knowledge of both parties prior to and at the time of the accident.

The contentions of appellant as stated by his counsel, are as follows: (1) That the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence both upon the evidence and the findings of fact; (2) that plaintiff's negligence was contributory negligence as a matter of law; (3) that the court erred in finding that a shout of warning was negligence on the part of the defendant; (4) that the findings are inconsistent, and do not support the conclusions of law.

The points above stated impliedly concede negligence on the part of the defendant.

From the facts proved and found, it seems clear that the accident was caused by negligence of the defendant, and that there is no defense to the action unless the plaintiff was guilty of negligence which directly and proximately contributed to and caused the collision and damage.

In support of the claim that plaintiff was guilty of negligence, dependence is placed upon the testimony of plaintiff wherein he stated that it was dark and rainy; that his wind shield was wet, and was fairly hard to see through; that it was slightly down grade there, and the road was slippery, and the car more or less inclined to skid; that plaintiff did not see the truck until he was within 25 or 30 feet from it. On these facts we are asked to declare it to be the rule that it is negligence for the driver of an automobile to drive on the highway on a dark night at such a rate of speed that he cannot avoid objects after they come within the area lighted by his lights. The principal decisions relied upon are cited in Ham v. County of Los Angeles, 189 Pac. 462, a recent decision rendered by division 2 of this court. The court there said:

"We are not prepared to say that negligence may not be predicated as a matter of law, irrespective of any positive law as to speed limits, where an automobile is being driven in the night on any part of the highway, and where the driver is dependent upon the lights of his machine for knowledge of the condition of the road and the traffic upon it, and runs into an obstruction, if he drives at a rate of speed which will not permit him to stop or slow up within the radius illuminated by his lights, and the accident is proximately caused thereby."

The fact that respondent was not able to see, and did not see, the unlighted truck until he was within 25 or 30 feet of the same does not fully establish the facts necessary to give appellant the benefit of the rule above stated. Notwithstanding the facts stated, it may also be true that if the truck had been lighted, as required by law, plaintiff would have been able to see it, and would have seen it, while at a distance great enough to enable him to stop his automobile, and avoid the collision. The condition of the road, as to its openness and the distance to any point of intersection or any railroad crossing, was known to both parties, and the plaintiff was entitled to proceed at a rate reasonable under those conditions, and not exceeding 30 miles per hour. Our conclusion is that the plaintiff was not guilty of negligence in operating his automobile at the speed at which he was traveling at the time of the accident. It is not claimed that he was guilty of any other negligence. This being so, the third point above stated becomes immaterial.

We have given consideration to the contention that the findings are inconsistent, and do not support the conclusions of law. These claimed inconsistencies relate to findings defining the positions of the truck and the automobile on the street, and several statements in the findings defining acts of negligence of which the defendant was guilty. The decision herein is not dependent upon the question of whether or not the truck was left standing on the left side of the roadway. Assuming that it was at the right of the middle of the road, it remains true that the truck was wrongfully allowed to stand unlighted in the path of road travel and under conditions likely to cause injury to persons lawfully traveling on the highway. It was the duty of defendant to operate his truck—

"in a careful manner, with due regard for the safety and convenience of pedestrians and of all other vehicles or traffic upon such highway." Vehicle Act, § 20(a); Stats. 1919, p. 215.

The finding which refers to the act of defendant in shouting at the plaintiff, and the effect thereof under the circumstances stated, was material only for the purpose of determining whether plaintiff's negligence, if he was negligent, was the proximate cause of the collision. Since it has been determined herein that negligence of the plaintiff is not established, the incidental question of proximate cause becomes unimportant.

The judgment is affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 62

PEOPLE v. GOSCINSKY. (Cr. 946.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 25, 1921.)

1. Indictment and information ⊂⊃81(3)—Mistake in defendant's middle initial, immaterial.

That an information makes a mistake in or omits defendant's middle initial or name is immaterial; the law recognizing only one Christian name.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃1167(4)—Failure to change name, on defendant's true name appearing during trial, harmless.

Even if, on it appearing, during the trial of one whose name was given in the information as "A. G.," and who when arraigned stated that that was his true name, that the "A." stood for "Alfred," the subsequent proceeding ought to have been conducted in that name, in compliance with Pen. Code, §§ 953, 959, failure so to do was a mere error of procedure, and in a matter of form, not tending to prejudice substantial rights.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1032(5), 1167(1)—Defendant cannot complain of failure of information to state county of offense where no demurrer and omission harmless.

Defendant may not complain that the information was defective because not stating the county where the offense was committed, he not having specially demurred as he might on that account, and the evidence showing such county, and he not having been hampered in his defense or suffered any injury through the omission.

4. Physicians and surgeons ⟸6(10)—Defendant has burden of proving possession of license to practice.

A physician prosecuted for practicing without a license has the burden of proving that he had one, a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge.

5. Physicians and surgeons ⟸6(11)—Defendant's possession of a license held under the evidence a jury question.

Whether a physician, prosecuted for practicing without a license or certificate, had one, held, under the conflicting evidence, a question for the jury.

6. Criminal law ⟸1159(3)—Jury's determination of fact on conflicting evidence binding on appeal.

The jury's determination, on conflicting evidence, of a question of fact, is binding on the appellate court.

7. Criminal law ⟸1184—Appellate court will modify judgment imposing excessive alternative imprisonment.

Judgment for practicing medicine without a license imposing in case of nonpayment of fine alternative imprisonment for a period in excess of the maximum time by which the offense is punishable under Medical Practice Act, in contravention of Pen. Code, § 1205, is not on that account void, but merely erroneous, so that the appellate court will, under authority of section 1260, modify it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Monterey County; J. A. Bardin, Judge.

A. G. Goscinsky was convicted of practicing medicine without a license, and appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. Feliz, of Salinas, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in a criminal prosecution wherein the defendant and appellant was charged with the offense of practicing a system and mode of treating the sick and afflicted without having at the time of so doing a valid, unrevoked certificate from the board of medical examiners of the state of California.

The information charged the defendant by the name of A. G. Goscinsky, and upon arraignment the defendant stated his name to be A. C. Goscinsky, and thereafter the proceedings were conducted in that name; but during the trial, when called and examined as a witness the defendant gave his name as Alfred C. Goscinsky. However, the proceedings continued in the name given by the defendant upon his arraignment.

[1, 2] The law recognizes only one Christian name; and it has been often held that a mistake in or omission of a middle initial or name is immaterial; but there is a conflict in the authorities as to the sufficiency of the use of initials in lieu of the given name. 29 Cyc. 265, 269. Assuming that from the time when it appeared that the letter "A." in the defendant's name as given by him stood for "Alfred" the subsequent proceedings ought to have been conducted in that name, and the initial "A." discarded, in compliance with sections 953 and 959 of the Penal Code, the neglect to do so was at most a mere error of procedure, and in a matter of form, which did not tend to prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant. He had himself stated on his arraignment that his true name was A. C. Goscinsky, and the fact that the name thus given was used throughout the remainder of the proceedings in no way interfered with his defense to the charge, and it will hardly be contended by the most zealous champion of the defendant's rights that the omission or defect complained of in this case resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

[3] The point that the information was defective in not stating the county in which the offense was committed may also be dismissed with the comment that the evidence showed where it was committed—i. e., where the defendant resided and practiced medicine—and certain it is that the defendant suffered no injury and was not hampered in his defense on account of this omission. It may also be remarked that he could have specially demurred to the information upon this ground, and neglected to do so.

[4] The court instructed the jury in part as follows:

"You are instructed that it is not necessary for the people to prove that the defendant did not have a license. Whether the defendant has or has not, or has had, a license is a matter peculiarly within his own knowledge. The burden is therefore upon him to prove that he has or has had a license if he seeks to make the possession of a license a defense."

A similar instruction was given and sustained in the cases of People v. Boo Doo Hong, 122 Cal. 606, 55 Pac. 402, and People v. T. Wah Hing, 190 Pac. 662. The instruction correctly announced the law on the subject, and the court therefore committed no error in so directing the jury.

[5, 6] The evidence supports the verdict. The prosecution introduced evidence tending to show that the defendant was engaged in the county of Monterey in the practice of medicine and surgery, and then rested, whereupon the defendant took the stand and testified that a license was issued to him in the year 1894 by the board of medical examiners of the state of California entitling him to practice medicine, and that such license was destroyed during the fire in San Francisco in the year 1906. He also testified that in the year 1898 he practiced in the office of Dr. Herbert W. Schultz, and that during that time his certificate hung on the wall in Dr. Schultz's surgical room above the X-ray apparatus. Dr. Schultz, however, took the witness stand in rebuttal, and testified that, while the defendant had been associated with him in his office as stated, he had never seen a certificate or what purported to be a certificate or license of any kind entitling defendant as a physician and surgeon to practice in this state. All questions of fact are for the jury, as also the question of the credibility of witnesses. It is quite apparent that the jury discredited the defendant's testimony that he had been granted a license to practice medicine and surgery in the state of California, and its determination of this fact is binding upon an appellate court.

[7] The Medical Practice Act provides as a penalty for the violation of any of its provisions a fine of not less than $100 nor more than $600, or imprisonment for a term of not less than 60 days nor more than 180 days, or by both such fine and imprisonment. Stats. 1917, p. 115, § 24. The judgment in this case provides that the defendant shall pay a fine of $500, and in default of payment that he be imprisoned in the county jail one day for each $2 of the fine. It is contended that the judgment is void for the alleged reason that it requires that the defendant be imprisoned, in default of payment of the whole of the fine imposed, for a duration of 250 days, contrary to the provisions of section 1205 of the Penal Code, which limits the duration of such alternative imprisonment to the maximum time by which the offense is punishable —in this case 180 days. But the judgment is not for this reason void, but erroneous and should for that reason be modified by this court. Pen. Code, § 1260. It is therefore ordered that the judgment be modified by adding to it the following words, to wit:

"Provided, however, that the term of imprisonment under this judgment shall not exceed the duration of 180 days."

As so modified, the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte SANDERS. (Cr. 991.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. April 4, 1921.)

1. Habeas corpus ⟸85(1)—Court cannot assume warden of state prison will not discharge prisoner on proper date.

On habeas corpus by a prisoner in the state prison against the warden, the court cannot assume, as contended by petitioner, that the warden will not act in accordance with law, and discharge petitioner on the date when he is entitled to a discharge.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸17—Prisoner not illegally detained until term expired.

Where the term for which petitioner for habeas corpus against the warden of the state prison was sentenced has not actually expired, petitioner is not illegally detained, and will not be so detained until his term has expired.

Application by Russell Sanders for writ of habeas corpus, directed to the warden of San Quentin Prison, to secure petitioner's release from custody. Writ denied.

See, also, 190 Pac. 647.

Russell Sanders, in pro. per.

PER CURIAM. It appears that the applicant was delivered to the custody of the warden of the state prison at San Quentin on the 6th day of April, 1913, to serve a term of eight years, which period he contends will expire on the 6th day of April next. The sole ground for the application is that the petitioner has "been given to know and understand" that the warden at the state prison will not discharge him from custody and restore him to his liberty until a date some time later than the day upon which he contends he is lawfully entitled to be discharged.

[1, 2] There are two reasons why we cannot entertain this petition at this time: First, we are not in a position to assume that the warden of the state prison will not act in accordance with law, and discharge the petitioner, if it be, as alleged in his petition, that he is entitled to a discharge, on the 6th day of April, 1921. The second is that the term for which the petitioner was sentenced has not actually expired, and, until it has, the petitioner is not illegally detained. Ex parte Ross, 82 Cal. 109, 22 Pac. 1086.

Application for the writ is denied.

WINTERS et al. v. LINDSAY. (Civ. 3480.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. March 26, 1921. Rehearing Denied April 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court May 23, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⊜99(3)—Company had right to exchange shares for property other than money, and could sell on less than par basis, leaving stockholders liable to creditors.

Under Const. art. 12, § 11, a bond and mortgage company had the right to exchange its shares for property other than money, and had the right, except as conditions imposed by the commissioner of corporations affected the matter, to sell or exchange such stock on a less than par basis of valuation, except that creditors would have the right to require stockholders to respond in an amount equaling the difference between the price paid and the par value of the shares.

2. Corporations ⊜99(2)—Failure to observe terms of condition of sale of stock fixed by commissioner of corporations does not void stock.

Though the Legislature possessed power to delegate to the commissioner of corporations authority to fix the value of the property which should be exchanged for stock in a company, a failure to observe fully the terms of such a condition would not render the stock void, but might subject the officers of the corporation to the penalties of the law as otherwise fixed in the act.

3. Corporations ⊜121(1)—If stock not void, action to recover against seller on account of its lack of value a collateral attack on issue.

If corporate stock as issued was not void, an action to recover damages sustained by reason of the fact that the stock sold to plaintiffs by defendant was of no value constitutes a collateral attack on the issue, and is ineffectual.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Dana R. Weller, Judge.

Action by John C. Winters and another against Lycurgus Lindsay. From judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Oliver O. Clark, Claud B. Andrews, and Carnahan & Clark, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

A. L. Abrahams and P. B. D'Orr, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Plaintiffs by this action sought to recover from the defendant damages alleged to have been sustained by reason of the asserted fact that certain corporate stock sold to the plaintiffs by the defendant was of no value. They were denied any relief by the judgment, and this appeal has resulted. The record consists of the judgment roll only.

The corporate stock secured by the plaintiffs from the defendant consisted of 19,944 shares of American Bond & Mortgage Company, a California corporation. The stock was given by the defendant as part consideration for real property of the plaintiffs located in the state of Nevada. The trial court found that this stock was worth the sum of $1.25 per share, which was the value which the plaintiffs alleged defendant represented it to have at the time the exchange of properties was made. There is no contention that the stock as to its value did not fulfill all of the representations made by the defendant, but as a basis for recovery plaintiffs have urged the claim that the stock had been illegally issued to defendant —that it was void stock in consequence, and hence they received no value whatsoever. At the time the stock was issued the American Bond & Mortgage Company possessed in its treasury more than the number of shares that were represented in the certificate which defendant transferred to the plaintiffs; hence the question of an overissue is not involved. The determination of the case rests upon a solution of the question as to whether corporate stock, if not sold for the amount required and stated in the permit or certificate issued by the state corporation commissioner, is void for all purposes, and in whosever hands it may be. The plaintiffs here stand in the place of an innocent holder for value. To make clearer the contention of plaintiffs, further facts as expressed in the findings of the court are necessary to be stated: Defendant obtained the shares of stock in the American Bond & Mortgage Company by exchanging therefor a large number of shares in a corporation called "The State Investment Company." Before this exchange was made the first-named corporation obtained from the commissioner of corporations a permit authorizing the sale of a large number of its shares, the permit containing, among other statements, the following:

"To sell and issue not exceeding 1,000,000 shares in exchange for property, the fair and reasonable net market value of which, after deducting therefrom all expenses incurred by such applicant in acquiring the same, shall, at the time of such exchange, equal or exceed 110 per cent. of the par value of the shares issued therefor. Said shares shall be sold or issued only for a consideration hereinabove recited."

The court found that—

These shares in the State Investment Company at the time they were exchanged for the American Bond & Mortgage Company's stock "had no market value whatsoever, and the value thereof, if any, was exceedingly speculative and doubtful, and did not in any event exceed 50 cents per share; and at all times herein mentioned the value thereof as shown by the books and records of said State Investment Company, a corporation, did not exceed 50 cents per share."

The expressions used in this finding are ambiguous, but it does appear therefrom that the stock exchanged by the defendant for the stock of the Bond and Mortgage Company had at least a substantial value. To be sure, if it was worth 50 cents per share, the total amount thereof exchanged by the defendant would equal but one-half the total value of the shares received by the defendant in return therefor. In order to sustain appellants' contention, it is necessary that it be held that shares of corporate stock, although authorized by a duly issued permit to be sold, are void unless there is received from the purchaser thereof, in exact measure, property of a specified value, where such a condition is stated in the permit of the corporation commissioner. The transaction herein referred to occurred in the year 1915. The law creating a commissioner of corporations and defining his duties as then in effect is found in the Statutes of 1913 at page 715. In that law it is provided—

> That a permit to sell securities may be issued where compliance is made with certain forms; that the permit shall show that the "company is authorized to sell said securities within this state on such conditions, if any, as the Commissioner of Corporations may in said certificate prescribe. * * * The Commissioner of Corporations may impose such conditions as he may deem necessary to the issue of said securities, and may, from time to time, for cause, rescind, alter or amend the certificate." Section 5.

The act contains penal clauses under which a failure to comply with its terms is made punishable by a fine, and, in some cases, imprisonment. The act does not contain, like the successor to it (Stats. of 1917, p. 673), any clause declaring void, securities issued without complying with the requirements as to the obtaining of permits, or for a violation of the conditions thereof. It may be pertinent to here state that in the findings of the court it is also determined that the board of directors of the American Bond & Mortgage Company, by resolution adopted six months after the issuance of the stock herein referred to, attempted to repudiate the transaction with the defendant on the ground that the exchange had been effected in violation of the terms of the permit. We think it wholly immaterial as to what the board of directors did at the time last stated in the direction of an attempt to nullify the sale of the stock. It is not determined by the court that through any collusive agreement between the defendant and the Bond & Mortgage Company the stock was fraudulently issued; in fact, nothing appears which authorizes the assumption that the officers of the Bond & Mortgage Company acted in other than the utmost good faith in making the exchange with the defendant. It does appear, to be sure, in the findings that the defendant knew all about the stock which he was delivering to the Bond & Mortgage Company and had knowledge of its market value; he had knowledge, too, it is shown, of the terms of the permit issued by the commissioner of corporations. On the other hand, it is not shown that he misrepresented the value of his stock to the Bond & Mortgage Company in any way. The failure of a corporation to observe regulations governing the sale of its stock, such as those provided for in the act to which we have referred, in our opinion amounts only to an irregularity, and will not taint the transaction as being ultra vires. Mr. Thompson in his work on Corporations, vol. 3 (2d Ed.) par. 2772, states that where a corporation is authorized to perform an act for a specific purpose and performs the act for another purpose, the case does not become one of ultra vires, and that such a plea is not available to either party concerned. The text is illustrated by citation to a case where a state bank under its charter had power to accept stock in a national bank as security, but no power to purchase such stock as an investment. The bank purchased national bank shares and, the national bank becoming insolvent, assessment against the purchasing bank made by the controller was resisted on the ground that the purchase was ultra vires. It was there held that the purchase of the stock was "merely the exercise, for an unauthorized purpose, of a power existing for other and legitimate purposes," and that the defense was not available, citing Citizens' State Bank v. Hawkins, 71 Fed. 369, 18 C. C. A. 78. This author further states:

> "A plain distinction is to be made between cases where a contract is ultra vires because clearly outside of the power granted a corporation and the cases where a contract, while within the general scope of granted powers, is ultra vires because of some particular circumstance which may or may not be known to the other contracting party. In the former case an action on the contract will not lie; while in the latter, according to many of the decisions, an action may be maintained."

There was not an inherent lack of power in the Bond & Mortgage Company to issue and dispose of its corporate shares. It possessed the stock as a part of its treasury assets prior to the transfer of the same to defendants.

[1] Under the constitution (article 12, § 11) it had the right to exchange its shares for property other than money, and it had the right (except as the conditions imposed by the commissioner affected the matter) to sell or exchange such stock on a less than par basis of valuation. The only result which would follow in the latter case would be that the rights of creditors to require the stockholders to respond in an amount equaling the difference between the price paid and the par value of the shares would be unaffected. Herron Co. v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265; Hasson v. Koeberle, 180 Cal. 359, 181 Pac. 387. The statute in force gave to the corporation commissioner power to impose conditions on the sale of stock.

[2] Allowing the very broad concession that the Legislature possessed the power to delegate to the commissioner of corporations authority to fix the value of the property which should be exchanged for stock, we believe that a failure to observe fully the terms of such a condition would not render the stock void. It might subject the officers of the corporation to the penalties of the law as otherwise fixed in the act. Yetter et al. v. Delaware Valley R. Co. et al., 206 Pa. 485, 56 Atl. 57.

[3] Once admitting that the stock as issued was not void, then this action constitutes a collateral attack upon the issue, which is not allowed to be effectual. Hasson v. Koeberle, supra; Fletcher Cyclopedia on Corporations, vol. 5, §§ 3485–3486.

The judgment is affirmed.

MADER v. CHRISTIE. (Civ. 3386.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. March 30, 1921.)

1. Judgment ⟸101(1)—Pleadings sufficient to support default, if apprising defendant of nature of demand.

A default judgment will not be set aside as being void on its face, in that the complaint fails to state sufficient facts to constitute a cause of action, unless the complaint wholly fails to apprise defendant of the general nature of plaintiff's demand.

2. Appeal and error ⟸1024(4)—Finding on conflicting evidence not disturbed.

The trial court's finding, on motion to vacate default judgment, as to when an amended complaint was served, will not be disturbed on appeal, where based on substantially conflicting evidence.

3. Judgment ⟸153(1)—Motion to vacate default after 11 months held too late.

Where defendant, although aware of entry of his default within 2 days thereafter, waited nearly 11 months before moving to have the same vacated and set aside, at which time judgment thereon had also been entered for 2 months, his motion was properly denied, as not seasonably made.

4. Judgment ⟸153(1)—Motion to vacate default must be seasonably made.

When a judgment is not void upon its face, nor fraudulent, the court has no power to set it aside on motion, unless the motion is made within a reasonable time, the limit of which is 6 months; but in such a case resort should be had to an independent action.

5. Judgment ⟸153(1)—Time for motion to vacate measured from entry of default.

The entry of the default fixes the beginning of the period within which motion to set aside the default and judgment should be made.

6. Appeal and error ⟸172(1)—Grounds of motion to vacate, not urged below, not considered on appeal.

An objection to a default judgment, which was not one of the grounds of the motion to vacate the judgment, may not be considered on appeal from an order denying the motion.

7. Army and navy ⟸34—Moratorium affidavit properly filed after default and prior to judgment thereon.

Plaintiff's moratorium affidavit was filed in time, although not filed before entry of default against defendant, where it was filed before entry of judgment thereon, under the express terms of the statute (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss).

8. Appeal and error ⟸1073(2)—Time of filing moratorium affidavit not error, where defendant not prejudiced.

Defendant could not complain that plaintiff's moratorium affidavit was filed too late, because not filed prior to entry of default against defendant, where it did not appear that defendant was in the military service, or that he was in any way prejudiced or at all affected by the fact that the affidavit was not filed earlier.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Anton Mader against John H. Christie. From an order denying defendant's motion to set aside default, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Schulte and Frank B. Austin, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Thomas P. Wickes and Harry E. Michael, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order denying defendant's motion to set aside his default and the judgment entered thereon. In the month of June, 1911, the plaintiff, through the alleged negligence of the defendant, suffered an injury necessitating the amputation of his left leg. About one year later he commenced an action against the defendant to recover damages therefor. At the trial of that action it appeared that plaintiff, two days after the injury, entered into a contract with the defendant whereby he released the defendant from all liability on account of said injury in consideration of the sum of $60, to be paid at the rate of $5 a week, which agreement the court held to be binding, and accordingly directed the jury to return a verdict in favor of the defendant, which was done. An appeal was taken from the resulting judgment, pending which the defendant effected a compromise of the action with the plaintiff, without the knowledge of the plaintiff's attorneys, by the terms of which the defendant agreed to pay the sum of $55 (being a balance due under the first agreement), and also the additional sum of $500, and to procure permanent employment for the plaintiff; the latter on his part agreeing to dismiss the appeal. Said appeal was accordingly dismissed.

Defendant, as in the case of the first agreement, failed to perform the terms of this new one, whereupon the plaintiff commenced the present action, alleging in his complaint, in addition to the facts just recited, that the defendant had fraudulently induced him to make the second contract, and that by reason of the defendant's failure to perform its terms plaintiff had sustained damages additional to those alleged in his complaint in his first suit. A demurrer was sustained to this complaint, whereupon plaintiff filed an amended complaint, setting up further facts tending to meet the point of the demurrer to his first pleading, viz. that his cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. This amended complaint was filed on Wednesday, November 6, 1918, and plaintiff claims that it was also served on that day. In the forenoon of the 18th of said month, no pleading thereto having been filed or served, and no order or stipulation extending time therefor having been made, plaintiff caused defendant's default to be entered. Defendant, on the other hand, claims that the amended complaint was not served on him until the 7th day of November, so that the 17th, falling on a Sunday, he had the whole of Monday, the 18th, to plead. On August 29, 1919, the plaintiff filed a moratorium affidavit, and thereupon a judgment by default was entered against defendant. On October 31, 1919, the defendant moved to set aside the default and judgment entered thereon, which motion, after hearing, was on that day denied.

[1] In support of his appeal from such order the defendant contends that the motion to set aside the judgment should have been granted for the reason that it is a nullity and void on its face, and that an examination of the evidence taken on the hearing of the motion shows that the amended complaint was served on November 7th, and that the default, entered on the 18th, was for the reason already given premature, and the judgment based thereon unauthorized and void. The claim of the appellant that the judgment is void on its face is grounded on the theory that the complaint fails to state sufficient facts do constitute a cause of action. There is no merit in this contention; but, even if the complaint were open to this objection, it would not follow that the judgment is void unless it wholly failed to apprise the defendant of the general nature of the plaintiff's demand (Christerson v. French, 180 Cal. 525, 182 Pac. 27); and it is not seriously claimed, nor can it be held, that the complaint fails in this regard.

[2] Upon the other ground upon which the appellant claims that the judgment is void, it is sufficient to say that there is a substantial conflict in the evidence as to when the amended complaint was served, so that we are not at liberty to disturb the finding of the court as to that fact (Norton v. A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co., 97 Cal. 388, 30 Pac. 585, 32 Pac. 452, 33 Am. St. Rep. 198), even if we were so inclined, which we are not.

[3-5] Again, it appears that the defendant, who was aware of the entry of his default within 2 days thereafter, waited nearly 11 months before moving to have the same vacated and set aside, at which time the judgment had also been entered for 2 months. His motion therefore was not seasonably made, and was properly denied. When the invalidity of a judgment does not appear upon its face, a motion to set it aside must be made within a reasonable time, not exceeding 6 months. People v. Thomas, 101 Cal. 571, 36 Pac. 9. When a judgment is not void upon its face, nor fraudulent, the court has no power to set it aside on motion unless the motion is made within a reasonable time, the limit of which is 6 months; but in such a case resort should be had to an independent action. People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447, 37 Pac. 414. And the entry of the default fixes the beginning of the period within which the motion to set aside the default and judgment should be made. Title Ins. Co. v. King Land Co., 162 Cal. 44, 120 Pac. 1066.

[6-8] Finally, the defendant claims that, the moratorium affidavit not having been filed before the entry of his default, such entry was void, and afforded no valid basis for the subsequent entry of judgment against him. There are several answers to this contention, the first of which is that this was not one of the grounds of the motion to vacate the judgment, and therefore may not now be considered on an appeal from the order made thereon. Lambert v. Marcuse, 137 Cal. 44, 69 Pac. 620. Secondly, the affidavit having been filed before the entry of the judgment, it was seasonably filed according to the language of the act itself (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919, §§ 3078¼a–3078¼ss), which in part provides:

"If there shall be a default of an appearance by the defendant the plaintiff, before entering judgment, shall file in the court an affidavit," etc. Section 3078¼bb.

And, finally, it nowhere appears that the defendant was in the military service, or that he was in any way prejudiced or at all affected by the fact that said affidavit was not filed prior to entering default.

The orders appealed from are affirmed.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

HOGAN v. ANTHONY et al. (Civ. 3106.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. April 4, 1921.)

1. Sales ⊜121—Buyer who used motor truck after discovery of fraud waived right to rescind.

Plaintiff buyer of an automobile truck, who, on discovering that the truck was a three-fourths ton instead of a one ton truck, which he had asked for, expressed willingness to return the truck to defendant seller, but continued to use it in his business for 23 days after discovery of the fraud, did not effect a rescission, having waived his right to rescind by using the truck in his business after discovery of the fraud.

2. Sales ⊜121—Buyer who ratified contract by using truck despite seller's fraud could recover damages but may not rescind.

Having ratified his contract for the purchase of a motor truck by using it in his business after discovering the falsity of defendant seller's representation that it was a one ton truck, the buyer could stand on his contract and recover any damages he might have sustained by reason of the fraud, but may not repudiate his obligations by seeking to rescind the contract he thus affirmed.

3. Sales ⊜121—Use of tools or machine by purchaser after refusal of tender in rescission defeats rescission.

Use of tools, implements, machine, or apparatus after the seller has refused tender of it in rescission of the contract, would defeat the attempted rescission, if such use was for the purchaser's personal benefit.

4. Sales ⊜92—Parties to sale after waiver of right to rescind may mutually effect rescission.

The parties to a sale may by mutual assent effect a rescission, though one had previously waived his right to rescind.

5. Sales ⊜476—Purchaser who acceded to demand for possession of truck cannot claim surrender not under contract.

The buyer of a motor truck, who, on refusing to pay an installment note given for the price on account of defendant seller's fraud in representing the truck was a one ton truck, acceded to the demand of the seller's agent and gave up the truck, cannot claim that his surrender of possession was not made under and by virtue of the contract merely because he did not see fit to exact the particular form of notice that the instrument prescribed as a condition precedent to defendant seller's right thereunder to terminate the so-called lease of the truck, for such notice could be waived by the buyer.

6. Sales ⊜92—Fact conditional seller may have mistaken rights under contract does not operate as a rescission.

Though the conditional seller of a motor truck may have mistaken his rights under the contract in claiming that he had a right to keep the property, retain the part of the price paid, and recover on an installment note, the fact did not operate as a rescission of the contract on his part; it being manifest that he did not contemplate anything of the kind.

7. Sales ⊜92—Evidence held to show no rescission by mutual assent.

In an action by the conditional buyer of a motor truck against the seller who took back the truck from the buyer with the latter's consent when the buyer refused to pay an installment note on the ground of defendant seller's fraud in representing the truck was a one ton truck, evidence held to show that there was no rescission of the contract by mutual assent.

8. Evidence ⊜442(6)—Parol evidence of truck seller's warranty of carrying capacity inadmissible in view of written contract.

In an action by the conditional purchaser of a motor truck, the contract having been in writing and complete, it was not permissible for plaintiff purchaser to show any oral agreement on defendant seller's part warranting the truck to have any particular carrying capacity; no such warranty appearing in the contract.

9. Sales ⊜391(9)—Buyer without right to rescind cannot recover money paid which is forfeited for his fault.

Where there has been no rescission of a conditional contract of sale, and the buyer is not entitled to rescind, the money paid by him on account of the purchase price belongs to the seller under the contract, and cannot be recovered by the buyer as in an action for money had and received, for the vendee's rights under a contract of sale may be forfeited for his breach of a contract condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; J. W. Curtis, Judge.

Action by James P. Hogan against Earle C. Anthony and another. From judgment for plaintiff, the named defendant appeals. Reversed.

Paul Nourse, A. D. Laughlin, O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, and Hewlings Mumper, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

FINLAYSON, P. J. This is an appeal from a judgment in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover $500 paid by him to the defendant Anthony on account of the purchase price of an automobile truck. Anthony is the only defendant who appeals. For convenience, we shall treat the case as though appellant were the sole defendant.

On August 12, 1914, defendant agreed to sell and plaintiff agreed to buy the truck for the sum of $1,650. At that time plaintiff paid $500 on account of the purchase price and agreed to pay the balance in eleven monthly installments of $100 each, and one, the last, of $50, all to be evidenced by promissory notes due and payable in accordance with the agreement. On the next day, August 13th, plaintiff and defendant executed an instrument designated "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile." At the same time plaintiff made and executed the promissory notes in accordance with his agreement, made the day before. Thereupon the truck was delivered to plaintiff, who used it in his business until September 18, 1914, when he surrendered possession to defendant. The last-mentioned instrument, that entitled "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile," is the one that evidences the final agreement of the parties. It contains a provision to the effect that it shall be construed as a "lease," with an option on the part of plaintiff to acquire title to the truck for the sum of $1, subject to a compliance with his covenants therein contained and payment of the notes according to their terms and conditions. Though the parties designated their contract as a "lease," it was, as held on a former appeal in this case (40 Cal. App. 679, 182 Pac. 52), a contract for the conditional sale of the truck.

To induce plaintiff to enter into the contract, pay the $500, and execute his notes for the balance of the $1,650, defendant, so the complaint alleges and the court finds, falsely and fraudulently represented that the truck had a carrying capacity of one ton. Upon this phase of the case the court found substantially as follows: At the time he entered into the contract plaintiff had no knowledge regarding such trucks and so informed defendant, and told him that he would have to rely upon defendant's representations. At that time plaintiff, who was engaged in the business of selling and delivering ice, informed defendant that he needed a truck with a capacity of and capable of carrying and conveying from 1 to 1¼ tons of freight, and that he could not use a truck of a less carrying capacity. Defendant thereupon represented to plaintiff that the truck in question was a ton truck, that it had a hauling capacity sufficient for plaintiff's business, and that it would easily carry and haul 1¼ tons of freight. Plaintiff relied upon defendant's representation as to the truck's carrying capacity and believed it to be true. Defendant's representation was false and fraudulent, the actual carrying capacity being but 1,500 pounds, or three-quarters of a ton. On August 26, 1913, plaintiff discovered that the truck was not a ton truck, and that its carrying capacity was but 1,500 pounds.

The theory of the action is that, after discovering the falsity of defendant's representation, plaintiff rescinded the contract. The findings upon this branch of the case are substantially as follows: On September 18, 1914, defendant demanded payment of plaintiff's note for $100—the first of the twelve notes to fall due. Although the note had become due and payable on September 13, 1914, plaintiff refused to pay it unless defendant furnished him with a ton truck. Instead of paying the note, plaintiff, at defendant's request, on said 18th day of September, 1914, which was 23 days after plaintiff had discovered the falsity of the representation, returned the truck to defendant, who ever since has had possession. Plaintiff returned the truck because it was not as it had been represented to be and because it could not be successfully used by him in his business. Defendant never furnished plaintiff with a truck having a carrying capacity of one ton. Prior to the commencement of the action, but about two months after the return of the truck, plaintiff demanded a return of the $500, which defendant refuses to pay.

The case has been in the District Court of Appeal twice before. On the first appeal (34 Cal. App. 24, 166 Pac. 861), defendant appealed from a judgment in favor of plaintiff. On that appeal the judgment for plaintiff was reversed on the ground that the only attempted rescission, as shown by the pleadings and findings then before the court, was a rescission of the contract evidenced by the writing executed on August 12, which, as pointed out by the court on that appeal, did not evidence the final agreement between the parties, their respective obligations being measured by the terms of the instrument executed August 13, entitled "Lease and Conditional Sale of Automobile," the very existence of which was, at that time, denied by plaintiff.

On the going down of the remittitur, following the decision on the first appeal, plaintiff filed a second amended complaint containing two counts. In the first he alleges facts which, if true, he insists show a rescission of the contract as evidenced by the last executed instrument. The second count in the amended complaint is a common count for money had and received by defendant for plaintiff's use and benefit. A trial was had of the issues tendered by this amended complaint, judgment passed for defendant, and thereupon plaintiff appealed. That appeal was upon the judgment roll alone. Plaintiff, as the appellant on that appeal, claimed that, on the findings made by the court on the second trial, he was entitled to a judgment for the $500 that he had paid on account of the purchase price, with interest thereon from the date of payment. The appellate court held with him in this contention, and reversed the judgment with directions to the lower court "to enter judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff for $500, together with interest thereon from August 12, 1914, and costs" (40 Cal. App. 679, 182 Pac. 52).

Upon the going down of the remittitur after the second appeal, the trial court, pursuant to the appellate court's instruction, entered a judgment on the findings in favor of plaintiff for $500, with interest thereon from August 12, 1914. The present appeal is from that judgment, defendant claiming that the evidence taken at the second trial is insufficient to justify certain of the findings upon which, on the second appeal, the appellate court ordered judgment to be entered in plaintiff's favor. Because the judgment that was the first to be entered on those findings (the judgment that was reversed on the second appeal) was in defendant's favor, this is the first opportunity he has had to attack the findings by an appeal from the judgment. That he now does, claiming insufficiency of the evidence to justify such of the findings as show a rescission. It thus will be seen that the main question presented to us on this appeal did not, and, in the nature of the case, could not arise on either of the two previous appeals. On the first appeal the contract that plaintiff then claimed had been rescinded was not the contract as finally agreed to by the parties. On the second appeal the question presented was, Are the findings sufficient to support the judgment? On this, the third appeal, the question is: Is the evidence sufficient to sustain those findings?

Appellant claims that the return of the truck was not made pursuant to a rescission of the contract, but that it was taken by him from plaintiff under a provision in the "lease" giving him a right thereto in the event that plaintiff breached any of his covenants or defaulted in any payment. That provision is, in substance, as follows: In the event that the lessee breaches any of his covenants or defaults in any payment when due, the lessor, at his option, "may terminate this lease by giving notice of such termination to said lessee in writing by registered letter deposited in the United States post office addressed to said lessee, and upon such termination said lessee shall lose all right to the possession of said automobile and all rights under this lease and the right to purchase said automobile as hereinbefore mentioned, and said lessor shall thereupon be entitled to the possession of said automobile and all parts thereof; it is agreed that such termination of this lease shall not release the lessee from the payment of any sums to the lessor up to and including the day of such termination." The instrument further provides that "time is of the essence of this lease." It thus will be seen that, under and by virtue of the express terms of their agreement, the parties contemplated that upon default in any of the purchaser's payments the seller should be entitled to have both the property and all the money due and payable by the purchaser up to the time when the seller elected to terminate the contract.

There is no substantial conflict in the evidence upon the question of rescission. Plaintiff himself testified on this point substantially as follows:

"I found out what the capacity of the truck was at the factory rating. I found this out some time after I got it. I don't remember just how long; a short time after I got it. * * * I only talked to Mr. Neff at that time. [Neff was defendant's agent through whom the conditional sale had been made.] * * * I told him how it was acting. I told him that I had found out that it was a 1,500-pound truck instead of a ton."

It was, as we already have pointed out, on August 26th that plaintiff discovered the falsity of defendant's representation as to the capacity of the truck. About a week after the discovery he met Neff and another of defendant's agents. Referring to the occasion of that meeting, plaintiff testified as follows:

"About a week after, I saw Mr. Neff. He and another gentleman came out one day and met me on the street. * * * The other man came up to me and wanted to know how the truck was acting. I told him about it, and he said: 'Well, there is a $100 due on it. What are you going to do about it?' And I said, 'I am not going to do a thing about it.' There was no one out prior to that time trying to operate the truck nor at any time subsequent to that. * * * When Mr. Neff and the other man came out to talk about the $100, this man came up to the machine and I told him how it was acting, and he wanted to know how it was getting along. I told him, and he said, 'Well, you've got to pay that hundred dollars due,' and I said: 'All right, come out and take it if you want it, but I am not going to pay any more until you make some settlement. I want somebody to come out here that knows something about it. I am willing to do anything agreeable, but I am not going to pay $100 until something is done.' And he said, 'We'll come and take the truck,' and I said, 'All right,' and he turned around and got into the machine and drove off, and I did the same. I didn't see anything of them after that for some time, and then this man [defendant's representative] came out and I met him on Second avenue and Upland. I do not remember whether I was alone or had a man with me, but I think I had a man with me, and he spoke about the truck and about the $100 and wanted to know if I was going to pay it, and I said 'No,' and he said, 'I am going to take the truck,' and I said, 'All right, but I think it would be better to make some settlement about it.'"

Respondent claims that this evidence shows that he then notified defendant that he would not be bound by the contract, and that he then and there offered to return the truck and rescind the contract.

About two weeks later plaintiff again met Neff, when, according to his own version, the following took place:

"'Well,' he said [referring to Neff], 'if you want to, pay the hundred dollars; if you don't I will take the truck.' I said, 'I will go down to the ice house and take the load off.' 'All right,' he said, 'I will go down.' He got in the machine and went down. He said, 'Don't you think you had better pay this note?' I said: 'I am not going to. This truck is no good to me and I will not pay any more money on it.' He said, 'I will tie this truck up,' and I said, 'Can you do it?' and he said, 'I have got the papers right in my pocket to do it,' and he said, 'If you don't want to give it up I will go up town and get an officer and tie it right up,' and I said: 'You need not do that; if you want the truck I will put it anywhere you say so.' And he said, 'Take it to that garage,' and I said, 'All right.'"

The truck, accordingly, was taken to the garage and thereupon defendant's agent, Neff, took possession. Continuing, plaintiff further testified as follows:

"I didn't feel like paying for something I could not use in my business. It wasn't a ton truck, and I needed a ton truck in my business. It was only a three-quarter ton truck, and I didn't feel like paying another one hundred dollars on something I didn't want and was no good to me."

In reply to a question asking him why he returned the truck to defendant, plaintiff testified:

"I returned it with the expectation that I would get my money back or a suitable truck."

[1] Plaintiff, it is true, upon discovering that the truck was not a ton truck, notified defendant of that fact and expressed a willingness to return it; but we cannot accede to his claim that he then and there effected a rescission. On the contrary, he continued to use the truck in his business up to the time he did return it—23 days after his discovery of the fraud. And then he returned it only after defendant's agent, Neff, had threatened to get an officer and seize it. Under the circumstances disclosed by plaintiff's evidence, we think that no rescission was effected, and, unless the contract of conditional sale was rescinded, plaintiff, under the terms of his contract, is not entitled to a return of the $500.

[2] By using the truck in his business after his discovery of the fraud, plaintiff waived his right to rescind. This is not one of those cases where the purchaser is allowed a reasonable time to ascertain by use, test, and trial whether the article is as warranted or as represented. The representation of which plaintiff complains was that the truck was a ton truck; that is, that its rated carrying capacity was one ton. If the representation had been that the truck would not heat to an unreasonable degree while being used in the ordinary and customary manner in plaintiff's business, irrespective of what its rated carrying capacity might be, it may well be that, in that event, he would be entitled to test its qualities by using it for a reasonable time in his business, that thereby he might ascertain whether it would heat to an undue degree when thus used. But here the representation upon which plaintiff alleges he relied was the specific representation that the vehicle was a ton truck. When plaintiff attempted to have it insured he was informed by the insurance agent that it was only a 1,500-pound truck, and that that was its factory rating. Notwithstanding this unequivocal information and his discovery, beyond all question, of the falsity of the specific representation upon which he claims to have relied when he made the purchase, he continued the daily use of the truck in his business for about three weeks thereafter. The purchaser of an article who wishes to rescind the contract of sale cannot play fast and loose in the matter. He is not allowed to go on and derive all possible benefit from the transaction and then claim the right to be relieved from his own obligations by a rescission or refusal to perform on his part. If, after the discovery of the misrepresentation, he conducts himself with reference to the transaction as though it still were subsisting and binding, he will not thereafter be permitted to impeach the validity of the contract by seeking to rescind it or to escape performance of his covenants. Having ratified the contract by using the truck in his business after he discovered the falsity of defendant's representation, plaintiff could stand upon his contract and recover any damages that he may have sustained by reason of the fraud, but he may not repudiate his obligations by seeking to rescind the contract that he thus has affirmed. The rule is stated in Black on Rescission and Cancellation, vol. 2, p. 1388, as follows:

"If the purchaser of a tool, implement, machine, apparatus, or any other article intended to serve a useful purpose, discovers he has been deceived and defrauded, but nevertheless continues to use it, not for the purpose of testing it or trying to make it available, but for the purpose of deriving benefit or advantage from its use, he will be held to have waived his right to rescind the purchase, and cannot thereafter return the article and claim a restoration of the money paid for it."

The theory of the doctrine is that, having recognized the contract as existing, and having done something to carry it into effect and to obtain or claim its benefits, although perhaps only to a partial extent, and having thus taken his chances, the purchaser cannot afterwards be suffered to repudiate the transaction and allege its voidable nature.

[3] If we concede respondent's claim that, in his conversation with Neff about a week after the discovery of the fraud, he then and there offered to return the truck, but that his offer was not accepted the fact will remain, nevertheless, that he waived his right to rescind. The rule is that the use of a tool, implement, machine, or apparatus by the purchaser after the seller has refused his tender of it in rescission of the contract, will defeat the attempted rescission if such use was for his personal benefit. Hakes v. Thayer, 165 Mich. 476, 131 N. W. 174; Mizell v. Watson, 57 Fla. 111, 49 South. 149; note to Clark v. Wells, L. R. A. 1916F, 481.

[4, 5] It is suggested that notwithstanding plaintiff's conduct may unequivocally indicate his acquiescence in the contract, and not withstanding he thus may have waived his right to rescind, both parties, nevertheless, could, and in this case did, agree to and consummate a rescission when defendant was permitted to retake possession of the truck. The claim is that when plaintiff permitted defendant to retake the truck there was a rescission by consent. Without doubt the parties to a sale may, by mutual assent, effect a rescission notwithstanding one of them may previously have waived his right to rescind. But the evidence before us in this case fails to show a rescission by consent. To rescind a contract is to annul it, and claim nothing under it. Miller v. Steen, 30 Cal. 407, 89 Am. Dec. 124. If there be a rescission by mutual assent, each renounces all his rights under the contract and should put the other in statu quo. Here neither party renounced his rights under the contract. Defendant, when he took possession of the truck through his agent, asserted a right under the contract, namely, the right to seize the truck under that clause which permits him to terminate the "lease" if the "lessee" defaults in the payment of any installment of the purchase price when due. Just before taking possession, defendant's agent told plaintiff that he had better pay the $100 note that was then due and payable. Upon plaintiff demurring to this, the agent said:

"I will tie this truck up. * * * I have got the papers right in my pocket to do it. If you don't want to give it up I will go to town and get an officer and tie it right up."

It is obvious that in thus threatening to resort to the machinery of the law defendant's agent was asserting what he supposed to be a right under the contract, namely, the right which, in the event that plaintiff should default in any payment when due, the contract gives to defendant to "terminate this lease" and to take "the possession of said automobile and all parts thereof," without thereby releasing plaintiff "from the payment of any sum due lessor up to and including the day of such termination." It is true the contract makes the giving of a written notice, by registered mail, a condition precedent to defendant's right thus to terminate the lease; but this provision respecting notice is for the benefit of the purchaser or "lessee," and one, therefore, that he may waive, and which, in fact, he did waive, when, upon defendant's agent threatening to invoke the services of an officer, plaintiff himself voluntarily returned the truck without requiring the stipulated notice. Had he chosen to insist on a strict recognition of his contract rights, plaintiff could have refused to surrender possession until he had received the written notice by registered letter. Instead, he acceded to the demand of defendant's agent, and he cannot now claim that his surrender of possession was not made under and by virtue of the contract merely because he did not see fit to exact the particular form of notice that the instrument prescribes as a condition precedent to defendant's right thereunder to terminate the so-called "lease."

[6] For these reasons we conclude that there is nothing to indicate an intention on the part of defendant to rescind, but that every act, under the circumstances, indicates a contrary purpose. Instead of restoring or offering to restore plaintiff to the status quo, defendant, at all times, has stoutly maintained his right to keep the property, retain the $500, and recover on the $100 note that, by its terms, was payable at the time when his agent retook possession. Defendant may have mistaken his rights under the contract, but this does not operate as a rescission of the contract on his part, when it is manifest that he did not contemplate anything of the kind. Miller v. Steen, 34 Cal. 138.

Nor did plaintiff, when he permitted defendant's agent to retake the truck after the latter had threatened forcible seizure, intend to rescind, i. e., to claim nothing under the contract. Asked why he returned the truck, he testified:

"I returned it with the expectation that I would get my money back or a suitable truck."

The expectation that defendant might deliver to him a truck conforming to the representation that had been made shows that plaintiff never did unequivocally renounce all rights under the contract. There can be no partial termination of a contract. A party to a contract cannot assert rights thereunder for some purposes while regarding it as at an end for others.

[7] For the foregoing reasons we think it clearly appears that there never has been any rescission by mutual assent, and that plaintiff, by using the truck in his business after discovering the falsity of the representation, waived all right to demand a rescission.

[8] It is suggested that, because of his false and fraudulent representation as to the capacity of the truck, defendant had no right to retake it, and that, by doing so without right, he thereby breached the contract, thus giving to plaintiff the right to consider it as abandoned. The gravamen of plaintiff's case is fraud, not warranty. The case therefore must not be confounded with one in which the vendor has bound himself by a warranty,
